Another source of expenditure, and for which the party in power is responsible, is the large amount expended in the collection of the internal revenues of the country and the extra number of employés engaged in said collection. The sum paid to the said employés during the last year was $2,185,462.92. Really, Mr. Chairman, in this connection I will say that the whole legislation of the country for some years past upon the subject of internal revenue has been exceedingly oppressive to many sections of the country. The very large amounts collected from this source is very unequally and unfairly distributed among the different sections of the country. Since the tax on incomes and salaries, &c., has been abolished, the Southern and Western States are paying a very much larger proportion of this tax than they did prior to the abolition of the tax on incomes. I submit herewith a schedule giving the amount of income paid in 1870, and another giving the amount paid in 1875, showing how the income paid by the various States has fallen off in the States where large salaries are paid and large capital is held, and shifted to the Western and Northwestern States:

Amount of income paid in 1870 and 1875.

States and Territories.	1870.	1875.
Alabama	$595,700 17	$115,689 37
Arizona	15,615 43	10,263 06
Arkansas	369,284 10	75,377 44
California	4,602,439 31	2,988,033 26
Colorado	73,910 34	70,531 82
Connecticut	2,564,477 14	627,717 96
Dakota	8,715 61	10,040 18
Delaware	451,985 70	360,331 03
District of Columbia	514,482 20	112,226 69
Florida	106,318 42	184,777 59
Georgia	1,144,241 38	388,226 84
Idaho	65,424 05	19,136 00
Illinois	18,364,366 66	17,634,626 71
Indiana	5,045,023 82	4,653,789 05
Iowa	1,377,981 34	1,040,217 69
Kansas	343,231 15	133,685 86
Kentucky	9,887,623 73	9,025,587 88
Louisiana	2,981,524 02	606,264 38
Maine	807,224 36	107,473 15
Maryland	5,438,472 91	2,760,736 57
Massachusetts	10,684,090 19	2,708,014 29
Michigan	2,918,987 30	1,931,284 80
Minnesota	467,879 15	228,362 45
Mississippi	234,792 49	96,967 92
Missouri	6,004,278 11	4,594,875 31
Montana	103,555 55	23,666 10
Nebraska	308,501 51	292,472 30
Nevada	188,027 45	58,803 30
New Hampshire	632,407 38	299,389 55
New Jersey	4,075,353 85	2,363,469 41
New Mexico	46,927 22	22,066 19
New York	36,361,550 38	15,238,881 81
North Carolina	1,398,719 95	1,630,423 53
Ohio	19,563,743 80	14,602,720 17
Oregon	329,212 01	47,939 64
Pennsylvania	16,748,704 05	6,157,960 04
Rhode Island	1,282,376 69	231,978 00
South Carolina	412,039 59	122,277 92
Tennessee	1,470,859 57	861,645 28
Texas	390,954 33	258,297 29
Utah	46,296 41	34,899 68
Vermont	352,316 65	58,582 18
Virginia	5,496,351 39	7,660,921 20
Washington	83,272 63	21,146 60
West Virginia	756,967 15	508,868 20
Wisconsin	2,363,015 03	2,722,076 75
Wyoming	25,879 82	11,942 11
Total	167,560,107 49	103,771,664 60

I allude to other matters in the management of the affairs of the country that the people have some right to complain of. We have been taught that the judicial system of the United States was a grand system; that as a general thing the judiciary were men of integrity and incorruptibility; that these tribunals to which we appeal for the protection of life, liberty, and property were above the sordid and corrupting influences of money or power; but the history of the Department of Justice is not free from the general blame that is attached to some of the other Departments. Some of the grossest frauds and mismanagements have grown up in this Department since its organization, and the investigation which has been made during the last Congress shows that there is no more fruitful source of corruption and fraud anywhere to be found in the Government than there is in the conduct in many sections of the country of the marshals, and of even the judges themselves. Indeed, some of the judges have been compelled to resign their seats rather than submit to the exposure which their criminal connection with corrupt and unprincipled marshals would have developed. The expenditures of the marshals in the various districts of the United States when fairly and honestly rendered must necessarily be large, but the practices that have grown up, of constructive mileage, of double guards, false accounts, and almost a thousand other fraudulent devices, make the amount paid to them almost 50 per cent. larger than it should be if these offices were filled by honest and conscientious men. The marshals' fees alone for the year ending June 30, 1875, were $2,393,680. By a recent investigation had by a Committee on the Expenditures in the Department of Justice it has been proven that one man alone was intrusted with the large sum of one hundred and twenty-five or one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, for the purpose, he said, "of hunting up Ku-Klux" and other criminals, and yet he was not required by said Department to render an account of how he had distributed that fund and to whom the said fund had been paid; and up to the present time no account has been rendered of its distribution, nor will any ever be rendered. Yet, strange to say, these corrupt practices have never been corrected by that Department, nor has any attempt been made to do this until within the last year or two, under investigations made by a regularly-appointed committee for that purpose.

I will allude to another subject, disgraceful as it is, dishonorable as it may be, which must cling to those in power because a remedy was not applied to the evil before it was too late for the unfortunate victims of that institution. I mean the Freedman's Bank. I venture the assertion that there is not in the history of moneyed institutions in the country anywhere to be found so much of fraud, so much of dishonesty and corruption as has been shown in the management of this institution, and that, too, by its professed friends. The original object of the institution was a good one, and if it had been honestly and fairly carried out and executed it would have benefited the beneficiaries to a great extent; would have stimulated them to habits of industry, to a desire to accumulate and to lay up their small earnings, and in many instances would have been a source of great profit to these beneficiaries. But insufficient securities have been taken, irresponsible agents have had control of the institution, and the ignorant and deluded depositors have been taken, step by step, in this unprofitable investment until they have been robbed of nearly the whole of their hard earnings, while those who have been guilty of these high crimes and misdemeanors have been permitted to escape the penalties of the law.

Mr. Chairman, the party in power are responsible for the very large debt now hanging upon the country, and I think it is perfectly demonstrable that by mismanagement and improper legislation this debt was swelled and increased beyond what it otherwise would have been; and thus it has become more onerous upon the people and more beneficial to those who are fortunate enough to speculate in the bonds of the Government than it would have been under a different system of legislation. I suppose it will hardly be controverted that a very large portion of the original national debt, and for which bonds were issued by the terms of the various acts under which these issues were made, was not to be payable in gold, much less the interest that accrued thereon; and yet by the legislation of those who were in power these bonds were made payable in gold, and the annual interest thereon can alone be paid in the coin of the country, thereby making it far more burdensome upon the people to meet these demands than it would have been under other circumstances. As one of the results of this bonded system and of the payment of the interest in gold, and from the fact that a very large proportion of the same are held by foreign capitalists, all the large amounts of gold which are produced in the United States are shipped to other countries for the purpose of paying the interest which accrues upon said bonds. We sometimes talk about specie payments and about resumption, and yet, while these large exportations of gold go on, it would be very difficult for us to do anything much in the way of resumption. These exportations have increased from year to year until the amount now exported equals or perhaps exceeds the annual product thereof in the United States. I find by looking over the Secretary's report the exportation of gold for a series of years to be as follows:

1861	$23,799,870
1862	31,044,650
1863	55,993,562
1864	100,473,562
1865	64,618,124
1866	82,643,374
1867	54,926,196
1868	83,745,975
1869	42,915,966
1870	43,883,802
1871	84,403,350
1872	72,798,240
1873	73,905,546
1874	59,699,688
1875	83,957,129

Thus making a constant drain upon the gold of the country to meet the foreign demands against this Government. And in this connection I will say to the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. HUBBELL,] if he will deduct from his table, made a few days since in a speech delivered in this House, the exports of gold, he will then find that under the fourteen years of protection the exports of the domestic industries of this country will be several millions of dollars less than the imports.

Now, if it be true that a large portion of the bonded debt of the United States was made payable, by subsequent acts, in coin when it should not have been done, then to that extent we have been injured by the legislation of the party in power. I have seen a statement of the result of the legislation made by a distinguished gentleman from Indiana, Mr. Voorhees, which I believe to be correct. He undertakes to show that by the sale of bonds in the years 1862, 1863, 1864, 1865, 1866, 1867, and 1868, which in the aggregate amounted to about $2,000,000,000, and receiving therefor greenbacks at their face value dollar for dollar, and the interest on the difference between the gold value and the paper value thereof from the time said sales were made up to the latter part of the year 1868, the Government had lost by the transaction and the bondholders had made by the same about $1,000,000,000.

Thus in the year 1862, in round numbers, $28,000,000; in 1863, $94,000,000; in 1864, $306,000,000; in 1865, $110,000,000; in 1866, $53,000,000; in 1867, $167,000,000; in 1868, $253,000,000; in 1869, $98,000,000.

Whether this statement be true or not, the party in power was responsible for all the legislation out of which has grown the present monetary system of the United States, be that good or bad. We are told by the Secretary of the Treasury that the revenues from customs during the last year have fallen off $5,000,000. We are also told by him that of the commerce of the United States 74 per cent. has been carried in foreign vessels and only 26 per cent. in home vessels, while in 1860 34 per cent. was carried in foreign vessels and 66 per cent. was carried in home vessels. In 1860 the American tonnage entering British ports was 1,747,651 tons; the British tonnage entering said ports was 1,136,364 tons. In 1870 the American tonnage entering said ports was 479,670 tons, and the British entering the same ports 2,778,823 tons. The falling off of American tonnage from 1861 to 1874 has been about 7,770,819 tons. In 1860 the exports and imports to and from the United States amounted to $762,288,550. Of this the American ships carried 66 per cent. and foreign ships 34 per cent.; in 1875 the exports and imports amounted to $1,046,448,147, and of this American ships carried 26 per cent. and foreign ships 74 per cent., as before stated. All this shows the distressed condition of the country and the injury to our commerce.

There is another matter that I desire to call the attention of the committee to, and that is the rapid accumulation of the interest upon the bonds given for the construction of the various Pacific railroads. Notwithstanding the very large land grants that were made for the construction of these various roads and the very large amount of business that is being done by them, still the interest upon the bonded debt of the United States for this purpose is increasing year by year. That the committee may see how this matter stands, I submit the following figures showing the amount of bonds given in aid of the construction of these various roads and outstanding on the 1st day of July, 1875, and the land originally granted to them. The amounts are as follows:

Roads.	Bonds.	Lands.
		Acres.
Union Pacific	$27,236,512	12,080,000
Central Pacific	25,881,000	13,222,400
Kansas Pacific	6,303,000	6,500,000
Central Branch Union Pacific	1,600,000	500,000
Western Pacific	1,970,000	.....
Sioux City Pacific	1,628,320	.....
North Pacific	.....	5,000,000
Texas Pacific	.....	16,000,000
Thirty-fifth-parallel road	.....	500,000

The interest accumulating upon these bonds, which the United States has paid and which the various roads should have paid to the Government but failed to do, is as follows: The 1st of July, 1871, there was due from said roads $10,621,792; in 1872, $14,447,254; in 1873, $18,731,031; in 1874, $22,750,883; in 1875, $27,167,518. (See Secretary's report, pages 34, 35.)

Now, am I going too far in saying, with the vast earnings of these roads, that the agents having in charge this matter have been derelict in duty in not collecting more of the interest due by these various companies and reducing the interest as it stood in 1871, rather than to have permitted it to have increased almost threefold since that time?

There are many other things, Mr. Chairman, that I could allude to to show why it was incumbent upon this Committee on Appropriations to look into and scrutinize closely the various Departments provided for in this bill and see whether or not these tremendous expenses which have grown up under the present party in power could not be reduced, thereby relieving to some extent the burdens and the taxes on the people.

I believe that this present Congress, as has been asserted time and again, was elected with the view of bringing about a retrenchment and reform in the management of our affairs, and as far forth as we can accomplish this result and carry out the wishes of our various constituents, we should do the same; and more especially is it our bounden duty to look into all the transactions connected with the heads of each of these Departments and of their subordinates in every branch of the Government throughout the length and the breadth of the land, and see whether or not these officers act honestly in the discharge of their various duties. It is a sad commentary upon our free and liberal institutions that the investigations now going on into the conduct of these officials are developing very much of fraud and peculation, which not only brings dishonor and disgrace upon the individuals themselves, but falls with great severity upon the Government itself in the eyes of all enlightened nations.

Now, Mr. Chairman, who is responsible for this state of things? If the country is unprosperous, if these officials have acted dishonestly, if our expenditures have been larger than they should have been, if public servants have received too large salaries, if destitution exists in the land, certainly the party in power must be held responsible for all the evils that afflict and fall upon the country. It may be said by some that where corruption and fraud have been traced home to persons occupying high positions in the Government these are only individual cases; yet I dare say that if the party which has been in power for the last few years had been as vigilant, had been as watchful and careful as they should have been, having control of all these Departments and free access to the books and accounts and everything in regard to the management and control of the Government, very many of these things could have been discovered before this House, with its dominant majority, undertook investigations.

I might ask, again, what excuse can there be for those who have control of these matters, or the unprecedented debt that has accumulated in the District of Columbia? Did it not occur immediately under the eye of this Administration? Did not these enormous expenses and speculations occur around the various Departments and right under the very eye of the various Congresses that assembled here from time to time? And yet no steps were taken by this dominant party to put a check upon those who were squandering the people's money and running the District of Columbia into hopeless bankruptcy and ruin.

I might ask again, why have all the frauds grown up in the country from one end of it to the other in regard to the revenue laws gone undetected and unchecked until one of the heads of one of the Departments, with honest purpose and with unflinching nerve, determined that these frauds and felonies should be stopped and the perpetrators brought to condign punishment? I fear, Mr. Chairman, there has been too much disposition to look lightly upon these matters, and that they have not made such an impression upon our minds as they should have done, until the whole country has become aroused at the enormity of these outrages and demands that these evils shall be corrected, and that honest and faithful officers shall fill the place of those who have hitherto proved recreant to the trust imposed in them by a confiding constituency.

Then, Mr. Chairman, as far therefore as we can assist in rectifying these evils, it is our duty to stand by and support the committee in all of its laudable efforts to accomplish this purpose. They have made a good commencement. In the military bill they have reduced the appropriation over preceding years $105,509, the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill $460,737, the fortification bill $722,000. In the present bill they propose a reduction of $5,724,000. If it turns out that these reductions have not injured the public service, that enough employés remain after cutting off so many of the supernumeraries to carry on the legitimate operations of the Government, then certainly we will have commenced a system of reduction which if carried out in the future will lighten very much the burdens of an overtaxed people and perhaps be the means of inducing the whole country to practice economy, frugality in public as well as in private matters.

I repeat it, Mr. Chairman, that I heartily approve of the general scope, objects, and purposes of this bill; and while I shall be constrained perhaps to vote against some of its minor provisions, I shall sustain the main features of the same, because I believe they are in the interest of economy and reform. If we can reduce the present enormous expenses of the Government without injury to the public service; if we can ferret out corruption existing in official positions and expose the same; if we can by proper legislation inspire confidence in the people and revive the dormant industries of the country, then we shall have accomplished something for our suffering country and will be entitled to the gratitude of the whole people.

Party Politics and the Federal Constitution.

SPEECH OF HON. JOHN F. PHILIPS,

OF MISSOURI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 24, 1876,

In Committee of the Whole on the bill (H. R. No. 2571) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

Mr. PHILIPS, of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, this occasion, in my judgment, is opportune to give utterance to some views touching the political crisis upon us, rendered important as they are responsive to issues forced upon the country by the republican party. Involving as they do the peace and rest of the country from intestine strife, and the vitalizing principles of our constitutional system of government, to my mind they possess an importance graver than those that affect the country's civil service or its economic administration. For these cannot be adjusted effectually while reason is hushed with factious clamor and a greed for office, nor if attained would they compensate for the loss of those invaluable principles of constitutional liberty which are being so persistently and stealthily assailed.

The flaunting before the too eager gaze of the people the red flag of war, the studied attempts to rehabilitate the dismantled issues of 1860, and to vitalize the dead carcass of secession, are but the common and shallow devices of demagogues to retain place and divert public attention from their astounding frauds, party sins, and ulterior objects. The late war, Mr. Chairman, now belongs to history. It is not of to-day. Whatever it accomplished of good or glory belongs to the country; whatever it settled, let it stand. If it demonstrated the indissolubility of the American Union, who is not to-day proud of the unity and grandeur of his country? If it manumitted 4,000,000 slaves, who is there in all the land who would manacle one of them? If it crimsoned the land and incarnadined the deep with the best blood valor ever shed, and filled a million homes with the voice of lamentation, where is the man who does not weep with those who weep, and pray God that we may all live in peace ever after?

Not here or elsewhere would I re-open questions like the later constitutional amendments or reconstruction acts. For I have long thought there was admirable sense and wise policy in that language of Henry Clay in which he conveyed the report of the committee of thirteen on the admission of California:

> In grave national transactions in their earlier or incipient stages differences may well exist; but when once they have been decided by a constitutional majority, and are consummated, or in a process of consummation, there can be no other safe and prudent alternative than to respect the decision already rendered and to acquiesce in it.

The danger to the country lurks not here. The apprehension need not be that the Federal authority is not yet fully vindicated and the supremacy of the Federal Government not well re-established. But just alarm springs from the fact that the Federal Government is gathering strength by absorbing the life-blood of the States. Centralizing power in the Federal head is destroying the whole autonomy of our political system.

Amid the wild huzzas of the maddened, exultant populace at the glamour of waving plumes nodding on the heads of military chieftains, and the dazzling splendors of a mighty Republic triumphant in war, the people seem to have almost forgotten that power is ever stealing from the many to the few, and that their safety lies oftener in the traditions of the fathers and the sure guarantees of fundamental law than either the achievements of the hour or the illusions of national glory.

No intelligent man can dispassionately review the crucial experiments to which law and liberty have been subjected in this country for the last decade without the wonder that a remnant of either is left.

To my mind one of the most serious and deplorable aspects of the times is the utter contempt and sneering ridicule with which prominent members on the other side greet every allusion to the constitutional limitations of power. They have so long spurned the restraints of the Constitution, that when it is held up before them they are horrified as at the bloody crest of rebellion. The exercise of one doubtful power is pleaded as a precedent for every proposed invasion of the fundamental law, until if a halt be not soon called the usurped powers will be greater and stronger than those granted. The result is plain. Human nature is such that power once obtained is never voluntarily surrendered. It is like the jurisdiction of the old chancery courts; once taken it is never abandoned, for should it be shown to be illegal the first seizure of jurisdiction is cited for precedent, and law is made up of precedents when there is nothing else out of which to make it.

Unquestionably there are epochs in the history of nations when the instinct of self-preservation may assert itself, as in individuals, breaking through the restraints of human law and seizing any weapon in reach to preserve life. But, in the language of one of the eminent jurists now on the supreme bench, "the wants of government can never be the measure of its powers." The limitations placed on the Federal Government by the Constitution were in the interest of liberty and the freedom of the citizen in his domestic concerns. As the original source of power, they delegated to the Federal Government all the power it has, and whatever they did not expressly delegate they reserved to the States and themselves respectively. Feeling that this charter, granted by the people, lay directly in the path of the inroad the republican party was making on the reserved rights of the people, the supreme judiciary, charged with the solemn and sacred duty of holding up that instrument as a blazing, impenetrable shield to ward off the encroachments of power, was re-organized for party purposes. And its first service, rendered in the legal-tender decision, showed its recognition of the fact that in this day party, not the Constitution, is the supreme law of the land.

Disregarding all the utterances of the authors of the Constitution that the Federal Government is one of delegated powers, and therefore its expressed powers are the limits of its jurisdiction, Judge Strong says that Congress may "employ freely every means necessary for its preservation and for the fulfillment of its acknowledged duties." If this be so, what becomes of the tenth amendment to the Constitution, which the States imposed as a precedent condition to the adoption of the instrument?

Again, he says in the same opinion that the amendments to the Constitution demonstrate that there existed in the Constitution either a specified clause permitting, or the whole instrument construed together permitted, the doing of the thing forbidden by the amendment, such as the establishment of religion and the muzzling of the press. This is a sophism. Congress could not do these things, because the power was not expressly delegated; and that is the reason, as shown by the debates of the convention, why it did not insert the prohibition. Its framers were jealous all the way through to preserve the idea that what was not expressly placed in the law was denied; and the subsequent ingrafting of the amendments was the offspring of the jealousy of some of the States—a superabundance of caution. The acceptance of the amendments was no admission by the framers of the Constitution of their necessity, but rather a concession to the apprehensions and jealousy of the States, and to prevent a failure of the Constitution and Federal Union.

Equally vicious and untenable is that other inference, often made nowadays, that the Federal Government can exercise a certain power because the Constitution prohibits it to the States. This for reasons apparent. The Government being one of delegated powers, there was no need of prohibiting it from doing what it was not by expression or necessary implication authorized to do; as, for instance, the convention voted down the proposition to insert a clause preventing a restraint on the liberty of the press. The States prior to the formation of the Federal Constitution being sovereign indeed, it was necessary to restrict them by express provision in any matter sought to be taken from them.

The resolutions of Senator MORTON introduced at the other end of the Capitol as an exposition of his party theory of government, if they do not fly in the face of the Constitution, give it an unusual object and office. He declares:

That the rights of the States are defined and guaranteed by the Constitution and not by any outside theory of State sovereignty, and that the rights of the States cannot be enlarged or diminished except by an amendment to the Constitution.

This places the base of the edifice at the apex. It reverses the whole history of the modes of interpretation. It gives to the Constitution the office of restricting the powers of the States rather than those of the Federal Union. The tenth amendment to the Constitution expressly reserves to the States and people all the powers not delegated to the United States nor prohibited by it to the States.

How much more like the wise and good men who constructed our federation system would be this language? The rights of the Federal Government are defined by the Constitution; the rights of the States cannot be infringed nor diminished except by an amendment to the Constitution. The Federal and State governments are sovereign in their spheres; the Constitution is the shield of each and supreme over all.

Thus viewed, this confederate Republic of ours, with its wonderful adjustment of State and federal organization, becomes one of beautiful harmony, exact agreement, and incomparable perfection—E pluribus unum—one State in many; bearing the burdens and details of local administration, yet molded into one grand Republic, taking its place proudly in the family of nations. The inspiration of its draughtsmen was to make the true conception of our greatness as a people inseparable from the idea of liberty regulated by law, and our very patriotism the offspring of an enlightened feeling of personal independence. From the day the old colonies of Massachusetts, Plymouth, Connecticut, and New Haven, in 1643, declared in their articles for organic union that the united body had power over all affairs of peace and war and matters pertaining to the public concern, "but not to intermeddle with the local affairs of the colonies," the American people, no matter what a temporary party has done, have never lost sight of these cardinal notions of government, and never will voluntarily surrender them. For jeer at this phrase of "home government" if you can, it is yet the synonym of our manhood and the talisman of all valuable patriotism. It is a good angel, that watches over us by day and night, educates our childhood, guards and cherishes our old age. It is the assurance of the nation's strength, "and the amulet of her protection." It is the ultimate conservative principle in our political system which will preserve liberty for a while, even though the central power of the "nation" should end in a despotism.

When, therefore, the people of Louisiana or Mississippi claim the privilege of choosing their own administrators of local government under their own statute-laws in no wise counter to the Federal Constitution, and the Federal Executive or Congress interferes, if there are murmurings and discontentments and a feverish unrest among the people, let us not hastily conclude that it is the manifestation of a lingering spirit of disaffection toward the Union, but rather let us learn the truth and recognize the fact that it is the offspring of that instinctive attachment to home and its immunities and inviolability which springs unbidden in every manly breast, inherited from the very men who penned the Declaration of our Independence and defended it with their swords. When Grattan said the policy of England toward Ireland was to make the nation individually base in order to make her collectively contemptible, he expressed in a sentence the logical effect of the long, persistent efforts of the republican party to strike down every palisade that hedges in the autonomy of the American people.

Under laws to-day upon the Federal statute-books mounted patrols dragoon the people of the States, as did the English the tax-ridden, hunted Scot, driving them away from home and friends into Federal tribunals, to answer charges ranging from common-law homicides to misdemeanors and tumults. Federal judges send their ministerial officers into States to conserve the peace at municipal school meetings, to supervise elections at the lowliest precincts, with discretion to seize the ballot-box.

CIVIL-RIGHTS BILL.

By the civil-rights bill, our domestic guardian, the Federal Government, undertakes to keep hotel, conduct street and railroad cars, drive stage, strut the captain on deck, play usher at theaters, usurp the domain of esthetics and the functions of an Elisor, by determining both the cast and color of grand and petit jurors in State trials.

Contrary to all intendment of the authors of our system of government, section after section has supplemented the original judiciary act, until the Federal courts, now erected all through the States, overshadowing with the mastery of power the home courts of the people, are taking to themselves the jurisdiction of all our domestic concerns.

And as an evidence how aggressive, impudent, and insatiate is the monster of power when once unchained, at both ends of the Capitol bills have been introduced at this session authorizing the Federal judges to send their marshals, or any citizen they may deputize, into municipal corporations to exercise the functions of local assessors and collectors to raise revenues to discharge municipal debts. These communities, created solely by State law, furnished with their own revenue system, their own agencies and methods for determining tax rates and levying the same, are to be raided by irresponsible Federal appointees, who, like the heathen, are to be a law unto themselves, to enter the very homes of the people, fix arbitrary valuations on their estates, and sequestrate for contumaciousness. Why need our republican friends declare by resolution that we are a "nation" when the last vestige of autonomy is disappearing before the strides of the empire?

After having swept, as was supposed, the whole gamut of the politico-extravaganza, our President last fall turned vicegerent, and like Paul, in addition to his multiform burdens, took upon himself the care of all the churches. And "the expectancy and rose of the fair State"—of Maine—[Mr. BLAINE,] with the Protestant Bible in one hand and the symbol of Minerva in the other, cries out: "Death to the papists; vive le free schools."

So now we are to have under Federal auspices a religious free-school crusade into the States, with the gentleman from Maine in the dual character of Peter the Hermit and chief pedagogue, and the President as patron saint. Only think of our blunt warrior President fostering the churches and schools; it is Jupiter taking the form of a swan to be caressed by Leda.

An ex-governor of Missouri has said the necessity of the times is "a President without partyism, an Army without a mission, a Congress without price, and a supreme judiciary without politics." But the splendor of this patriotic rhetoric pales before the radiance of a DEVOUT PRESIDENT AND A PIOUS CONGRESSMAN!

The ministry of the clerical navigator of the world, and the prospects of that announcement recently made by Bishop Haven "in the name of the American people and true Christianity" evoked qualities of godliness and new-born zeal for letters for which Congress should pass resolutions of thanks as a fitting supplement to the amendment of the gentleman from Maine. Doubtless some unusual digression of the ecclesiastical circumnavigator from pulpit politics turned the eye of the President to that long-neglected field of sacred literature which records the conversion of Saul of Tarsus; and he determined to so change his course as to give over at least his persecution of the (whisky) saints, reckoning that the "crooked" ways and trials of this present term are not to be compared to the glory that awaits a third! The old proverb that is the only explanation for this new departure of the republican party in flinging into our already too bitter political strifes the fire-brand of religious bigotry and proscription, the kindlings and ravages of which no human eye can measure.

"WISE MEN MAKE THEIR OWN OPPORTUNITIES"

Mr. Chairman, if ever there were men on this continent who had occasion to oppose and dread priestcraft and hierarchy, it was the men who founded the colonies and made the Federal Constitution. They knew what religious persecution was. Its baleful influences had burnt into their very souls. Yet just one hundred years ago there existed in all the colonies a union of church and state. But those men, steadily adhering to the line of separation between the Federal and State systems of government, in the first amendment to the Constitution only interdicted Congress in the establishment of or interference with the free exercise of religion, leaving the States free to exercise their sovereign right of controlling this and all kindred matters affecting the liberty of self-government. For those men foresaw with wondrous vision that the day the Federal Government assumed the office of a paternal government and undertook to legislate for the humanities, corruption would take the place of virtue and despotism usurp the empire of freedom. Nor can the republican party at all take to themselves any credit for the attempted settlement of this question of church and state for the States. The honor belongs to the States themselves and to the past century. Theirs is the glory. Rob not the dead.

By the voluntary act of the States, beginning with the "Mother of States," in 1785 and 1789, church and state have been divorced a vinculo matrimonii. The only remaining vestiges of it, perhaps, being in the State constitution of New Hampshire, which requires the governor to be not a Catholic but a Protestant, and in that legislative act of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts under which a little Hebrew girl, who, according to the habits of her people and the custom of her religious faith, observed Saturday as a religious day, was recently sentenced to three months' imprisonment in a Boston reformatory because she would not go to school on Saturday; while out on the Pacific coast the idiosyncracy of the age manifests itself in this provision of the Oregon constitution:

Nor shall any money be appropriated for the payment of any religious service in either house of the Legislative Assembly.

This is a species of heterodoxy based, I suppose, on the idea that a fat treasury is of more moment than the lean souls of legislators. And it is noticeable that in every new or amended constitution of the States since the war the independency of church and state is guardedly secured. Why, then, need the Federal Government interfere?

What State proposes to abdicate to the Pope? What State is not intensely Protestant? What intelligent, responsible body of Catholics threatens revolution? What State is not able to take care of its own religious concerns? What State asks Congress to look after its spiritual welfare? From my observation, it would be a hard task to constitute a fit protectorate for religion out of this body of two hundred and ninety-two Levites. The people would not willingly give over the ark to such unregenerate hands.

Mr. Chairman, what has come over the spirit of our republican friends' dreams touching our Catholic brethren? What is there in the past year's history of this sect that now makes it the object of constitutional restraint lest hurt come to our religious liberty? In this very House, in June, 1874, as shown by the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, both the patriotism and philanthropy of the Catholics in America were stoutly defended by republican orators and a republican majority.

When the sundry civil appropriation bill was pending an amendment was proposed "for the Little Sisters of the Poor of Washington City, to liquidate a debt on the building and to complete said building, $25,009."

Mr. Parker, of Missouri, rose on the republican side, and said:

I am no Catholic, and practically I am not much of a Protestant; but, sir, I want to call the attention of this House to one fact, and especially that of my friend from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] who gallantly led one of the divisions of our Army during the late war, and that is, when the noble women of these different orders were upon the battle-fields of our country, gathering up the wounded and the dying and pouring consolation into their souls, moistening their lips with cold water, talking to them of home, mother, and friends, cheering their dying moments by leading their minds to the mercy of that God who was so soon to judge them; when they kneeled before our brave soldiers upon their dying beds, did the gentleman or the loyal people ever stop to inquire what was the religious faith of these people; did they stop to inquire whether they were Catholic or Protestant, Jew or Gentile? When the gentle, white-bonneted nuns were seen carrying consolation to the gallant soldiers of the Republic upon every battle-field where our patriots struggled for the national existence, they were not asked as to their religion. Now, for the American Congress, made up of distinguished men from all parts of the country, wedded to our institutions, devoted to the cause of liberty, after what we have done already here to-day, to refuse to give to this institution what is asked here, must be done upon grounds which we cannot justify. It is too narrow a view to take of it. Patriots and gallant men cannot do this. No citizen of this Republic can undertake to maintain any such position as that.

Mr. Butler, of Massachusetts, who was always warlike in illustration, and kept his war experience, like some now on this floor, in the foreground of every question, rose and said:

I desire to add a single word; I will detain the House but a moment. This question came up again in another form. I carried to New Orleans six thousand men. I had but six hundred Catholics among them. When those men were dying in that inclement climate of fever and of malaria from the swamps, they were taken care of in the hospitals by Sisters of Charity, and the question never was asked, "What is their faith?" The only question asked was, "Are these men sick and dying?" And when that question was answered, the soldier was taken in, and he was treated as well and as carefully as if he had been of their own faith. Now, sir, with that knowledge and with the remembrance which my friend from Missouri [Mr. Parker] has called my attention to how glad our boys used to be to see those white bonnets coming upon the battle-fields and into the hospitals where they nursed the sick and dying, I would cut off my right hand before I would strike down this appropriation in behalf of any religious prejudices against their religion.

My friend from Ohio says nobody but a Catholic can belong to this association. That is true in this sense: nobody will undertake the self-denying vows, that entire devotion to charity, but those who have been driven by stern religious faith; but when they have once taken those vows they go forward to their labors to take care of the sick and dying without question as to their religious faith. I hope and trust we will vote for this appropriation without any division.

And the appropriation carried by a vote of 105 yeas to 43 nays.

But now it is discovered that political capital can be coined out of a hue and cry against these self-sacrificing people, and the whole pack of republican orators and editors is unleashed to hound them down.

And the same purpose is the animating spirit of the present agitation of

THE SCHOOL QUESTION.

Just as the republicans overcome their antipathy to the Catholics in order to take out of the public Treasury $25,000 for an ostensible eleemosynary institution, so again you evince the itching palm. You are like Don Juan's wicked sailors:

> Who grieved for those who perished with the cutter,
> And also for the biscuit, casks, and butter.

You seek to pave the way to clutch the school fund of the States, a fund belonging to the States and the people, and with which the Federal Government should not be empowered to interfere. You attempted this in your educational bill in 1873, and again in your civil-rights bill, but the well-directed courage of a few Spartan patriots checked your vandal march on the citadel of freedom. Now you shift your tactics, and by becoming the unsought and uninvited knights of a cause which is popular with the people of all parties and needs no champion, you think to still further war on the States and cover up the multitude of your party sins.

Not in the history of the Republic has the cause of popular education been so universally fostered as at this day. Scarcely any sky bending over city, hamlet, village, hill, or valley, in all this vast land, but there points to it a spire from the free-school edifice, though humble some may be, yet they pervade.

There could not be elected in any State a Legislature that would dare to divert the general school fund. And the very fact that in the extremity of the republican party it seeks to retain power by appealing to the popular sentiment affecting free schools is itself proof that the sentiment in favor of these schools is all-prevalent and powerful. Then why drag this question into Congress and on to the hustings? If a few overambitious priests and zealous Catholic papers have used intemperate and foolish speech touching this question, is that any cause for the cry "To your tents, O Israel?"

> The man that did once sell the lion's skin
> While the beast lived was killed with hunting him.

Admit (and the democratic party does not deny) that the abstract principles enunciated in the proposed amendment are sound, must everything intrinsically right in theory be ingrafted on the organic law? If so, incorporate temperance and the Decalogue.

By dragging the cause of education, as the republican party is doing, into political partisan strife, they stab and wound it where it would otherwise go unhurt. Just as the cause of religion has always suffered when zealots and bigots have forced it out of its normal relation into subserviency to secular ends, so, by attempting to use free schools as a vehicle to political preferment, you wantonly antagonize it with elements otherwise friendly to its prosperity; and the party or man who would thus prostitute it is its deadliest foe and a public enemy.

Why cannot this and all its correlatives be intrusted to local communities and the public virtue and intelligence?

THE OLD STATESMEN OF VIRGINIA, who were as happy in expression as they were great in thought and spirit, most aptly put this matter in the act of Assembly December 16, 1785:

Truth is great and will prevail if left to herself; she is the proper and sufficient antagonist to error, and has nothing to fear from the conflict, unless by human interposition disarmed of her natural weapons, free argument and debate; errors ceasing to be dangerous when it is permitted freely to contradict them.

To that tribunal I for one appeal. The people want and will have no Cromwells or Praise-God Barebones. They fear neither puritan nor cavalier. And there are a great many good and wise people who think you could as well turn your guns on that pseudo-political gathering at Boston last December, when bishop, clergy, and layman turned the affairs of the house of God into a town meeting for President-making; furnishing a fair specimen of the travesty progress of the day, in which we have nominations by prayers. The next step will be elections by the doxology.

What priest has ever uttered such sin against the liberty of conscience and the teaching of the Master in the Sermon on the Mount as breathes in the following resolutions offered by a "truly loyal" Protestant divine in conference at Chicago?

Resolved, That all government is based upon the religious ideas of those who carry it on, and that the Northern Methodists have acquired by conquest the right to control the religion of the South; that it is just as wrong to allow the Southern Methodists to meet and worship in their ways as it would be to allow Lee and Johnston to call together and drill their armies again. The religion of the North is bound to rule this continent, and it proposes to make a proper application of our Bible to all the Southern States and people. A subjugated people have no more right to apply their own peculiar moral ideas than to use their physical implements of war.

That fellow, provided he does not suffocate, would make a splendid adjutant-general for our Peter the Hermit from Maine. Mr. Chairman, as well get up an O. A. U. against the Methodist Church North for these extravagant utterances of individual fanatics as to organize a crusade against Catholics for pronunciamentos and dogmatisms of isolated parishes and editors.

PUBLIC SENTIMENT.

The remedy for these things rests not in constitutions or statutes.

> There's still on earth a yet auguster thing,
> Veiled though it be, than Parliament or king.

It is American public sentiment—greater than Cæsar, more austere than Cromwell. We all bow before its august majesty. The one thing more essentially grand than all else to be seen and felt this year will, in my judgment, be the remanifestation of this true American sentiment, carrying us back to the paths where our fathers trod.

Instead of recasting the charter they gave us let us cherish it the more, for "out of the old fields cometh all this new corn."

Out of the centennial revival let us hope there will be "born again" patriots of the olden time, who love country more than party, honor more than riches.

So that, with renewed faith in our ability to govern ourselves, justice nowhere denied, truth everywhere defended, the whole American people, from coast to coast and lake to gulf, will join Massachusetts's great orator in his tribute to our Union, as the happy and free empress, mother of States themselves free; unagitated by the passions, unmoved by the dissensions of any of them, she watches the rights and fame of all, and, reposing secure and serene among the mountain summits of her freedom, she holds in one hand the fair olive-branch of peace and in the other the thunderbolt and meteor flag of reluctant and rightful war. There may she sit forever, the stars of Union upon her brow, the rock of independence beneath her feet.

Standard Money and Low Salaries.

SPEECH OF HON. JOHN D. WHITE,

OF KENTUCKY,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 24, 1876,

In Committee of the Whole, on the bill (H. R. No. 2571) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, we have been entertained for many hours by learned gentlemen who have improved this occasion to express their views on whatever subject was uppermost in their minds. This seems to be a parliamentary license, and of course no one will object to the liberty which I now take of expressing my views on several subjects in the same speech.

First, I desire to gather together certain valuable information on the currency question; and then I shall occupy the time of the House with a few remarks upon the bill now under consideration. In a sentence, allow me to state the conclusions to which I have come, namely: Standard money for the people; low salaries for those filling posts of honor; and for officials of the Government certainty of term of service, and such compensation as their talents, skill, or services would command in private life.

THE CURRENCY QUESTION.

The history of our paper currency of to-day is to me a very interesting study. I have collected a few facts on the subject which may serve a useful purpose in the final disposition of this perplexing and all-important problem.

By the legal tender and sinking-fund act of 1862, all the coin received by the Government in payment of duties on imports was set apart as a special fund, to be applied as follows:

First. To the payment in coin of the interest on the bonds and notes of the United States.

Second. To the purchase or payment of 1 per cent. of the entire debt of the United States, to be made within each fiscal year after the 1st day of July, 1862, which is to be set apart as a sinking fund, and the interest of which shall in like manner be applied to the purchase or payment of the public debt as the Secretary of the Treasury shall from time to time direct.

Third. The residue thereof to be paid into the Treasury of the United States.

The plain reader sees in this an honest intention to pay the public debt in coin.

By act of June 30, 1864, the total amount of United States notes can never exceed $450,000,000. By resolution, December 4, 1865, the House of Representatives pledged its co-operative action with the Secretary of the Treasury "to as early a resumption of specie payments as the business interests of the country would permit." The act of April 12, 1866, providing for a reduction of the currency, looked to the final resumption of specie payments.

In order to remove any doubt as to the purpose of the Government to discharge all its obligations to the public creditors, the first act passed by the Forty-first Congress, on March 18, 1869, provided and declared that "the faith of the United States is solemnly pledged to the payment in coin, or its equivalent, of all the obligations of the United States;" and, further, "to make provision, at the earliest practical period, for the redemption of the United States notes in coin."

The President of the United States, in his inaugural address, March 4, 1869, declared:

To protect the national honor, every dollar of Government indebtedness should be paid in gold, unless otherwise expressly stipulated in the contract. Let it be understood that no repudiator of one farthing of our public debt will be trusted in public place, and it will go far toward strengthening a credit which ought to be the best in the world, and will ultimately enable us to replace the debt with bonds bearing less interest than we now pay.

In his second annual message to Congress, December 5, 1870, the President says:

The average value of gold as compared with national currency for the whole of the year 1869 was about 134, and for eleven months of 1870 the same relative value has been about 115. The approach to a specie basis is very gratifying, but the fact cannot be denied that the instability of the value of our currency is prejudicial to our prosperity and tends to keep up prices, to the detriment of trade. The evils of a depreciated and fluctuating currency are so great, that now, when the premium on gold has fallen so much, it would seem that the time has arrived when, by wise and prudent legislation, Congress should look to a policy which would place our currency at par with gold at no distant day.

Again, in his third annual message, December 4, 1871, he says:

Continued fluctuations in the value of gold, as compared with the national currency, has a most damaging effect upon the increase and development of the country in keeping up prices of all articles necessary in every-day life. It fosters a spirit of gambling prejudicial alike to national morals and national finances. If the question can be met as to how to give a fixed value to our currency, that value constantly and uniformly approaching par with specie, a very desirable object will be gained.

Again, in his second inaugural address, March 4, 1873, he says:

My efforts in the future will be directed to the restoration of good feeling between the different sections of our common country, to the restoration of our currency to a fixed value as compared with the world's standard of value—gold—and, if possible, to a par with it.

In a letter to one Mr. Cowdrey, written October 6, 1873, the President seems to have anticipated the speech of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HEWITT.] He says:

The panic has brought greenbacks about to a par with silver. I wonder that silver is not already coming into the market to supply the deficiency in the circulating medium. When it does come—and I predict that it will soon—we will have made a rapid stride toward specie payments. Currency will never go below specie after that.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if the argument of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] be sound, how is it, I ask, that silver does not flow from the coffers and vaults into circulation? He says in his speech of March 17, 1876:

To substitute the silver for the paper is therefore to substitute a coin of less purchasing power for the fractional currency. The resumption of specie payments means that one dollar in currency shall purchase one dollar in gold. The existing paper is therefore nearer to specie payments than the proposed silver coin. The substitution is therefore a step backward from and not a step forward to specie payments, and is therefore in direct violation of that clause of the New York democratic platform on which every democratic member from that State holds his seat on this floor, to wit: "Steady steps toward specie payments, no step backward."

I think, Mr. Chairman, that this statement will strike the country as the vision of a theorist rather than as a truth worthy of acceptance by the Government and the people. Why, sir, he boldly asserts that the substitution of silver coin (that is, specie) for the fractional paper currency (that is, a promise to pay specie) is no step toward specie payments. But, on the contrary, he says, it is a step backward; and not only so, but a step "which will tend to rob the laboring classes of a portion of the just compensation of their toil."

I desire to ask this scientific gentleman, who was elected without "any contributions of money" or without the demoralizing influence of "free liquor," (he failed to tell us how many votes, if any, he obtained by denouncing the "free-nigger Government,") whether he has safe reason to believe that "the honest and trusting souls" which have put their faith in him indorse the anti-silver doctrine which he labored so hard to prove to be for the best interests of the laboring classes?

My district is an agricultural one, and I represent as literally perhaps as does any other member the laboring classes, and I do not believe my people will subscribe to his doctrine. The producers and consumers are alike benefited by good money, and suffer alike under a depreciated currency. My people want more money; but they expect to get it in the legitimate way. They prefer greenbacks to wildcat money. But they are not worshipers of the "R. B.," rag baby. They long to return to gold and silver. Sir, the people know full well that paper currency is not money, but merely a promise to pay money; and when they shall have silver again they will feel that the promise is fulfilled, to the extent, at least, of the intrinsic value of the silver received.

The colloquy between the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] is instructive on this point:

Mr. HOAR. The gentleman retains the floor, as I understand, for the purpose of answering a question which I wish to put. There is one respect in which I do not exactly understand his position. If you stamp something upon a piece of paper that has no value and compel the laboring-man to take it, I do not understand how you thereby do him a greater benefit than when you stamp precisely the same thing on a piece of silver, which has great value, and compel him to take it. How is it that the latter cheats the laboring-man, while the former does not?

Mr. KELLEY. I speak, sir, from facts rather than theories. I tell you that to-day you can buy more gold with a greenback than with the same nominal amount in silver.

Mr. HOAR. Will the gentleman allow me to put my question in another form? Suppose you take this piece of paper made by the Government—paper costing comparatively nothing—and tie this piece of silver to it or under it, would it be worth more or less to the poor man whom the gentleman says we are robbing; and if worth more, would it not continue to be worth just as much if you took away the paper and left the stamped silver?

Now, if the object of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] was to prove that the increased supply of silver, the demand remaining the same, cheapened its value, we will all agree to that. Is this not equally true of wheat, iron, gold, and diamonds?

The supply of gold is great; the demand is greater; hence its rise in value. The supply of silver is immense. Our silver mines are producing almost unlimited amounts of this beautiful metal. But the demand for it grows continually less; hence its diminution in value.

Is silver worthless for coin because it will not bring so much per pound in the market as it did some years ago? Is it not the same metal it was then? Has it not the same white, shining luster, the same clear and silvery ring, the same specific gravity? Does it tarnish more easily now that it is discovered in large quantities, or will it be more easily counterfeited than in the days of the mysterious Swift, of Swift-mine notoriety? The old relations between gold and silver may be somewhat changed; but can we not supply in quantity to the latter what it lacks in quality?

Article 1, section 8 of the Constitution declares that Congress shall have power—

To coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin.

Just now we seem to have too much silver. Why? The gentleman from Pennsylvania answers this question. He says:

It is due not only to the enormous production of the great Bonanza mines, nor to the recent disclosure of the fact that the Uncompahgre range in southern or middle Colorado is likely to yield larger amounts of silver than any of the mines of Nevada, for beyond and more potent than these causes has been the demonetization of silver by Germany, Holland, Sweden, Denmark, and Japan, and the closing of the mints of the Latin monetary union against the coinage of silver.

It occurs to me that gentlemen have argued on this floor that we should have a currency unlike any other in the world, and therefore plead for greenbacks and inflation. Since silver is demonetized by so many countries and our Bonanza mines are so numerous, does it not strike every one as being a favorable opportunity for the United States Government to adopt a currency that will have no temptation to go abroad, and at the same time will represent labor and wealth, serve as the basis of a medium of exchange, (where not the medium itself,) and one that will have intrinsic value as literal and real as that of wheat, iron, or gold? "It is an ill wind that blows nobody good."

But I desire to quote further on the subject of specie resumption. I am seeking after knowledge rather than attempting to teach. I find in the President's fifth annual message, December 1, 1873, this terse expression:

We can never have permanent prosperity until a specie basis is reached.

In the same message he says:

The exact medium is specie, the recognized medium of exchange the world over. That obtained, we shall have a currency of an exact degree of elasticity. If there be too much of it for the legitimate purposes of trade and commerce it will flow out of the country; if too little, the reverse will result. To hold what we have and to appreciate our currency to that standard is the problem deserving of the most serious consideration of Congress.

In his sixth annual message, December 7, 1874, he says:

Gold and silver are now the recognized medium of exchange the civilized world over, and to this we should return with the least practicable delay.

Accompanying this message, the Secretary of the Treasury, in his report, says:

Credit, which necessarily enters largely into commercial transactions, can only be steady and secure when it has for its foundation a stable currency. The quality of stability in money attaches only to coin, which, by common consent of mankind, is the medium of exchange, and to a paper currency representative of coin, because convertible into it at the will of the holder.

* * * * * * *

That which is of the highest importance is the adoption of the definite policy of resumption.

* * * * * * *

The enactment of a law having for its purpose the substitution of a sound and stable medium of exchange for an irredeemable paper currency will tend to restore confidence, and thus cause a revival of industries and general business.

REVIEW OF NATIONAL PLEDGES.

A very brief review of our pledges must serve to demonstrate that we cannot avoid, in any honorable way, final resumption in gold and silver coin. In 1868 the Supreme Court of the United States declares of legal-tenders that—

These notes are obligations of the United States. Their name imports obligation. Every one of them expresses upon its face an engagement of the nation to pay the bearer a certain sum. The dollar note is an engagement to pay a dollar, and the dollar intended is the coin dollar of the United States—a certain quantity in weight and fineness of gold or silver, authenticated as such by the stamp of the Government.

On the 18th day of March, 1869, Congress declared by public act that—

The United States solemnly pledges its faith to make provision at the earliest practicable period for the redemption of the United States notes in coin.

On the 21st day of February, 1872, the labor-reform party, representing twelve States, resolved—

That the national debt should be paid in good faith.

On May 1, 1872, the liberal republicans in convention in Cincinnati, Ohio, resolved—

That the public credit must be sacredly maintained, and we denounce repudiation in every form and guise. A speedy return to specie payments is demanded alike by the highest considerations of commercial morality and honest government.

Mr. Greeley, in his letter accepting the presidential nomination, after he had learned how the work of the liberal-republican convention "was received in all parts of our great country," declares, as if to remove any suspicions that might attach to his anticipated supporters from the lost cause, "that the public faith must at all hazards be maintained and the national credit preserved."

The national democratic convention assembled in Baltimore on July 9, 1872, and, after re-adopting the principles already adopted at Cincinnati, renominated this same Mr. Greeley as its candidate for the Presidency. The democratic party is not pledged to repudiation. But the country does not seem to realize the fact. How can it, when such inflationists as my colleague from the Ashland district, who almost fills the place of the distinguished Henry Clay, is elected to Congress on a repudiation platform? Yet we remember how in times gone by the democratic leaders were wont to clamor for hard money. And is this democratic House to be decoyed into the supporting of a greenback theory which must work a great injury to the credit of the nation and postpone the revival of industries and a restoration of confidence?

The regular republican convention assembled in Philadelphia June 5, 1872, declared:

We denounce the repudiation of the public debt in any form or disguise as a national crime; we witness with pride the reduction of the principal of the debt and of the rates of interest upon the balance, and confidently expect that our excellent national currency will be perfected by a speedy resumption of specie payments.

The Secretary of the Treasury is hopeful and earnest in the work of resumption; and the President renews his oft-repeated recommendations for the benefit of each Congress.

In accordance with the suggestions of the President, the pledges of all political parties, the solemnly plighted faith of the United States, and the sincere desire of the people, an act was passed January 14, 1875, which pledged the faith of the Government to resumption on and after January 1, 1879.

And now, Mr. Chairman, after we have gone thus far, gentlemen are to be found on this floor who are bold enough to ask us to violate these pledges, and to advocate that which will destroy the public credit and end ultimately in repudiation and our national dishonor. I for one can encourage no such doctrine. I shall stand by the honest policy to which the nation is pledged. I believe it to be our solemn and unavoidable duty to supply any additional legislation which may be necessary to bring about specie payments by January 1, 1879.

The Secretary of the Treasury asks for it. The President concurs in his recommendation, and adds that—

It will be a source of great gratification to me to be able to approve any measure of Congress looking effectively toward securing resumption.

The question now is, what shall we do? What can this Congress do to hasten the day of renewed confidence, revival of business, and renewed prosperity? We cannot go backward. The bridges are burned and it is easier to go forward. It is manlier to go forward. Every consideration of honesty and commercial morality demands that we advance in the direction of specie payments. Shall we hesitate and delay longer or shall we act at once and thus put to rest the doubts of an anxious and waiting nation? Let us perform our duty like men. The country will honor us for it, and our future prosperity will satisfy coming generations of the wisdom of our action.

THE REDUCTION OF SALARIES.

Mr. Chairman, I now desire to offer a few remarks on the bill (H. R. No. 2571) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes. The reduction of high salaries meets my hearty approbation and will receive my cheerful support. I hope the committee are a unit and in earnest, and will convince the country of their sincerity by a general reduction of the disproportionate salaries received by Senators and Members of Congress before making reductions elsewhere. Charity begins at home, and economy and reform must begin with the representatives of the people. But I have seen enough in my brief public service to convince me that a bill to increase salaries would meet with much less opposition here than one to reduce salaries, which any man must see are not on a level with salaries paid in private life and by private corporations. Sir, the people demand a more rigid economy; and if we cannot or will not conduct their business on business principles, why then we must give place to those who can.

I am well aware that the surroundings here in this city are not favorable to any proposed reduction of salaries. When salaries of Senators and Members and officials are reduced, the owners of property and proprietors of hotels, rum-shops, gambling-hells, and other places of amusement are losers as well as those affected directly. There is no influence here that is lent to a reduction of salaries. On the contrary, every influence is brought to bear on Congressmen here to induce them to increase the salary of somebody or everybody holding office. There is but one guiding star for us, and that is a strict adherence to our own convictions of right and a carrying out of what we know to be the will of the people.

Now, this democratic House proposes to make certain reductions. The republican members should not throw any obstructions in the way of reform or retrenchment. It would be a grave error to make such an attempt. All that we can ask of the committee is consistency: a reduction which will strike all alike. We must show by our votes that we are for any and every reformatory measure, come from whatever source it may.

It is true that social life in Washington is an expensive luxury. It is becoming more and more expensive every year. As salaries increase the desires to be gratified are proportionately increased. I do not believe that the people of this country would submit to the burdentome tariff and revenue laws now in force if they realized how disinserested we are in protecting the Treasury, if they could see the extravagance of vanity and the prevalence of selfish motives that obtain in this city of high life and social corruption. Nothing is done without a selfish end in view. Nothing is truly social; all is vanity and selfishness. No one regards true economy; everybody studies filching; yet the people who are taxed for the support of these parasites and metropolitan lazzaroni have only "their homely joys and destiny obscure."

President John Adams expressed a public sentiment when he said:

But let us take warning and give it to our children. Whenever vanity and gayety, a love of pomp and dress, furniture, equipage, buildings, great company, expensive diversions, and elegant entertainments get the better of the principles and judgments of men or women, there is no knowing where they will stop, nor into what evils, natural, moral or political, they will lead us.

The people did not think favorably of the increase of salary from $8 per day to $3,000 per annum. The increase from $3,000 to $5,000 per annum was still less pleasing. It was submitted to as any other war measure. And when salaries were increased a third time, and the members of Congress the chief beneficiaries, the whole country arose as one man and said, "I am amazed at and disgusted with the avariciousness of Congress. What? Another increase of salary from $5,000 to $7,500; our franking privilege cut off and its value placed to the credit of our honorable (?) Congressmen?" O, what a spectacle was there, my countrymen! "Then I, and you, and all of us fell down," while bloody treason sorely troubled us. But the war is over now; greenbacks, we are told, are better than silver coin, and there is no longer any good reason why we should not return to the standard of salaries paid before the war.

REPLY TO MR. RANDALL.

In view of the attempt to silence me, made some days since by a gentleman from Pennsylvania, I hope the House will indulge me in a few words of personal defense. The gentleman [Mr. RANDALL] to whom I refer had used harsh language toward this side, when, with his consent, I asked him a question which I thought involved a principle of consistency. For the information of those who were then absent I quote a part of the RECORD. Mr. RANDALL said:

Gentlemen on the other side preach economy, but when we propose to practice it they throw every possible obstacle in our way. That is their attitude to-day toward all our appropriation bills. They tell the people in one breath that they want economy, and then they condemn and sneer at every man who undertakes to enforce economy in its practical effects. I am glad to say that to this remark there are some honorable exceptions, for I should be derelict in my duty if I did not state that members of the Committee on Appropriations from the other side of the House have in the main and almost entirely co-operated with members of the committee on this side in these very reductions.

Mr. WHITE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. RANDALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. WHITE. There are two questions I would like to ask. First, did I understand the gentleman to say that he realized the fact that the country condemned his vote on the "back-salary grab?"

Mr. RANDALL. Well, now, it is none of your business what the country realized or what I realized. I have made my statement in that connection.

Mr. WHITE. I want to ask the gentleman another question: Does he not think the country would have more belief in his sincerity in regard to this matter if that money were now refunded?

Mr. RANDALL. That is none of your business, sir.

Mr. WHITE. The country will judge of the matter.

Mr. RANDALL. My people have over and over again approved me in this place, and when I shall do aught here except what becomes a Representative they will take care to consign me back. I took that salary; the law gave it to me; my people have approved of me since; and it does not lie in the power of any miserable man here to talk about my conscience.

This effort on the part of a gentleman of recognized ability to crush a young member was as unkind as his outburst of scornful indignation was unwarranted. If the gentleman meant to insinuate that I was "miserable" because I feared the reduction of my salary, he unfortunately selected the wrong subject upon whom to vent his spleen.

I think that I could furnish ample proof, if it were necessary, to show that I am in favor of a large reduction in the expenses of the Government. Not a reckless cutting down for party purposes, but a systematic and practicable reduction in accordance with the principles which regulate business men in the interest of true economy and genuine reform. On January 13, 1876, I had the honor of introducing a bill which, imperfect as it was, indicated a remedy for our business distress, and which, if adopted, would prove an important move in the direction of specie payments. That bill proposed a reduction of 20 per cent. of the salaries received by the President, Senators, Members, and all officials receiving more than $1,500 a year.

If that bill was "excellent and its object admirable," as one gentleman sneeringly remarked it was, why were there only twenty-five persons in this House willing to support the bill? No, sir; this House is not for any reduction which strikes the salaries of its own members. Every day this fact is becoming more clearly evident. Neither the members on that side nor on this show a willingness to come down to the economical basis consistent with republican simplicity and our duty in the exigency of hard times.

But there are members on this floor who are sincerely in favor of retrenchment by reducing salaries, cutting off luxuries and the means of extravagance. Without boasting, I can say that I am one of that number, and am so from a solemn conviction of duty. And in spite of the taunts and jeers which may come from those who have never known the slow process of earning money by hard labor, who have no higher conception of Government than that of a charitable institution for extorting taxes from plain country people to be lavishly distributed among city idlers and those who through political influence suck the public "pap," I shall cheerfully vote for every measure which promises to reduce taxes, improve our credit, and lead us to specie resumption.

With all kindness toward the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I beg to quote a few passages from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD which I hope will be harmonized and interpreted for the information of the common people, one of whom I am.

In the House on February 24, 1873, the appropriation bill known to the country as the salary-grab steal being under consideration, Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania, said:

Mr. Chairman, I do not think there is any occasion for an exhibition of excessive virtue on this question; nor is there any good cause for a flutter. It may not be amiss for me to recall at this time a little experience I have had in this connection. I was here in 1865-'66, and upon a call of the yeas and nays I was one of three men on this floor who voted to increase the congressional salary from $3,000 to $5,000 a year. I did so for the reason (which I told my people at home) that I thought I was worth the increased sum; that I knew I spent more.

* * * * * * *

I am in favor of the increase now proposed. One of my reasons is that if you will put members of Congress beyond temptation by giving them an adequate salary you will pass fewer subsidy bills. I believe we earn the $7,500 for which I propose to vote; if I did not so believe I would not vote for it. * * * Now, Mr. Chairman, on that particular principle I believe I am right; I believe I earn that money; and if my constituents are not willing to pay me what I earn they had better find some other Representative.

And again, March 1, 1873, on this same subject of salary steal, he says:

Upon that question I have uttered no doubtful sound and have made no doubtful record in this House. I have declared to the country and to my constituents that I believed I have earned $7,500 a year since I have been in this Congress, and that I could not live here for less with my family with any sort of decency.

Where was this gentleman when the vote was taken to repeal the infamous salary-grab, with its "retroactive increase steal?" Did he not then know the wish of the people? He had had seven months for reflection and quiet meditation, and yet when a vote was taken "to carry out the decision of the people upon this subject and utterly wipe out all the effects, consequences, and benefits" that had been derived by members of Congress, this virtuous and conscientiously sensitive headlight of the democratic party, who is leading this reform movement, took great care to cast his vote in such a manner as to let the ill-gotten gain remain in his pocket.

Why did he not repent of his sin and return the money like other gentlemen? O, no; the democrats were in the minority then on this floor, and of course were, as they contended, not responsible for anything. Their position was like unto that of a certain Jew merchant. He was making a sale of clothing to a farmer. His customer was reluctant and indifferent, and this Jew was offering inducements to effect a sale. Finally he said: "Mein freund, I tells you de truth; I vill sell you dese goots für dwenty tollars, und dat ish 10 per cent. pelow cost." The customer declared that he did not desire to purchase anything below cost. He wished to allow the merchant a moderate profit. The Jew replied, "Vell, I tells you how it vas; dese goots pelongs to a rich old uncle of mein, und I ish drying to preak him up." Are we to understand that this was the attitude of the late democratic minority?

Let us compare the votes both on the passage and the repeal of the salary-grab act.

On the passage of the salary-grab act in the House the vote stood—yeas: 51 democrats, 52 republicans; nays: 33 democrats, 51 republicans; not voting: 24 democrats, 29 republicans. In the Senate on the passage of the bill the vote stood—yeas: 12 democrats, 24 republicans; nays: 5 democrats, 22 republicans; not voting: 2 democrats, 8 republicans.

On the repeal of the salary-grab act the vote stood in the House—yeas: 75 democrats, 150 republicans; nays: 11 democrats, 14 republicans; not voting: 11 democrats, 25 republicans. In the Senate the vote on repeal stood—yeas: 10 democrats, 40 republicans; nays: 4 democrats, 4 republicans; not voting: 7 democrats, 7 republicans.

I call this a better (rather a worse) grab showing for the democrats than for the republicans, especially when we consider the large republican majority then in Congress. And yet the republican party was denounced for passing that act; nor have I any knowledge of but one distinguished democrat who ever sought to claim any of the honor of that act except the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] late vice-president of the so-called Confederate States of America. On the discussion of the repeal of the salary-grab he said:

I was utterly astonished the other day when some gentleman undertook to speak of this question as a party question. In my opinion neither party is responsible for the measure of the increase of salary at the last session. I believe that the democracy, in the proportion of votes, according to the analysis I have seen, are as much responsible for it as the republicans.

There was at least one entire delegation that took the increased salary grab and kept it; and the wrath of the people of that State—Kentucky—waxed hot.

Some idea of the feeling of indignation that was felt throughout Kentucky on account of the passage of the "retroactive increase salary-grab act" may be gathered from the following resolution, adopted by the senate of that State by a vote of 21 to 9, to wit:

Resolved, That the conduct of the members of Congress who voted for and sanctioned the passage of said act is reprehensible in the highest degree, and meets with the unqualified disapproval and condemnation of this General Assembly, and should be rebuked by every patriot in the land, irrespective of party.

I am sorry to say that after careful investigation I have been unable to discover where any one of that democratic delegation, from Adams and Beck down through the list, failed to take or ever returned to the Treasury any part of the salary grab. But Kentucky is a democratic State, always for honest reform and rigid economy. See how sincerely and honestly a granger Legislature of that State elected a little while ago the inconsistent reformer, Hon. J. B. Beck, to the United States Senate. Only a democratic State can survive such fitful backing and filling.

But, by way of parenthesis, right here allow me to remind gentlemen of a fact which perhaps has not been discovered to the country by the patriotic course of unbroken delegations of members from that State which I have the honor in part here to represent. It is this: that Kentucky never rebelled, never seceded; that for every one who stole away to join the armies of a wicked rebellion there were two brave men who cheerfully marched under the flag of their country to die if need be for the cause of the Union. And I predict that the day is not far distant when the honest Whigs and Union-loving people of my State will remand to private life their party leaders who do too much for party capital and too little for the development and best interests of the country. It is something of this same kind of purity and virtue which seems in these latter days to control the action of the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania who has charge of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

How is it that he can live on a forty-five hundred dollar salary now when he could not live on less than $7,500 in 1873? He said he could not live in "any sort of decency" for less than $7,500 then.

Can a Congressman live $3,000 a year cheaper now than he could in 1873? Or has the chairman of this committee concluded to live in a sort of indecency for the sake of a little party clap-trap for the coming presidential election? Like the frog, he "goes it with a jerk."

Of all the funny things that live
In woodland, marsh, or bog,
That creep the ground, or fly the air,
The funniest is the frog.
The frog—the scientifickest
Of nature's handiwork—
The frog, that neither walks nor runs,
But goes it with a jerk.

Gentlemen should not fall into the error of supposing that because two events are contemporaneous the one must necessarily be the cause and the other the effect. Nor can the people be made to believe such nonsense. The idea that the American people intended to show their approval of the democratic doctrines by giving to the opposition the control of this House is a vain hallucination entertained by the credulous politician, and can be imposed upon the ignorant voter only.

The effort which the democratic side of this House is making to prove to the country that they alone are honest and to them should be intrusted the control of this Government is in very bad taste. The fact that aiders and abettors of a gigantic and wicked rebellion should sit on committees to investigate ante bellum democrats is a singular one. I refer particularly to the Belknap affair.

Knowing as I did of a charge of corruption made against Hon. Green Adams, now Chief Clerk of this House, while he was Sixth Auditor of the Treasury, for appropriating several thousands of dollars to his own use which should have been paid into the Treasury, since the money was the proceeds of the sales of waste-paper which belonged to the Government—I say that being cognizant of these facts, it struck me as a little bit amusing that this man Green Adams should be the officer of this pure democratic House to carry articles of impeachment for high crimes and misdemeanors from here over to the Senate. He was a republican then, but you took him from us and reward him with a high office.

God grant that the democratic party may continue to bid for our bad men, and by and by the sober, honest, and true reformers of that party will abandon such corrupt associations. God grant that we may purify the republican party, and prove ourselves worthy of the association and earnest support of the sober, the honest, the law-abiding, and true men of this our common country.

Credit mobiliers, Sanborn contracts, and Pendleton contracts; the sale of cadetships, and post-traderships, and salary-grabs, (for services never rendered,) are all disgraceful things, which bring the blush of shame to the face of every believer in strict economy and honest government.

But the thinking people of this vast country will not fail to take the exact measure of these insincere reformers who will not allow any "miserable man" to talk about their consciences. Methinks I hear the intelligent plain people saying: "Thou blind Pharisee, cleanse first that which is within the cup and platter, that the outside of them may be clean also." The role which you assume you cannot play. The people are peeping behind the scene and laughing at the guise which is intended to conceal your true inwardness. As in New Hampshire so you shall hear all over this broad land: "Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye are like unto whited sepulchres, which indeed appear beautiful outward, but are within full of dead men's bones and all uncleanness."

In my humble opinion the "tidal wave" which swept over the country in 1874, and which swept over the hills of Southeastern Kentucky in a contrary direction, was a wave of righteous indignation, evidently intended to kill off certain would-be leaders with a view to supplying their places, in the early future, with better men. The "tidal wave" was merely the execution of a traditionary threat beautifully expressed by the poet thus:

And will ye muzzle the free-born—
The man—the owner of the sod,
Who "gives the grazing ox his meat,"
And you—his servants here—your seat?
* * * * * *
Hear us, or from us ye will hear!
Beware! a desperate game ye play!
The men that thicken in your rear,
Kings though ye be—may not be scorned,
Look to your move! your stake! Ye're warned.

The opposition majority here to-day is evidence of the frown of an insulted people, not of an intended elevation to power of the heterogeneous and discordant elements improperly called the democratic party.

The principles of the republican party are as dear to the American heart to-day as they were at the hour of the assassination of President Lincoln; and he is a blind observer of passing events who fails to discriminate between a growth and a transition; a sloughing off and a transmigration; an internal purification, and a public approval of a distrusted opposition which is to so large a degree composed of those who are anxious for repudiation. The republican party is still the party of reform and progress. Its sun is not setting. It is gaining new strength, and retains the confidence of an intelligent people.

Truth crushed to earth shall rise again:
The eternal years of God are hers;
But Error, wounded, writhes with pain,
And dies among his worshipers.

REDUCE ALL SALARIES ALIKE.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of reducing salaries. I believe that Senators and Congressmen and clerks, with very few exceptions, are overpaid. Of all these public servants the large majority of them are getting more pay for less work than their talent and skill would command in private life; and that too at a time when thousands are begging for employment at low rates of wages.

Sir, if we preach economy we must practice economy. If the people are required to cut off luxuries and are taxed till they have not the means to gratify their desires, then we, too, must limit our expenditures, cease to be extravagant, and apply the revenues collected to the payment of principal and interest of the public debt. Such a course will encourage our depressed and tax-ridden people. Wise statesmanship demands it of us.

Mr. Chairman, after we have reduced our own salaries to the point that will cover our actual losses and necessary expenses without extravagance, then, sir, we can with reason apply the same principle to the subordinates in the several Departments.

As to how much shall be taken from the salary of each clerk, assistant, or chief in these Departments, that is a question for after consideration. In my own opinion that matter should be left to the head of each Department. There can be no reasonable doubt that the system of first, second, third, and fourth class clerks is all wrong. Especially is this true when promotion from one class to another depends entirely upon political influence. And it is equally true that few if any of those classes of clerks could earn one-half of their present salaries in any of the vocations of private life, and that lady clerks should receive as a rule but $900 a year for doing similar work to that for which gentlemen receive $1,200, $1,400, $1,600, and $1,800, respectively, is an unjust discrimination and is an outrage and disgrace to the nation.

This is the bloodiest shame;
The vilest stroke;
The wildest savagery,
That ever wall-eyed wrath,
Or staring rage,
Presented to the tears of soft remorse.

All clerks below chiefs and assistants should be appointed for life or during good behavior, and the whole subject of compensation for skill and talent should be left to the heads of the Departments; and they should pay salaries commensurate with those received for similar work performed in private life. Ladies and gentlemen of talent and skill should receive such pay as experts alone can command. Like work, like salaries; business on business principles; have no favored classes; and put the pay of Senators and Members just high enough to defray all lawful and necessary expenses, and at the same time low enough to offer no mercenary temptation to any one. If we will do these things we shall have done the will of the people. The fast and riotous way of living indulged in here by overpaid officials, whose extravagance in outward show is aped by the poorest paid subordinate is not approved of by the plain people who are the bone and sinew and life of the nation.

As I have said before, so say I again, that I shall give my support to all measures of practicable retrenchment and true reform, for these are the steps which will bring us to specie resumption. Then we shall have honest dealing with honest money; and we shall prosper, because then confidence and enterprise will be restored. And the money that we save shall go to the honest payment of the public debt, pensioning the widows and orphans of soldiers, equalization of bounties, to the improvement of rivers, and development of the country, and to defraying the necessary expenses of the Government. To arrive at specie payments and the economical administration of the Government, and to encourage the sound business interests of the country are the great questions deserving our most careful consideration.

Subsidiary Silver Coin.

SPEECH OF HON. GEORGE W. CATE,

OF WISCONSIN,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 31, 1876,

On the bill (H. R. No. 2450) to provide for a deficiency in the Printing and Engraving Bureau of the Treasury Department and for the issue of silver coin of the United States in place of fractional currency.

Mr. CATE. Mr. Speaker, this bill is a very important one, affecting the people more intimately than any other measure before Congress at this session. The poorer class, that class which measures its daily use of money with the fractional currency, will feel beneficially or otherwise the influence of this measure more keenly perhaps than those the magnitude of whose business enables them to handle large sums of money. But it is important to all classes, the rich as well as poor, that the volume of fractional or small-change currency be large and beyond the reach of those influences that so often derange and demoralize the currency common to the world because it is indispensable in the transactions of daily life. There is nothing to take its place; no substitute known to the laws of trade has been found to take the place of fractional currency. If there is a scarcity, or none at all, the inconvenience must be submitted to until a supply can be had. Not so with the money of the country. If there is a scarcity of that, its place is measurably supplied with checks, drafts, notes, and bills of exchange, so that business goes along and does not experience the inconvenience that is felt in every shop throughout the land when there is a dearth of small change. Therefore, in proposing measures by which the fractional currency is to be supplied, the important elements stability and permanency must not be lost sight of.

This bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to issue silver coins of the United States in the redemption of the fractional currency until the whole volume of fractional currency shall be so redeemed, and its supporters claim that it is a first step toward an early resumption of specie payment. I do not so regard it. I cannot see that it has any such relation to the great question of the resumption of specie payment. No gentleman has explained how the substitution of silver for our fractional currency has any relation or bearing on that question. Suppose forty or fifty million dollars in paper fractional currency is burned up, and the like amount of halves, quarters, and dimes of silver goes into circulation in its place, would it have any influence on the value of the paper money of the country? Of course not the slightest; and no man can demonstrate that it would have any tendency to hasten the day desired by everybody when gold and legal-tenders shall have the same purchasing power. We are told that the Secretary has been buying silver and coining it until he has in his vaults twelve to fifteen million dollars in silver coin, which he would use in complying with the provisions of this bill.

Now I have no objection to putting this coin in circulation at once; let the Secretary pay it out in discharge of any obligations against the United States, and allow it to circulate along with and side by side with the paper fractional currency; that will be a cheap and expeditious way of testing its staying qualities. If it remains in circulation, we may still further pursue the experiment; but if I apprehend it, it will speedily disappear. We shall have lost nothing in the simple act of putting the silver in circulation. But if it is a step toward an early resumption of specie payment, have the people demanded that? Is it not a fact that from all over this land there has come up to us a demand for the repeal of the resumption act, an unconditional repeal? so that, viewed in the light of being a step toward specie payment, I am certain this measure will not be approved of. The fact is the people are satisfied with the currency we now have; if they can have enough of it to answer the demands of business, they will be content.

Two principal objections to the passage of this bill present themselves: First, that you cannot float a currency of silver at this time in this country, not until gold and silver, the acknowledged standard currency of the world, stand on a level here. So long as silver is anywhere a legal tender in payment of coin debts, so long will there be a demand for it that will destroy the stability and uniformity of the volume of any silver currency we may attempt to establish. When gold and silver shall be upon a common level we shall be able to maintain a currency of silver coins, but until that time shall arrive it cannot be done. While with us it is at so large a discount and at par with gold elsewhere, will it not be gathered up and sent away? It is folly to suppose that it will not be exported if it is worth more abroad than it is worth here. By what means shall we prevent its exportation? Why, everybody knows we cannot prevent that, however much we may desire to.

The Secretary has been coining and keeping coins a long time, until millions have been accumulated, and its depreciation has caused a loss of several hundred thousands of dollars, all of which might have been saved by paying it out in discharge of any demands against the Government where gold was not required, and during all the time this silver has been accumulating and shrinking in value as compared with gold the Secretary might have put that silver in circulation. Now, why did he not do so? The answer is, because he knew that it would be gathered up and shipped out of the country, because it is worth more elsewhere than it is worth here. He acknowledged the force of arguments which the friends of this bill ignore but do not attempt to controvert; they do not attempt to tell us why the silver put in circulation will not be gathered up and sent away if there is a profit in so doing.

Why did England, having a large sum of money to pay, decide to pay it in silver when she had not the silver with which to make the payment instead of using her own gold or the Bank of England notes for that purpose? The answer is so plain that he who runs may read: because it was cheaper, because it would take less of her gold to pay the debt by first turning it into American silver, and applying that in discharge of the debt, than by using her gold directly to that purpose. One hundred dollars in British gold will buy $120 of our silver, not intending to be exact, but approximately that. Now, with that margin existing between gold and silver, does it need argument to show that our silver coins will "hie away" across the water as fast as we turn them out of our vaults? The fact that on a recent occasion England appeared on the Pacific coast a competitor of Mr. Bristow shows that this matter is well understood; and the same practice will be resorted to whenever an honest penny can be made by it.

But to revert again to the action of the Secretary in not putting silver in circulation as required by law. Mr. HEWITT, of New York, stated that the law left it discretionary with the Secretary whether he would issue the silver or not. I do not so understand the law. It not only authorizes but requires him to put in circulation small coins in the redemption of an equal amount of the paper fractional currency in circulation, and for the purpose of procuring the silver necessary to carry out the provisions of the act he is authorized to use any surplus revenues of the Government not otherwise appropriated, and to sell for the same purpose 5 per cent. Government bonds. Under this law, there being of course no surplus revenues at the disposal of the Secretary, he, as the law contemplated he would do, proceeded to issue 5 per cent. bonds, and sell the same and invest the proceeds in silver for coinage.

Now, the objectionable feature of this law, and in regard to which the Secretary should have exercised a discretion, if he had any at all, in favor of the people, is the provision allowing the issue of bonds, and there is no possible doubt but he is just as much obliged, under this law, to issue the coins as to issue the bonds and buy the silver. If he had refused to buy this silver and issue bonds for it, he would have been entitled to the thanks of the country. But why he felt bound to buy silver on a falling market and then decline to issue it until we have lost by depreciation more than a million dollars is to me inexplicable. He had the like authority in both cases and the like discretion. Why, then, does he require legislation still further directing him to issue this silver coin? I answer, because, knowing the consequences, he will not take the responsibility without a further act of Congress; because, in the words of the Nation, he knows "the subsidiary silver coin which it is proposed to issue here will leave the country as certain as water will flow down hill."

Another reason why he did not issue the silver was that he is only allowed to float 20 per cent. more coin certificates than he has gold and silver on hand; therefore, if he pays out the twelve to fifteen million silver now in the vaults, will he not be compelled to redeem the gold certificates outstanding to the amount of $18,000,000; the last statement showing but $28,000,000 in coin all told, and $33,000,000 coin certificates outstanding. Now, if this is so, and the law is complied with, these coin certificates must be redeemed if the silver is put in circulation, and the Secretary has not the gold to do it with. With these facts staring him in the face, is there wonder that so able a man should hesitate to take the responsibility and should prefer to throw it upon this Congress? It seems to me that the hesitation of a man who possesses in so eminent degree the confidence of the country and so much more likely to form correct conclusions in regard to this question should lead this House to hesitate before again requiring him to do that which he has declined to do under a law as obligatory upon him as this measure will be if it shall become a law. The great error was in not refusing to execute the act at all.

Silver is being continually taken from our shores; only a day or two ago the Java steamship took a large amount, and it must continue to be so, continue to be an article of exportation, so long as it is worth more elsewhere than it is worth here. It goes in virtue of the inexorable laws of trade that cannot be overthrown by the theorizing platitudes of politicians. Suppose any extraordinary demand for silver shall at any time occur in the Old World, such for instance as the remonetization of silver by Germany, which is not unlikely to occur, would not the demand be so great as to sweep our small change out of the country in a single day? If our paper money shall be worth less than silver, our own people will hoard the silver to an extent that will cause a serious inconvenience; indeed my own experience teaches me that with paper and silver at par, silver coin will be sought for and hoarded by our foreign-born population, who as a rule prefer coin, and you will find that whenever and wherever coin and paper circulate side by side they will make all their purchases with paper, using in every instance such denomination of paper as will require change in return, and then hoarding the change. This done in localities largely peopled with this class will make small change scarce. Therefore, looking at this question in the most favorable light, I can see no possible hope of keeping our silver at home if we put it in circulation until gold and silver shall stand upon a common level.

I am unalterably opposed to any further issue of bonds. A hundred millions in gold is required to pay the annual interest on the public debt. It comes from the hard earnings of the people, a tax on labor to that extent; and it is one of the cardinal doctrines of the party to which I belong at home that the interest-bearing debt of this Government shall not be further increased in diminishing the non-interest-bearing debt. Yet this bill contemplates just that, and to the unknown extent of keeping up a silver fractional currency of say $50,000,000 continually subject to the inroads of the "bulls and bears" and the demands for exportation. A constant drain will set in the moment the first issue is made, which will have to be supplied by a further issue, involving, of course, the further issue of bonds; gradually but surely transforming the products of the silver mines into the gold bonds of the United States, greatly to the benefit and advantage of the already rich owners of those mines, but to the injury of everybody else.

With every possible respect for the opinion of others, it seems to me that no good reasons have been assigned for the adoption of this measure, and no man has attempted to controvert the objections that have been urged against the impossibility of maintaining such a currency in uniform volume, or at all, except by the continual purchase and coinage of silver to keep pace with the drainage caused by the export demand and hoarding by our own people. The fractional currency needs to be permanent and ample in volume, and for that reason if for none other it should be a national currency, that is confined within the jurisdiction of the power issuing it, so that it might not be subject to the influences that, operating upon a currency common to the world, or based on a money common to the world, produces fluctuations both in volume and value. The volume of the small change ought to be beyond the reach of such influences. Let it be the money of this country, for which there will be no demand elsewhere; one that is money nowhere else. It will answer our purpose just as well, and the amount in circulation can easily be kept in sufficient volume to answer the wants of trade.

I do not think the time has come when it will be safe to retire our present fractional currency and substitute for it a money for which there is a demand the world over. It has fulfilled the demands of trade; no inconvenience has arisen from its use; and I think the country is satisfied. It posseses in full the only essential elements in a fractional currency, convenience, sufficient volume, and convertibility in case of redundancy. What more is necessary? But it is claimed by the silver men that it is too expensive. But it has been demonstrated on this floor that it is not more expensive than silver when we take into consideration the interest we shall be continually paying on the bonds issued in its purchase. It is worth while to consider upon this point that the cost of the paper fractional currency is wholly for material and labor, the cost of which is explained here at home among our own people. By the recent suspension of the Printing and Engraving Bureau some fifteen hundred persons were thrown out of employment, a large portion of whom have families dependent upon them for support, and all are in destitute circumstances. Many even now are objects of charity; a collection was taken up for them in most of the churches here last Sunday, and this fact stares us in the face, that some provisions must be made for these people so unceremoniously thrown out of an employment in which they had for years been engaged, and which they no doubt supposed was permanent, and compelled to apply for support to the too-often cold charity of the world; these people are beggars through the unexpected action of the Government, against which no one would expect them to provide.

Now, in the absence of any controlling principle involving the economy of our finance management, is it not the part of wisdom to go on with our present system, thereby securing in the future, as we have had in the past, a convenient and sufficient small-change currency, as cheap at least as the silver coins can be furnished, besides furnishing without any loss to the country these hundreds of poor people the means of earning their daily bread. On the other hand, if this bill shall become a law, we may reasonably expect—I say reasonably expect because no man on this floor has attempted a denial—a currency less convenient, less steady and equable in volume, to-day enough and to-morrow all gone, and, in addition to a bonded debt already so large as to threaten the country with bankruptcy, hundreds of millions of gold-interest-bearing bonds to go into the hands of the money-kings who absorb all the profits of labor and are eating at the vitals of this people. No; let us avert the evils likely to ensue in the adoption of this measure by making a speedy appropriation to set the suspended department at work, thereby furnishing labor to those who are beseeching on every hand for an opportunity to work.

I impugn the motives of no man, but I believe this to be a move in the interest of the great silver mines of the country, an attempt to create a demand for silver by bringing the Government into the market as a purchaser, and through it to supply the world with silver. Silver has been a "drug" for some time and is getting no better; the owners of the great Bonanza mines are becoming alarmed; it is proposed to compel the Secretary of the Treasury to do that which his judgment tells him he ought not to do, what the people have not demanded and do not want, what he has refused to do under a law just as obligatory as this will be. Who is demanding this measure outside of these Halls? Nobody, absolutely nobody, but the men who have silver bullion on a falling market, that they are anxious to exchange for United States gold bonds. But, I repeat, waiving all other considerations, we are not in a condition to enter upon this experiment. The Treasury is empty; the revenues have fallen off, while the interest account has been increased by this foolish attempt at silver resumption; there is but little gold in the Treasury, and the full amount of coin certificates outstanding.

In conclusion I offer the opinion that this measure and all others that contemplate the further issue of gold bonds will meet the unqualified disapproval of the people; and that any increase of the interest-bearing debt of this nation for the mere purpose of reducing the debt that bears no interest will sink the party proposing or sanctioning it deeper than the lower Silurian sandstone.

"Straw Bids."

SPEECH OF HON. WILLIAM H. STONE,

OF MISSOURI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

April 7, 1876,

On the subject of straw bids in the Post-Office Department.

Mr. STONE. Mr. Speaker, probably no member of this House has felt a deeper interest than I have in the investigation which has been and is being made by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, under the resolution of the Committee of Ways and Means of January 14, and the resolution introduced by myself January 24, in which I called attention to the statement of the Postmaster-General in his last annual report to the effect that certain parties evaded all laws enacted, and succeeded in defrauding the Government out of hundreds of thousands of dollars annually through the system of straw bidding.

This official statement and the investigation of the charges or admissions by the Postmaster-General have been of special interest to me, for the reason that I had on the 13th of April, 1874, made similar charges, and endeavored to have the subject thoroughly investigated by Congress at that time.

The preamble and resolution I then introduced, alleging irregularities and abuses in the Post-Office Department, and citing numerous cases taken from official documents to sustain those charges, was referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads; but no power was conferred upon the committee to compel the attendance of witnesses, and none were summoned, but the so-called investigation was simply an examination of the official records and an inquiry of officials of the Post-Office Department as to the legality of their own acts.

To the end that the case may be clearly understood, I beg to call the attention of the House to the following letter addressed to Hon. JOHN B. PACKER, chairman, &c., that they may judge whether I was justified on April 13, 1874, in alleging that there were "abuses and irregularities in the Post-Office Department."

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., May 5, 1874.

SIR: To my surprise, I am furnished with the following by the clerk of your committee, in response to my communication of date April 30, 1874, requesting that "David A. Floyd, contract clerk Post-Office Department be summoned to give testimony in regard to abuses and irregularities in the Post-Office Department, as alleged by me," to wit:

"The Postal Committee desire me to inform you that, according to their rules, it will be necessary for you to furnish them a statement of what you desire to prove by any witness before they decide as to the propriety or necessity of calling any of them, as you have been previously informed by the resolution of the committee."

This resolution being in such direct contravention to your resolutions of April 18, 1874, which are as follows:

"Resolved, That the committee will proceed to make the examination and investigation contemplated by the House in referring the said preamble and resolution to this committee, and that for that purpose the committee will meet on Monday next at ten o'clock.

"Resolved, That Hon. W. H. STONE be informed of this action of the committee, and that he be respectfully invited to attend all the meetings of said committee pending said investigation, and to make any suggestions he may desire in relation to the charges contained in the said preamble and resolution, and also to furnish the committee with any evidence in his possession or knowledge touching the same, or that he has reason to believe exists, as well as the names of witnesses having any knowledge touching the premises and investigation."

I shall most respectfully decline proceeding or participating in any examination or investigation under the restrictions contained in the committee's resolution of April 30, 1874. I think great abuses exist in the letting of Post-Office contracts, and I have suggested to you the names of employés in the Post-Office Department who I believe will establish these abuses. But what particulars each one would prove I am of course unable to state.

I invite the attention of the committee to the following extracts from Executive Document No. 322, Forty-second Congress, as also to the manuscript reports of the Post-Office Department made to the Forty-third Congress in possession of your committee in support of the alleged abuses and irregularities which have existed in the Post-Office Department, and do still exist, and which I allege will be proven to your entire satisfaction upon a separate examination under oath of David A. Floyd, G. W. Turner, William Sickles, James S. Wood, James S. Sharp, A. H. Brown, W. B. Gonsalves, H. W. Wheeler, Cranston Laurie, Dr. J. M. Parks, and James Van Vleck, all of the Post-Office Department.

The following proof of abuses and irregularities will be found in Executive Document 322, Forty-second Congress:

That bid for $900 was accepted for route 7587, and contract was made with F. P. Sawyer for $34,296. That he was not a bidder.

That bid for $1,800 was accepted for route 7590, and contract was made with F. P. Sawyer for $12,000, which was $2,227 more than his bid.

That bid for $400 was accepted for route 7592, and contract was made with F. P. Sawyer for $1,500.

That bid for $1,400 was accepted for route 8533, and contract was made with F. P. Sawyer for $9,900.

That bid for $1,800 was accepted for route 8536, and contract was made with F. P. Sawyer for $27,000.

That bid for $3,300 was accepted for route 8537, and contract was made with F. P. Sawyer for $17,612, being $1,612 more than his bid.

That bid for $3,700 was accepted for route 8538, and contract was made with F. P. Sawyer for $63,730, being $18,730 more than his bid.

That bid for $4,200 was accepted for route 8539, and contract was made with F. P. Sawyer for $81,706.

That bid for $2,990 was accepted for route 7647, and contract was made with F. P. Sawyer for $6,500. That he was not a bidder.

That bid for $5,000 was accepted for route 8540, and contract was made with F. P. Sawyer for $44,225.

That bid for $2,400 was accepted for route 8550, and that contract was made with F. P. Sawyer for $16,000, who was not a bidder for the route.

That bid for $3,300 was accepted for route 8557, and that contract was made with F. P. Sawyer for $8,000, who was not a bidder.

That the bid of F. Hamilton for $3,000 for route 8571 was ruled too high, and $1,200 offered, which was not accepted, and contract was made with F. P. Sawyer for $3,000, who was not a bidder for the route.

That bid for $2,200 was accepted for route 8572, and that contract was made with F. P. Sawyer for $13,000.

That bid for $1,500 was accepted for route 8575, and contract was made with F. P. Sawyer for $14,000, which was $7,030 more than his bid.

That bid for $600 was accepted for route 8577, and that contract was made with F. P. Sawyer for $7,500.

That bid for $1,200 was accepted for route 8590, and contract was made with F. P. Sawyer for $4,500. He was not a bidder for the route.

That bid for $1,600 was accepted for route 8603, and contract was made with F. P. Sawyer for $18,000; that he was not a bidder.

That bid for $2,200 was accepted for route 8610, and contract was made with F. P. Sawyer for $7,500.

That bid for $1,900 was accepted for route 8619, and contract was made with F. P. Sawyer for $7,000.

That bid for $1,100 was accepted for route 8620; that contract was made with F. P. Sawyer for $9,000; that he was not a bidder.

That bid for $1,000 was accepted for route 8642, and contract was made with F. P. Sawyer for $10,000; that he was not a bidder.

That bid for $2,300 was accepted for route 8646, and contract was made with F. P. Sawyer for $10,000.

That bid for $4,000 was accepted for route 7506, and contract was made with J. M. Tibbetts for $12,999. being $1,499 more than his bid.

That bid for $5,250 was accepted for route 7507, and contract was made with J. M. Tibbetts for $7,400, being $600 more than his bid.

That bid for $0.01 was accepted for route 7521, and contract was made with D. J. Chidester for $1,679, being $500 more than his bid.

That bid for $895 was accepted for route 7533, and contract was made with J. W. Guerrant for $1,800, being $551 more than his bid.

That bid for $2,480 was accepted for route 7595, and contract was made with R. C. Kerns for $7,300; that he was not a bidder.

That bid for $2,990 was accepted for route 7596, and contract was made with J. H. Lamar for $29,000; that he was not a bidder.

That bid for $550 was accepted for route 7601, and contract was made with T. S. Vaile for $1,040; that he was not a bidder.

That bid for $1,100 was accepted for route 7602, and contract was made with T. S. Vaile for $1,560; that he was not a bidder.

That bid for $900 was accepted for route 7603, and contract was made with T. S. Vaile for $5,000.

That bid for $1,495 was accepted for route 7605, and that contract was made with T. S. Vaile for $5,900, being $100 more than his bid.

That bid for $850 was accepted for route 7612, and contract was made with D. J. Chidester for $8,200. being $506 more than his bid.

That bid for $0.01 was accepted for route 7613, and contract was made with D. J. Chidester for $1,848, being $448 more than his bid.

That bid for $980 was accepted for route 7614, and contract was made with D. J. Chidester for $7,478, being $204 more than his bid.

That bid for $1,825 was accepted for route 7621, and contract was made with D. W. Chandler for $2,400, being $200 more than his bid.

That bid for $1,300 was accepted for route 7628, and contract was made with M. M. Grady for $2,600, being $400 more than his bid.

That bid for $2,795 was accepted for route 7637, and contract was made with R. H. Endom for $5,300, being $301 more than his bid.

That bid for $1,900 was accepted for route 8082, and contract was made with A. E. Davis for $15,000, being $10,100 more than his bid.

That bid for $95 was accepted for route 8083, and contract was made with A. E. Davis for $1,050; that he was not a bidder.

That bid for $3,900 was accepted for route 8526, and contract was made with I. Bryden for $10,371, being $3,771 more than his bid.

That bid for $7,000 was accepted for route 8006; for $4,300 for route 8007; for $2,400 for route 8010; for $6,500 for route 8013; for $5,500 for route 8014.

That contracts were made with B. H. Peterson for $37,500 for route 8006; $14,000 for route 8007; $5,000 for route 8010; $29,000 for route 8013; and $16,000 for route 8014. That he was not a bidder on either one of these routes and was for amounts much larger than was proposed by owners and commanders of steamboats well known to the Department. Peterson is neither an owner nor commander of any steamboat.

Very respectfully,

WM. H. STONE.

Hon. JNO. B. PACKER,
Chairman Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

P. S.—The aggregate of accepted bids is $108,795.02, and contracts were made for $655,394; loss to the Government of $546,598.98.

While unable to satisfy the committee by an investigation conducted in the manner they prescribed, that the officials charged with the duty of conducting the mail-letting of 1871 in the southwest, and having control of all matters pertaining to the service in that section had failed to do their duty, as a business man I saw and heard enough to convince me that there had been and was collusion between those officials and the so-called ring or straw-bid contractors, and I was unwilling to coincide with the committee in their report exonerating those officials from all blame.

That report, with all due deference to the gentlemen who made it, contains some singular statements, and among them is one that I selected route No. 7587, from Fort Gibson to Sherman, Texas, to sustain the charges made.

It is true that this route was the first named in my preamble; and taking it for an example I showed a condition of things which to one certainly who looked at the transaction from a business standpoint seemed at least strange, but that I selected it, the gentlemen who had been furnished by the late Postmaster-General with a carefully prepared statement in relation to route No. 7587, and who with it in their possession, when I appeared before them, for more than an hour insisted that, taking that route and no other, I should make good the charges I had made, will certainly rememember that after in vain endeavoring to be permitted to take other routes on which I was prepared, I was, by courtesy, given twenty-four hours to sustain those charges, taking the route they, not I, selected.

I trust the House will bear with me while I lay before them a brief statement in relation to route No. 7587, giving some of the facts which I laid before the committee.

That mail-route I shall never forget, for in addition to being the connecting link between my own State and Texas, the time allowed me by the committee was so short that I was forced to sit up with route No. 7587 the best part of a night. The route was two hundred and five miles long, the mail was carried six times a week, and the contractor was paid $34,296 per annum for doing the service. When it was advertised for a new contract for four years from July 1, 1871, sixty bids were received, running from $80,049 to $900.

Now, under the law, the Postmaster-General was forced to give the award of the contract to the lowest bidder tendering sufficient guarantees for faithful performance. I claimed that the clerk in charge of that service, knowing the importance of the route and that $34,296 was being paid the contractor, was not doing his duty to award the contract to an unknown man at $900 a year when contractors well known to be responsible men were bidders at about $17,000, without first being sure that the nine-hundred-dollar bidder was also responsible; for, under the law, an award to him relieved all the other bidders from legal responsibility to contract and, if he failed, left the Department to make the best terms it could at short notice.

Without making any effort to find out who William Wood, who bid $900, was, he was awarded the contract, but could never be found to execute it, and the route fell into the hands of the old contractor for six months at $34,296 per annum, the old rate of pay; and that route, with one hundred and ninety-four others, was again advertised for contracts to commence January 1, 1872.

Among the sixty bidders relieved by awarding the contract to William Wood was the son of the contractor, at $17,450; but of course he declined to carry the mail when not legally forced to do so, and his father got it at $34,296, as I have before stated.

Mr. Speaker, if the contract clerk had profited by this experience and been careful to protect the Government in the next letting, I certainly would not have been the one to charge him with collusion with the contractor; but what did he do?

A new law had been passed, under which the one hundred and ninety-five routes were advertised on August 4, 1871; and that there might be some security for the Government in awarding contracts on important and expensive mail-routes, it provided that all bids amounting to $5,000 or more should be accompanied with a certified check amounting to 5 per cent. of the bid.

When the bids received under the advertisement of August 4, 1871, were opened, there were twenty-three for route No. 7587, ranging from $32,193—the bid of the old contractor—to that of one J. C. Murdock, at $2,773; all of which, except that of Murdock, being accompanied with certified checks as an evidence, at least, of good faith on the part of those bidders.

I ask gentlemen to listen while I tell them what this clerk, who had accepted the bid of William Wood at $900, under the previous letting, did in this case. Without an effort of any kind to learn through any responsible source who Murdock was, he awarded the contract to him at $2,773 per annum.

Of course Murdock never could be found to execute the contract, and the temporary contract at $34,296 was continued, and although the route was again advertised the same manipulation was repeated, and the person who had the route in 1869 held it until the railroad was completed on the 3d of May, 1873.

If this clerk had been in the employ of any of you, would you have retained his services or believed in his integrity; and yet, while this was but one of scores of similar cases, the Ex-Postmaster-General and a committee of the Forty-third Congress indorsed his action.

I was prepared on that Monday morning when the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads insisted on route No. 7587, and no other, with more startling cases of what seemed to me like fraud than this one; but as those gentlemen could not see but the officials of the Department had done their duty in this case, it was not in my power to prove to them what Postmaster-General Jewell in the following April did prove in the criminal court of this District, but to which he makes no reference in his annual report, and that was that the clerk whom I claimed had not done his duty in 1871 and 1872, and through whose acts in connection with those of others the Government had been plundered of hundreds of thousands of dollars, had been paid $2,500 to manipulate contracts in the interest of his employer; but, strange to say, this man with three accomplices in the Department were with their employer in the witness-box to prosecute a contractor who was shown by the evidence at most to be an accomplice after the fact and acquitted.

I do not believe that any one of the gentlemen who signed the report of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads at the first session of the Forty-third Congress, stating in conclusion that "believing, therefore, that while these combinations for straw bidding have frequently been entered into by outside parties, the alleged abuses and irregularities have not existed and do not exist in the Post-Office Department," as charged in the preamble and resolution referred to them, would be willing in view of the developments made by the Postmaster-General himself in April, 1875, and the exposures being made by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads of the Forty-fourth Congress, as in 1874, to declare the officers of the Post-Office Department free from all blame for the frauds which have been committed, and which Postmaster-General Jewell states in his report amount to "hundreds of thousands of dollars per annum."

Resumption of Specie Payments.

SPEECH OF HON. W. S. HAYMOND,

OF INDIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

April 1, 1876,

On the question of the resumption of specie payments.

Mr. HAYMOND. Mr. Speaker, among the great questions demanding the early and serious attention of Congress none is more important than that relating to the solution of our financial troubles. It is one that affects the people and the general interest of the nation more vitally than any other. Without a well-regulated currency, stable in value, trade, business, and commerce will be continually liable to embarrassments. The fluctuating and unsettled value of the paper dollar in relation to coin is an evil that should be remedied as early as possible, and in a way that will not inflict hardships upon the people. But the resumption of specie payments under existing circumstances presents too many difficulties to be carried into successful operation. The act of January 14, 1875, has been in force for more than a year, and we are reaping its fruits in an increase of our financial difficulties, in the suspension of numerous industries, in a higher premium on gold, and in general financial distress through the land. The first remedy demanded is the repeal of the law. No portion of the third section should remain upon the statute-book as a basis for any new-fangled, hocus-pocus plan to bring about resumption of specie payments without specie. Instead of advancing the country toward resumption it has widened the chasm between our so-called irredeemable Treasury notes and the medium they represent. This has occurred, too, in the face of the undeniable fact that under the provisions of this act over $10,000,000 of our legal-tender notes have been canceled within one year. Before the passage of this act Congress had made no declaration fixing a time for resumption nor provisions for executing it, yet the premium on gold was lower then than now.

From these facts the inquiry might be profitably made, would the premium on gold have been less had the contraction of legal-tenders been $20,000,000 or even $50,000,000? The President of the United States in his last message has recommended "that the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized to redeem, say, not to exceed $2,000,000 monthly of the legal-tender notes," and bills have been introduced in both Houses of Congress advocating a similar policy with the view of hastening resumption; yet with a contraction amounting practically to $2,000,000 per month, and without the expenditure of a single dollar in gold, we chronicle the result, namely, an increase of about 3 per cent. in the gold premium. During this period our financial troubles have increased instead of being diminished; trade and commerce have been in a more languishing condition than any time since the panic; the industrial and mechanical pursuits of the country have been paralyzed; enterprise and improvements have been suspended or discouraged; and thousands and tens of thousands of people, dreading the legitimate consequences of the policy inaugurated, are trembling on the brink of bankruptcy. While contraction has been going on and our financial troubles thickening, resumption, like the Will-o'-the wisp, has flitted ahead only to delude, and we are as far from the realization of this hope as we were a year ago. The currency has been contracted and the business of the country restricted, but where stands the premium on gold? With all the facts and causes before the country, what financial philosopher can predict the further contraction in the volume of the legal-lender notes that will be required to appreciate the value of the residue to par with gold? Will it take one-third, one-half, three-fourths, or more?

I am aware that numerous hypotheses have been invented to account for this apparent anomaly, but the most of them are unsatisfactory, and amount to nothing more than begging the question.

The moneyed autocrats of this country clamor for resumption of specie payment. They favor a policy that will inure to their own interest, but do not stop to consider what effect it may have upon the agricultural and laboring population.

We had a panic three years ago that swept over the land like a pestilence, and yet before its shadow has passed over the horizon, and confidence has been restored, the whole country is again precipitated in worse confusion by a species of legislation that attempts hastily and out of season to cramp and crush the business of the country down to a specie basis. The history of the civilized world has clearly taught that contraction of the circulating medium is not the proper remedy for panics and financial convulsions, but that the proper occasions to bring about resumption of specie payments, with an inflated currency, are during times of prosperity. The passage and enforcement of the resumption law is in harmony with the purpose of that grand masterpiece of legislation of March 18, 1869, known as the gold bill, which saddled unjustly, and without cause, enormous burdens upon the people. It was special legislation in favor of capital as against labor and industry; and this resumption law fulfills the same purpose.

Are we to imitate the example of England by reaching resumption through arbitrary legislation? What emergency exists, or great national necessity, requiring that this shall be done against the will of the people and adversely to their interests? Through the enactment of Peel specie resumption was attained in England, in spite of the protestations of a suffering people, who had but little power to resist; but it remains to be seen whether such a policy can be carried out in republican America, where the people hold all power in their hands. Our people know but little about the devices resorted to by the great banking institution of England to keep on hand a supply of specie to meet the constantly varying demands for it. If they knew that specie resumption and its maintenance would require from time to time, as circumstances and new emergencies occur, restrictions in loans and discounts and sudden changes in the rates of interest, they would scarcely desire that the finances of this nation should be placed upon a basis so rickety and uncertain.

Let us remember, too, that the financial system of this country now in operation is widely different from that of England. She had then as now but one system of finance, one great banking institution, to which the local banks of the realm were as satellites. Resumption of specie payments involved but a single question, and that was one of endurance by the people. But with this country it is otherwise. We have a complex system of currency, consisting of Treasury notes based upon the faith and credit of the nation, and the issues of more than two thousand national banking associations located in all parts of the land. These two forms of currency are so related to each other that the notes of the latter are made redeemable in those of the former. The execution of the resumption act of 1875 clearly involves the question of the existence of the legal-tender currency, and by the hasty redemption of these notes and their cancellation carries an implied danger to the maintenance of the subordinate or national banking system. The political question as to whether the present complex system of two classes of circulating notes shall be maintained, or one of them shall give way to the other, has been intensified by the dissatisfaction engendered in the public mind by the resumption law, and the prevailing sentiment and outspoken declarations in various sections of the Union point to the increasing popularity of the legal-tender system.

The dread of rapid contraction has evidently seized upon the public mind, and has augmented to an unexpected extent the evils that burst upon the country under the panic of 1873.

I know, sir, that it is frequently said that the provisions of the resumption law cannot be carried into effect without additional legislation or granting more extended powers to the Secretary of the Treasury. The powers already granted, I beg to say, are ample, if the ill-advised policy of this act is to be forced into operation against the protests of a patient, but suffering people. The Secretary of the Treasury admits in his last report that the "act" "confers large powers" on him "touching the issue of United States bonds for the purpose of procuring the supply of gold necessary to execute such of its provisions as go into immediate operation, and to provide for the redemption in gold of the United States notes outstanding on and after the 1st of January, 1879." Under the due exercise of such powers as the act confers, the feasability of resumption (redemption) can scarcely be questioned, unless the gold markets of the world are inadequate to meet our demands, or, as the Secretary has hinted, "opposition from the financial powers of the world should be engendered."

The Secretary, being thus clothed with all needed authority, will offer in the market and send abroad United States bonds to buy the requisite amount of gold, which will be shipped to New York and be exchanged at par for legal-tender notes, thus enabling the money-gamblers of Wall street to make a handsome profit; and as soon as the gold has performed the function of ridding the country of a portion of its circulating medium, the greenbacks, it will be reshipped to the same countries whence it came to pay the interest on these same bonds. By this policy we are not only piling up an enormous indebtedness, "like Pelion upon Ossa," to consume the vitality of the nation and entail perpetual burdens upon the people, making them hewers of wood and drawers of water to the moneyed aristocracy of the world, but, worse even than this, it leads to the assumption that the legal-tender currency of this country, the boasted money of the realm, based upon the faith and credit of the nation, is a greater evil than the interest-bearing indebtedness, which we now seek to increase, and which has already attained colossal proportions.

I believe, sir, that no further powers will, or ought to be, granted at this time to enforce an act of such doubtful utility and of such threatening danger to the prosperity of the country.

No enactment in all the financial legislation of this country in its past history became, in so short a time, so unpopular as this resumption law. Whole commonwealths, without reference to party, are rising in opposition to it and demanding that it be immediately repealed. If the voice of the people is not heeded by their representatives there will be a political revolution that will place in power those who will. We should remember the axiom, Vox populi vox Dei.

The demand for the repeal of the resumption law does not come alone from the people of the agricultural districts of the West and South. It does not come as a peculiar request from those who are supposed to have taken a "new departure" on the subject of finance. It comes as well from those who oppose as those who advocate national banks. The repeal is urged by bank officers and stockholders who dread the effect the proposed resumption of specie payments will have upon national banks. It is alike advocated by resumptionists and anti-resumptionists, and by myriads of those who cling to the old financial notions of "specie basis" and hard money.

I ask leave to read the following extracts from an able editorial of the Chicago Tribune of February 9. The Tribune is one of the ablest champions of "hard money" and early resumption of specie payments in the West, but it sees but little prospect of reaching this much-desired end in a satisfactory manner through the gloomy and rugged path of contraction which must necessarily result if the provisions of the resumption act are to be carried into full operation.

It says:

In the mean time, the resumption act stands, in its incomplete form, a menace to the country. Already the country has drifted one year without sail, compass, or chart. We are now one year nearer the date fixed for resumption, and nothing has been done in preparation for it. The currency remains depreciated, and every day new contracts are made payable in depreciated paper. As we near the time fixed for resumption the feeling of uncertainty becomes stronger. Confidence is being withdrawn. The banks are beginning to retire their circulation and lock up their legal-tenders. Money is abundant and idle, but investments are small. Business men are afraid to borrow. Everybody is growing more nervous and anxious; loans and discounts are for smaller amounts and shorter terms, and the resumption act, unsupported by any aiding legislation, absolutely threatens the business of the country with sudden and sharp contraction, ending in paralysis.

If Congress proposes, as it is now pretty evident Congress does, that there shall be no legislation to carry out the resumption act, and that the country shall be permitted to drift along without any regard to the consequences, then that act becomes an injury to the country, a perpetual threat of confiscation, and of a contraction that will plunge the business of the people into the direst confusion, ending in general bankruptcy and ruin. Under these circumstances, the Chicago Tribune cannot regard the resumption act in its present form otherwise than as a cheat and a fraud, a pretense and a delusion, and therefore ought to be repealed. But if Congress is to adjourn without such legislation, leaving the country exposed to the threat of arbitrary specie resumption, with all the destructive incidents of contraction, both of national and bank currency, then the sooner the resumption act is abolished the better. It is much wiser to leave the country without any promise of resumption than to put on the statute-book a promise of resumption without any provision for executing that promise, save an arbitrary and wholesale contraction of all kinds of currency.

Now, sir, this is very strong language coming from the source it does, but there is not a word untrue or too strongly drawn, as I shall subsequently show. These statements represent the sentiment of a vast majority of the people in the great West and the valley of the Mississippi, and if I mistake not will soon be seconded by the people in all sections of the country.

I admit, with the Tribune, that it is much wiser to repeal the law bodily than to leave it in force as it is, "a menance to the country, a threat of confiscation and contraction, that will produce the direst confusion and end in general bankruptcy and ruin."

I favor the unconditional repeal of the law because I am well satisfied that neither under its provisions, nor with the aid of the proposed supplemental legislation recommended by the President, can resumption take place without entailing upon the people of this country for the next five or ten years the most unnecessary and the most inexcusable amount of hardships and financial suffering.

Why insist upon a forced attempt at early resumption when the people of this nation have just emerged from one of the most gigantic and sanguinary wars in the world's history; when the reconstruction of ravaged and disordered commonwealths is barely completed; when scarcely sufficient time has elapsed to re-create and restore by energy and industry the billions of dollars of wealth and property destroyed by the war, and while a war debt of $2,500,000,000 remains to be paid? Is this the time to lay on the people additional burdens in the shape of increased taxation? Is this the proper time to contract and retire large volumes of currency, the life-blood of the nation, while its energies are stifled and its industries are paralyzed? I look upon the attempt as being not only unphilosophical, but at variance with the teachings of the dear-bought lessons of history. Let resumption come and it will be welcomed, but let it come not by force legislation and not by the imposition of grievous burdens upon the laborer, the producer, and the tax-payer, but in that spontaneous manner it will come if we attempt not to guide its course by arbitrary legislation. Let us simply turn the bow of our financial vessel toward the harbor of resumption and sail into it when the tide comes, and not attempt, as we are now doing, to stem a roaring torrent whose waves will repel and destroy.

The folly of the resumption act is now clearly apparent, and further folly should not be enacted by any arbitrary scheme for effecting what is difficult to reach and what is not demanded by any commercial or national necessity at this time. All of the methods that propose to accomplish this result by the sale of interest-bearing bonds, the contraction of the currency, or by direct redemption at the Treasury with gold will strew ruin in their track and result in a direct loss to the people not less in amount than the national debt, that they are now struggling to liquidate. However philosophical such plans may appear abstractly considered, however well they may accord with the views of some writers on the science of political economy, they are not the remedies that seem to me at all adapted to meet the emergencies of the occasion, the peculiar circumstances of the country, and the wants of the people.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] in his speech in this House in reply to the gentleman from Maine, demonstrated conclusively by his tabular statements that the premium on gold has not, as is often erroneously supposed, been in direct ratio to the volume of the currency, but has frequently been in inverse proportion; and this fact I have shown still prevails and will until a change of policy takes place. We may issue declaratory edicts in favor of resumption, fixing the time when it is to take place, and go on funding greenbacks or contracting their volume by redemption at $2,000,000 per month for the next five years without disturbing the premium on gold, unless it is to increase it.

An analytical discussion of this question will require the consideration of several factors and their relations to each other. These are, first, the volume of Treasury notes; second, demand for gold; and, third, national and corporate indebtedness abroad. The first to be considered is the volume of the outstanding currency and its relation to the amount of gold held in reserve by the nation at its Treasury or other gold supplies that may be regarded as a redemption fund. We are officially informed that the outstanding legal-tender circulation amounts to $370,943,392, and the coin balance of gold in the Treasury to about $13,000,000; hence we have on hand $28 of legal-tenders to one of gold coin. If we should for a moment assume that this paper currency derived its value from the coin on hand, the paper dollar would be worth only about three and a half cents. Yet what is the fact? Without any dependence upon coin the paper dollar is worth eighty-eight cents, as measured by gold. If every dollar of gold in the Treasury should be disbursed to-morrow and all in the country shipped abroad, it would produce no appreciable effect upon the present value of greenbacks.

If the relation between our paper currency and gold was such that the former derived its value exclusively from the latter and was exchangeable for it on demand, a greenback dollar to-day would be so utterly valueless as to be unfit to perform the functions of a medium of exchange. It would be as worthless as the currency of many of the wild-cat institutions was under the old State-bank system. Our greenbacks are not promises of the Government to pay coin on demand, but are only redeemable at the pleasure of the United States. Their value is not based upon coin, nor upon any early expectation of redemption in coin at the Treasury. If the Government could issue an authoritative declaration that redemption should not take place within the next ten years, our greenbacks would still retain the value they now do and continue to perform the duty they have heretofore done.

To what, then, is their value attributable? We are sometimes told that greenbacks bring what they do because the brokers in New York will pay just so much for them. But why do brokers pay eighty-eight cents per dollar as measured by gold instead of three cents and a half or one cent? This is easily answered. The value of the greenbacks comes from the fact that though they represent coin they are based upon the faith and credit as well as honor of a great and powerful nation whose Government is of the people, by the people, and for the people, and that they are by law, the will of the people, made a legal tender for all dues to the Government except duties on imports and payable for all debts, public and private, except interest on bonds. Thus by the act of sovereignty, the voice of the people of the nation manifested through the constituted forms of the Government, they are declared to be the money of the realm, or a national medium of exchange.

We are sometimes told that greenbacks are not suitable for money because they are not a product of labor, but can be issued in any quantity almost without cost. This doctrine is false so far as it relates to the present greenback circulation which we are now considering. Beyond this it is altogether hypothetical, inasmuch as it assumes, because a certain power exists in the Government, that that power should be grossly abused. The outstanding greenbacks represent more even than the labor of production. They represent the service to the Government rendered by nearly two million soldiers who fought the battles of the Union. They were the wages paid for toilsome marches, for suffering and hardships, for chivalric deeds, for battles, for peril and sickness, and for all the munitions and outfit of a gigantic war. They represent that service for which the faith, credit, and honor of the nation are sacredly pledged. The vast patronage of the Government gives value to the greenbacks. They pay for all services rendered to the Government, except the diplomatic. They pay the President, the legislative and executive officers, the Army and Navy. And if such a currency had been issued, even without any redeemability in coin, and made the medium to perform such functions as the money of the realm, it would always have a value proportioned to the uses it could subserve.

There is no substantial reason to suppose that the present volume of currency is in excess of the wants of trade and business. Though there may be an idle surplus of money in the banks, the cause is undoubtedly due to the stagnation of business and impaired confidence. But I grant, if this Government should issue recklessly and without due regard to economic prudence vast sums of currency, greatly in excess of the wants of business and trade, that depreciation would result. I have reason to believe that neither of the great political parties of this nation will ever assume such risks or responsibility.

The premium on gold does not appear to me to be due so much to depreciation in the value of the greenbacks or want of purchasing power as it does to the extraordinary demand for gold, which keeps up and increases the price of that commodity. If this country is to continue the policy of issuing interest-bearing bonds, the demand for gold will be so great to pay the interest on these obligations that the gold premium will remain at what it is, or increase, notwithstanding any contraction in the volume of the legal-tender notes that it is practicable to make.

The United States is a debtor nation. About $1,000,000,000 of its interest-bearing bonds are held abroad. The people owe a vast sum of interest-bearing corporate indebtedness abroad, such as municipal and railroad bonds; and our commercial exchanges with foreign countries are such as require the exportation of a much larger amount of the precious metals than we import. Hence our country is being continually drained of its stock of gold to pay these demands; and while they remain so great as they are, it is useless to make any attempt to equalize the value of greenbacks and gold by contraction of the volume of the currency.

According to the bullion report of the select committee of Parliament in 1810, certain conclusions were reached or corollaries deduced, which since that time have been regarded by bullionists as immutable. According to one of these, "If gold is at a premium in paper, the paper is redundant and depreciated. The premium measures the depreciation." While this doctrine may have applied to England under her system of banking and to her existing circumstances, it would require more faith than most of us possess to suppose that this axiom would answer in our case. If so, a reduction in the volume of our legal-tender notes of $48,000,000, or 13 per cent., the present premium on gold, would equalize the value of the remaining $322,000,000 of these notes with coin. If we could believe this it would be folly to oppose the moderate contraction required; but the truth is, circumstances alter cases. The immense outflow of gold from this country at present creates a stubborn exception to the rule.

The Chamber of Commerce of New York City a few weeks ago issued a pronunciamiento on finance. In one of their propositions they declared that "a general resumption of specie payment is alike indispensable to the re-instatement of our financial affairs upon a safe and enduring basis, to the restoration of confidence and activity in every branch of industry, and to renewed success in all the pursuits of commerce." But in the same proclamation they insert another proposition, declaring that "it matters little what plan of resumption is adopted or what amount of coin is provided against the date of resumption, unless some provision is made against the outflow of coin to adjust the balance of trade with foreign nations."

Here is precisely the point where the trouble lies. If these gentlemen or any other financial philosophers will present a feasible and satisfactory plan by which this outflow can be stopped, a plan that will not oppress the people, I will venture to say that all important differences between hard and soft money advocates and all sectional difference of opinion will be speedily dissolved into thin smoke. Any plan that will stop the outflow of gold or equalize the outflow with the influx will make plain the road to resumption. I would respectfully suggest that the plan be discovered and put into practical operation before we begin to resume.

If the finances of this country were in a normal condition, its currency at par with gold, and the prices of real estate, labor, merchandise, and all commodities adjusted accordingly, these relations between coin and paper would remain undisturbed only while the demand for gold was reasonable and limited by the measure of the supply; but let this relationship be seriously deranged; let us suppose again that ours is a debtor nation, with all the obligations now resting upon it, then we would find, I think, that the paper dollar would continue to perform all the functions it did before, an undiminished purchasing power, while gold would go up and stay up till the demand for it was diminished.

The currency of the country per se has now nothing whatever to do with the hard times complained of. If there had been no legislation whatever on the question after the panic of 1873, confidence would have been much stronger than it is, and with a much better prospect for the restoration of the industries of the country. But we have one class of politicians who attribute all our financial ills to the legal-tender currency. They assure us that nothing but resumption of specie payments will restore confidence and insure prosperity, and that there is but one road to this, namely, the redemption and removal of our so-called irredeemable promises.

Again, there is another class, not perhaps so numerous, who see no pathway to prosperity except by a vast inflation of the same kind of currency. Their policy is one more likely to afford present relief than the other, but is open to the objection that in attempting to remedy present ills it may create others that we know not of. They are supported in their views by the authority of Peter Cooper, who asserts that the true remedy in financial panics is expansion of credits and capital and not contraction.

Impressed with the belief that the present volume of currency is not far from the amount required to effect the necessary exchanges among the people, I can neither sanction contraction nor expansion by legislation, but would leave the currency as it is, to be controlled by the laws of trade, till its purchasing power equals gold. When this point is reached, the necessities of the country must determine whether more currency is required or not.

The country needs at this time stability, a general understanding that there shall be no hasty, ill-advised policy to unsettle and derange values. The repeal of the resumption law, coupled with the assurance that the volume of the currency should not be increased or diminished by legislation, would effect what is most needed in this critical juncture.

CONTRACTION OF THE CURRENCY.

It seems to be a disputed point whether the panic of 1873 was in any manner due to contraction. It has been asserted that the volume of currency was greater at that period than before or since that time: and it is argued that the unauthorized issue of $26,000,000 of reserves during the panic as a remedy was utterly inutile as a measure of relief.

The report of Treasurer Spinner for June 30, 1865, furnishes an authoritative statement of the amount of currency at that time, namely:

Old demand notes	$472,603 50
Legal-tender notes, (new issue)	431,066,427 99
Compound-interest notes	191,121,470 00
One-year notes of 1863	8,467,570 00
Two-year notes of 1863	7,715,950 00
Two-year coupon-notes of 1863	34,441,650 00
Fractional currency, (first issue)	9,915,408 66
Fractional currency, (second issue)	12,798,130 60
Fractional currency, (third issue)	2,319,589 50
Total	698,918,800 25

All of the above was issued on the faith and credit of the nation, and was called currency by the Treasurer. Now, if we add to this the national-bank circulation at that time, $171,000,000, we will have the sum of $869,918,800.25; all of which was used as currency.

Now, if we turn to the Treasurer's report for November 1, 1873, we will find that there was outstanding of the above tabulated species of currency $401,527,269.94; add national-bank currency, $348,456,756.69, and we have a total of $749,984,026.63.

The total amount of both kinds of currency in 1865 was $869,918,800.25; the total in 1873 was $749,984,026.63; making an excess in 1865 over 1873 of $119,934,773.62.

According to the public-debt statement of February, 1876, the outstanding legal-tender notes, including the remnant of old demand notes and the fractional currency, amounted to $416,131,976.97. Add national-bank currency, $346,479,756, which will make the present volume of currency $762,611,732.97.

The total amount of both kinds of currency in the year 1865 was $869,918,800.25. Total amount at present, $762,611,732.97; being a contraction of $107,307,067.28.

The above statements are made from official reports, and cannot be called into question. They show that, notwithstanding the $26,000,000 of the reserve fund that was issued during the panic in the species of currency I have enumerated, there has been since 1865, with more than ten years of national development and progress, an actual shrinkage in the currency of more than $107,000,000.

If we add to the volume of currency in 1865 the 7.30 bonds of 1864 and 1865, which were really three-year Treasury-notes and made a legal tender as well as a legal reserve to be held by the banks, we will have an aggregate of $1,699,918,800.25, or more than twice the present amount of currency. Again, if we add to this vast sum the 5 per cent. legal-tenders, the 3 per cent. certificates which were made a legal bank reserve, and the temporary loan certificates, the whole amount will reach about $2,000,000,000, or nearly three times the amount of the present volume of the currency. The fact, too, should be borne in mind that prior to 1865 this currency circulated only to a limited extent in the Southern States in rebellion.

While this vast amount of indebtedness exercised in various degrees the functions of money, but few will deny that it greatly exceeded the amount required for a safe and permanent circulating medium. It was the inflated basis upon which the business of the country was transacted up to 1866. The prices of real estate, personal property, as well as all commodities of necessity, and labor were based upon it. All the industries of the country, public and private enterprises, as well as corporate liabilities at home and abroad, were carried on and contracted upon this extraordinary inflation. It is easy to see how under these circumstances a rapid contraction of the currency would bring about hardships and entail bankruptcy and ruin upon thousands.

It is a falsification of history to say there has been no contraction of the currency. By the act of July 12, 1866, provision was made for a steady contraction of the currency. It provided that not more than $10,000,000 of United States notes might be retired and canceled within the first six months after its passage and not more than $4,000,000 thereafter monthly. The policy of this act, however, excited alarm, as it became apparent that it would suddenly unsettle the values of all kinds of property, restrict trade, and embarrass all the enterprises and industries of the country. To undo what had been unwisely done and avert serious consequences, Congress on the 4th day of February, 1868, enacted that there should be no further reduction in the volume of the legal-tender notes. Under the act of July 12, 1866, according to the official statement of the Comptroller of the Currency, more than $72,000,000 of the legal-tender notes were retireed.

For further evidence of the contraction of the currency, I refer to the annual message of President Grant of December 1, 1873. He says:

> During the last four years the currency has been contracted directly by the withdrawal of 3 per cent. certificates, compound-interest notes, and 7.30 bonds outstanding on the 4th of March, 1869, all of which took the place of legal-tenders in the bank reserves, to the amount of $63,000,000.

He says further, with reference to comparative contraction:

> The population of the country has largely increased. More than 25,000 miles of railroad have been built, requiring the active use of capital to operate them. Millions of acres of land have been opened to cultivation, requiring capital to move the products. Manufactories have multiplied beyond all precedent in the same period of time, requiring capital weekly for the payment of wages and for the purchase of material; and probably the largest of all comparative contraction arises from the organizing of free labor in the South. Now every laborer there receives his wages, and for want of savings-banks the greater part of such wages is carried in the pocket or hoarded until required for use.

Now, if these statements of the President were true in 1873, and applicable to the existing state of the country, they are equally true and applicable now. If the act of July 12, 1866, was found inexpedient and unwise, how much more so is the present resumption law, which attempts more and has a far more serious purpose? The purpose is not simply contraction to a limited extent to effect an interchangeability with coin, but the retirement and cancellation of the entire legal-tender circulation. What effect this may have upon the national banking system is somewhat problematical. I apprehend, however, that it will operate seriously upon many of these institutions, excite alarm among bankers, and cause a rapid and wholesale contraction of their circulation. If these fears should be realized, there will be but one step to the destruction of our national monetary system. What would follow when this happens, and when the country is again at sea and in quest of some new financial method, is almost beyond the field of conjecture.

Our system of currency is one of the boasted results of the war, and, I believe, will stand the crucial test of experience and be sustained by the people. We have the statement of the President of the United States in the message quoted from, "that the currency of the country, based as it is upon the credit of the country, is the best that has ever been devised." In all the panics that have hitherto occurred when the currency was based upon coin immense losses were sustained by the people but in the recent panic the value of the currency was increased, and public confidence in it remained as unshaken as it did in the durability of the Government. Thus experience has demonstrated the soundness of the principle upon which our financial system is founded, and it is the province of wise legislation not to destroy or impair its efficiency, but to sustain, improve, and perfect it. I give it as my opinion that the people of this country will not permit the retirement and cancellation of the legal-tender notes now in circulation.

The title of the act of January 14, 1875, is clearly a misnomer, for there is a practical and well-defined distinction between resumption and redemption. Resumption in banking operations implies in its usual sense, after suspension of specie payments has taken place, an interconvertibility between paper money and coin as a continuous process, while redemption, which is clearly meant by this so-called resumption act, implies that when coin is paid for a promissory note of the Government its function as money has ceased and re-issue of the note is not intended. This is certainly the only legitimate interpretation, and is the one given by the Secretary of the Treasury in his recent report. In this report he says:

> The faith of the Government now stands pledged to resumption on and after January 1, 1879, and to the final redemption and removal from the currency of the country of the legal-tender notes as fast as they shall be presented for redemption, according to the provisions of the act of January 14, 1875.

Who can doubt that the resumption meant is redemption, and redemption a finality to all notes for which coin will be paid? The language of the act is too clear to allow a different interpretation; it says:

> On and after the 1st day of January, A. D. 1879, the Secretary shall redeem in coin the United States notes then outstanding on their presentation for redemption at the office of the assistant treasurer of the United States at New York in sums of not less than $50.

The obligation resting upon the Secretary is imperative. He shall redeem in coin; but no authority is conferred for re-issuing the legal-tender notes. Their fate, if this act is carried into operation, must be the same as that of the $10,000,000 redeemed under the free-banking clause of this act, which we have been officially informed were duly canceled. Redemption must mean precisely the same in both cases.

While I do not arraign the purpose of redemption implied in this act as being inconsistent with the intentions of the acts authorizing the issue of the legal-tender notes, yet I would inquire if it is expedient and necessary that this currency should be wholly retired from circulation? Is such policy demanded by the people as a measure of relief to the disordered industries of the country? It may be by capitalists and moneyed autocrats, by money-lenders and usurers, who expect to profit by the enhancement of the value of their money, but against the purpose of this policy will be arrayed the laboring and agricultural population of the country. The toiling millions who are now studying and investigating this subject for themselves, and who are devoting to it a greater amount of thought and intelligent consideration than was ever before evinced by any people on any subject, are not quite ready to join in this crusade against the legal-tenders.

FREE BANKING.

Some of the advocates of free banking have entertained fears that the repeal of the resumption law would put a stop to the further organization of national banks. This is, however, an error. The only bar to free banking which existed prior to the passage of the resumption law was section 5777 of the Revised Statutes, which limited the circulating notes of national banks to $354,000,000. The third section of the resumption act repealed this restriction, and hence the repeal of the same section of the resumption law will leave banking free from restriction as to the aggregate amount of circulation. In this way, as long as our national-bank act remains in force, the volume of the currency can be kept equal to the "wants of trade." If the volume is insufficient, expansion will occur; if it become redundant, contraction will necessarily take place. Bearing upon this subject, I see no good reason why the banks should not be allowed to issue circulating notes equal in nominal amount to the face of these bonds.

But it may be unwise to intrust the banks with supreme control over all the moneyed interests of the nation. Serious objections are now raised against the power exercised by the banks, and how much more serious must this become when the legal-tender circulation is wholly retired. This would drive out of existence all except a few of the stronger banks, which would become a monopoly. Compelled to meet the storm of financial convulsions and forced to keep on hand a sufficient supply of coin, the great majority of the banks would be continually invested with dangers that might at any moment involve them in ruin. What better security can they have than the legal-tender notes in which their circulation is redeemable? And what better security can the country have against violent contraction or financial disturbances than the legal-tenders, which rest upon a basis as strong as the Government itself?

With a sole reliance upon specie the banks would be compelled to contract their circulation within the narrowest limits or surrender it entirely. But with $370,000,000 of Treasury notes as a permanent currency and a lawful medium of redemption, no serious calamity would be likely to happen the banks, and they could be trusted to supply the country with such additional paper money as its necessities might require.

The experience of the last year or two has clearly shown that the danger of overinflation by the banks is not well founded, and that while they exist, they may be trusted to issue such an amount of circulation as the laws of business and trade may demand. One of the leading objections against the national banks is the unlimited power at their disposal to inflate or contract their circulation; and the only safe check to violent contraction of their currency or serious disturbances that may impair their efficiency and embarrass the business of the country is the outstanding volume of the legal-tenders.

Since the resumption law went into operation about $12,715,795 of bank notes have been issued to old and new banking associations; and during the same period about $33,000,000 of national-bank currency has been retired from circulation, or about $20,000,000 more than issued. Add to this the $10,000,000 of Treasury notes canceled under the operations of the 80 per cent. clause of the act, and we chronicle a total shrinkage of the volume of the currency in one year of over $30,000,000, and still the premium on gold has evinced no downward tendency.

I know that it is maintained by some that this rapid retirement of national-bank currency is an evidence that there is a redundancy of paper money in the country, and hence they argue the necessity of redeeming the greenbacks in order to cure the evil. Coupled with this fact we are reminded that there is a vast sum of idle currency held by the issuers—the banks and the Treasury—amounting to about $180,000,000, a large portion of which, belonging to the banks, is now seeking borrowers at very low rates of interest. While admitting that such is the fact, we can scarcely accept the logic that so much money remains idle because there is too much of it. A few years ago a much larger amount than we have now was actively employed in carrying on the trade and business of the country; and it is safe to assume that, with the revival of our varied industries and the complete restoration of confidence, this idle surplus would soon be absorbed by the public wants and exercise new functions in the work of progress and civilization. The contraction of the currency by millions of dollars monthly will not lessen the amount of unemployed surplus, because no capital will be risked outside of the narrow limits of common necessity. No person will risk money in new undertakings and enterprises when values are constantly depreciating. No person of prudence will contract obligations requiring payment when property is continually shrinking in value while money grows scarcer and more costly. Interest may be unusually low in the commercial centers of the country, but it is because borrowers are not readily found who are willing to commit financial suicide.

Senator SHERMAN, the father and defender of the resumption act, in his late speech in the Senate says:

> The practice of hoarding currency has greatly increased from the day of the panic, and it may be safely said that there is among the people and in savings-banks and trust companies not less than $200,000,000 of currency idle. Nothing but the best security will tempt it from its hiding-place; but, that security offered, it can be had for a less rate of interest than ever before.

He tells us very coolly that this state of paralysis in the business of the country, this hoarding of idle and unproductive money, is only awaiting the advent of resumption, after which time he predicts money will become more abundant. But what is to become of the people and the country during the next five or ten years while resumption is approaching? According to his theory nearly half of the currency of the country is to remain hoarded and useless till resumption is practically accomplished. He says again in his speech that—

> There has been a contraction of the currency since the panic, and before and after the passage of the act of 1875, which will go on whenever in any way a specie standard approaches, and that is by the voluntary retirement by national banks of a portion of their circulating notes.

And he further states:

> Sir, in my judgment, the real solution of specie resumption will thus come through the voluntary act of national banks, each acting for itself, under the general direction of the law, precisely as the Bank of England, the Bank of France, and the New York banks brought about and maintained resumption.

The road to resumption is now plainly marked out. First, the legal tenders are to be "redeemed and removed from the currency of the country;" and, secondly, the national banks are to be forced to the inevitable necessity of retiring their currency by wholesale, each of the twenty-one hundred banks being required to reduce its circulation to correspond with the amount of gold it may be able to hoard up for the redemption of its notes. Already many of the banks are becoming alarmed and are threatening the voluntary retirement of their circulation, and if it becomes clearly understood that the resumptive feature of this act is to remain unrepealed, contraction will proceed at a rate more rapid than the most sanguine resumptionist has yet contemplated. But while this is going on we should not be deluded with the idea that these twenty-one hundred banks will ever reach specie payments by dividing the responsibility among themselves, but they may surrender their circulation and cease to be banks of issue. This is not a pleasant picture to contemplate. It indicates that resumption must be reached over a hard, long, and rugged road, which will be strewn with the wrecks of fortune, and along which every mile-stone is a measure of misery and hardship.

ANOTHER PROPOSITION.

While the liquidation of the legal-tender notes is going on, it is proposed that the national banks shall prepare for resumption by laying up for an indefinite time, five or ten years, the coin interest on their bonds. This they will not be likely to do, neither can they be forced to do it. The interest on their bonds constitutes a large portion of their profits, and goes to the stockholders as a part of the dividends. The suspension of so much capital locked up for years is a loss of profits and operates as a tax upon the banks. They paid the Government last year $7,300,000 of tax, and besides are heavily taxed by States, counties, municipalities, and the redemption agency. The annual amount of dividends, according to the report of the Comptroller of the Currency, is less than 10 per cent. on capital and 8 per cent. upon capital and surplus. Under this compulsory requirement national banking would cease to be profitable, and, the banks being voluntary associations, they would withdraw their bonds and retire their circulation. No national bank can be compelled to have a larger circulation than $45,000, and may even lock this up in its vaults. The 30 per cent. of coin required to be kept on hand would not exceed $15,000. The result of the liquidation of the greenbacks and forcing the banks to specie payments would eliminate from the circulation of the country over $300,000,000 of national-bank notes. The practical result of this policy would be the withdrawal from circulation of about $700,000,000 of national-bank notes and legal-tenders, leaving the country without a circulating medium and the people with a national and corporate indebtedness to pay of more than $4,000,000,000, which was contracted upon a stupendous inflation of currency. The effect of this policy, if carried out to the letter, can be more easily imagined than described.

But, it may be argued, why not make it obligatory upon the banks at the same time it is upon the Government to hoard annually 3 per cent. of the gold interest upon their bonds as a preparation for resumption, and thus release for circulation an equal amount of their lawful reserve? To this it may be answered: First, that this would put no more money into circulation than under the present arrangement, because the interest on the bonds held by the banks is annually drawn and released; second, before this preparation for resumption could be matured a majority of the bank charters would have expired and their business be wound-up: this the banks would have to do in the manner now provided by law; and, third, while the 30 per cent. of gold which the banks would be required to accumulate in ten years might make a beginning toward resumption, it would give no assurance whatever that the banks would be able to maintain resumption with their present outstanding circulation and under the liabilities they are submitted to. And when we add to what has been stated the uncertainty that hangs over the future with reference to the banking system, the instability of the gold supply, the periodical disturbances in the gold markets of the world, and the vast demand for gold abroad, to pay our interest and commercial obligations, the policy of requiring the banks to hoard gold I fear will not do otherwise than work serious injury to the vital interests of the people.

While it cannot be denied that our Treasury notes are a part of the national debt and that they originated in the emergencies of war, as a national necessity, yet for fourteen years they have performed admirably the functions and office of a safe and satisfactory medium of exchange. They rose and fell in value according to the success and failure of battles. At the close of the war they rapidly appreciated in value, and only a small chasm now marks the difference between their value and gold. This chasm, with or without any contraction of the legal-tender notes, never will become any wider than it now is, unless the financial legislation of this country is characterized by a lack of wisdom and statesmanship unworthy of the age in which we live.

Though the legal-tender circulation was born amid the emergencies of a gigantic war that sorely tried the power and energies of the nation to supply the necessary subsistence and means to maintain its armies, yet fourteen years of trial has abundantly demonstrated its popularity, its vitality, and efficiency as a safe and sound currency. Based upon the faith and credit of the nation and backed by the will of the people, there is no substantial reason why this form of money should be supplanted by the present or any other banking system.

Some of those who are anxious to have the greenbacks redeemed and eliminated from the currency of the country still insist upon invidious comparisons between them and the French assignats and the Continental currency. In only one or two respects is the comparison legitimate. In all other respects it fails, because the circumstances that give value to and sustain our present currency are widely different from those pertaining to the French assignats and the Continental money. There is a similarity in the fact that the French assignats, Continental scrip, and our greenbacks were issued in the emergencies of war and revolutions, and that they performed similar functions in enabling each nation to gather its energies and hurl defiance at its enemies. Beyond this all comparison ceases. The assignats were issued as the paper currency of the French revolution and made redeemable by the sale of confiscated estates of clergymen and emigrants. The amount issued altogether was 45,578,000,000 francs, a sum nearly equal to $9,000,000,000, or almost twenty-five times as great as our greenback circulation. France then had a population estimated at about twenty-six millions and a half, or a little more than half of the present population of the United States. The circulation of her irredeemable paper amounted to $340 per capita. Our present greenback circulation is only about $8 per capita. Under the throes of revolution France severed her monarchial relations and became nominally a republic. The new republic was born in an hour and based upon the most extravagant ideas of freedom, and the people were a frantic multitude incapable of self-government.

These are the circumstances under which the French assignats were issued. How shadowy and flimsy the basis upon which they rested compared with the solid and enduring foundation that supports our greenbacks? The resources of France, too, at that time were limited compared with this country. If we turn to the colonies we will find that the comparison is but little better. Their population was about 3,000,000 when the Continental scrip was at a ruinous discount. The issues of this money amounted to not less than $300,000,000, or about $100 per capita. The colonial government was a loose confederation of States with limited resources—insignificant compared with our present national wealth—and the people were in a state of war, struggling for liberty against the most powerful adversary in the world. The colonies had no fleets or navies, no commerce with foreign states, and had not even the power of taxation to raise revenues. Under these circumstances they had a paper circulation of $300,000,000, or about twelve and a half times as much per capita as this Government has now of greenbacks.

While these facts clearly show the unsubstantial basis upon which the assignats and continental currency rested and the reasons for their failure and repudiation, the comparison with our present currency and its basis presents such a contrast as dissipates in a moment all fears of a similar calamity, and re-assures us that our greenbacks rest upon the safest foundation in the world. They conducted the country safely through the war, and have passed triumphantly through the critical period of re-action, the panic of 1873. We may now, I think, safely consider that no catastrophe short of national dismemberment can seriously derange their value while the amount in circulation is no greater per capita than at present.

After giving the subject as much consideration as my time and circumstances have permitted, and having examined the various plans that have been proposed to remedy our financial troubles, I have come to the conclusion, first, that no public necessity exists for the redemption of the legal-tender notes; secondly, that their redemption is not a measure that will afford any sort of financial relief; and, thirdly, so long as they perform so well and satisfactorily the functions of money, they should not be retired from circulation, unless it becomes evident in the future that a better system of currency can be devised to supplant it.

In order to enhance the value of the greenback the Government should place it upon the same footing as gold for all domestic purposes, not including interest on bonds made by law payable in gold. If through timidity or doubt it is deemed unadvisable to do this at once, let Congress enact that one-third or one-half of the duties on imports be paid in legal-tenders on and after the 1st of July next, and in a year or two the entire amount. It is better to take some risk in this direction than to shrink from any action tending to equalize the purchasing power of paper and coin.

I repudiate the idea, sir, that this great nation, with only $370,000,000 of legal-tender notes, is incapable of accomplishing such a result. It would be a sad commentary upon our boasted progress if this nation of 45,000,000 of people, active, enterprising, and industrious, with developed wealth estimated at $30,000,000,000 and undeveloped resources that are incalculable, with mines and placers of the precious metals that exceed by far "the wealth of Ormus or of Ind," cannot make the value of its present limited amount of outstanding legal-tenders equal to par with gold. Why, sir, I am informed that we have gold and silver enough in Nevada, within the radius of a few miles, to redeem all our paper currency, legal-tenders and bank-notes. While nature has lavishly bestowed upon this country advantages and resources essential to the highest attainments of physical greatness and the grandest achievements of civilization, she has also made it the chief depository of the precious metals for the world; but our policy has become such that we produce them for the use of other nations, and not for our own domestic purposes. While experience has taught us the absurdity of trusting too much to gold and silver, yet we should never permit our commercial and debtor relations to foreign powers to be such as will drain our resources of these metals.

While I hold it is practicable to bring in the course of a few years our paper currency to par with gold without contraction, yet it must be a long time before it can be made convertible with gold, for the reason that a sufficient amount of gold for this purpose cannot be accumulated and maintained. Continuous resumption of specie payments upon our present volume of currency is absolutely impossible. It is questionable whether it could be sustained on a circulation of over $300,000,000. To contract the currency down to this point would work insufferable hardships. It would squeeze the entire business of the country down to the small handful of gold we are able under present circumstances to retain in it. The only feasible plan is to attempt to equalize the value of the coin and currency by methods that do not necessarily imply convertibility. I shall attempt to show that this is practicable, and if accomplished would give the country a more stable system of finance than we have hitherto enjoyed.

Resumption of specie payments cannot be maintained with the present enormous indebtedness of the country and foreign exportations of coin to pay interest. Our national interest-bearing debt now amounts to about $1,700,000,000, and the gold interest paid abroad annually is about $60,000,000, only a few millions of dollars less than the largest annual product of our mines; yet it is proposed by some to convert nearly $400,000,000 of non-interest-bearing debt into interest-bearing bonds, which would increase the annual amount of gold interest about $20,000,000 more. The legal-tenders being removed, the banks would be forced to the necessity of procuring gold to resume with and maintain resumption, or, in other words, of borrowing perhaps $300,000,000 more.

The plan of hoarding gold in the Treasury until it amounts to 30 per cent. of the outstanding legal-tender notes, with the view of resumption, is a scheme that must fail till the demands for gold abroad have been materially diminished. We pay abroad annually $60,000,000 on United States bonds, $35,000,000 interest on railroad and other corporate securities, and about $75,000,000 for the sinking fund and on other bonds; add to this other demands for gold to go abroad, and the whole amount will not be less than $200,000,000. The Treasury would become the great gold-room of the country, taking the place of the gold-boards of New York and California, whither all would resort who wanted gold. Merchants, importers, bankers, traders, speculators, and travelers would draw their supplies of gold from the Treasury. The 30 per cent. would be swept away by an equal amount of Treasury notes which if re-issued would leave resumption still as problematical and as uncertain as it now is.

The plan adopted by the Bank of France of hoarding gold and paying out none is the only feasible way of preparing for resumption with coin. This is, I presume, the idea embraced in the first section of the bill introduced in this House by Mr. PAYNE. The gold will be hoarded and maintained for an indefinite time, till the amount becomes so large and the demand abroad for gold so small that the Treasury can be replenished by gold as rapidly as it will be withdrawn. If assurance could be given that this would fully accomplish the purpose intended, of bringing the legal-tender notes to par, no serious objection could be opposed to it. We would have, like the Bank of France, a mountain of gold lying behind the legal-tender notes to impart to them a coin value. In this case the paper currency would form a most perfect medium of exchange, superior to gold and silver for all purposes. If the paper could be thus kept at a par value it would make but little difference whether or not it was ever made convertible into gold. One objection would be urged against this plan and that is the loss of interest on the coin; but the expected enhancement in the value of the legal-tender notes would compensate for this to some extent. Some inconvenience and loss could be patiently borne if it rested upon the assurance that such means would equalize the value of the paper and coin dollar and make them interconvertible at the pleasure of the holder. But France has not relied solely upon the hoarding of gold, but has wisely made her paper currency a legal-tender for all purposes. It pays duties on imports as well as taxes, debts, &c., and circulates on equality with coin.

But I apprehend there will be difficulty in sustaining this hoarding process a sufficient time to bring about the desired results and to maintain resumption on so large a circulation. It is safe to assume that convertibility can never take place between coin and paper so long as the outflow of gold remains unchecked. The shortest step to resumption is any policy that will arrest the foreign demand for gold and equalize the exports and importations of this commodity. A wiser plan would be to use all surplus funds in the payment of the principal of our interest-bearing debt, and by national economy and retrenchment. If our legal-tender notes could, by these or other means, be brought to par, they would constitute by far a safer and better currency than any bank-paper based upon specie.

The history of the world for two hundred years is a record of endless failures in the attempt to regulate the equality between the paper and coin dollar through the agency of banks. Panics have been common and periodical occurrences. During these financial convulsions, the losses, direct and indirect, have been several times greater in amount than all the specie in the world. The Comptroller of the Currency in his last report states that this loss under the old banking systems in this country, when specie was at the bottom of all credits, amounted in twenty years to the whole amount of banking circulation, of about 5 per cent. per annum.

Hon. R. M. T. Hunter, of Virginia, in a recent discussion on the financial question, has presented this matter in a true light. He says:

> Surely the world has suffered long enough under these evils. Are we bound to repeat them? Are there no other means by which the legal dollar and the dollar of exchange may be made to vibrate more nearly together? Is the interest or capital and the quantity of currency afloat to be measured by some crotchet in the brain of a bank director, or by the natural laws of trade and the exigencies of society? Surely these things ought to be regulated by the last, if possible. The whole circle of human production and the fortunes of society ought not to be dependent on the question of more or less specie afloat in the world.
>
> If we go in debt on a credit standard of value and pay on a specie standard, we pay more than we have received, which is not only a violation of justice, but an obstacle to progress; but if we measure our debts by a paper dollar from any convertibility in specie and pay with dollars of specie, we certainly do pay in a medium more valuable than that which we give to the promise to pay of the latter, that is to say, of the payment on the thing itself. We take promise of the bank to pay specie at par, and we can offer nothing in redemption of our promise but specie itself. If we receive by a credit measure of value, why not pay in the same medium? In a well-governed country the credit of the state is the highest known form. The credit of the government of Great Britain or the United States is worth more than the promise of an bank to pay specie.

These views, so succinctly stated, embody not only incontrovertible facts but also hav direct reference to the condition of this country. Our nation is a debtor both at home and abroad, and these debts were contracted on a paper medium, depreciated in value; and we, the people, are now asked to pay them with another medium of greater value.

I quote further from the same excellent address:

> The people would be unable to pay their debts, not because they were without the agencies of production, natural and artificial, necessary for the creation of wealth, or to return in value all they ever received, but because they were demanded to pay on a standard of money of perhaps five or six times the value of that according to which they received. War has necessarily destroyed many of the values which once constituted their means of support. Is not this grievance enough, or is it to be aggravated by suffering still more intense, imposed by Government in time of peace as a necessary consequence? To whom is this debt due? In almost every community the creditors, as a class, saw less of the actual suffering of war than the debtor, and therefore are not entitled to special indulgence or peculiar privilege. In the nation at large these debts are mainly due to the northern cities, Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and were contracted on a paper standard far more inflated than the standard even as at present constituted.

It is true, as here stated, that a vast amount of this indebtedness is due these moneyed centers; and this may explain why the capitalists who control them are so deeply interested in the hasty resumption of specie payments. We have been told that interest is low in New York and other eastern cities, but it is now and has been otherwise in the West. Why is it, sir, that in order to obtain money a vast number of the land-owners in the West have been compelled to mortgage their farms to insurance companies at an average rate of 10 per cent. interest, besides additional costs? What proportion of these will ever be able to redeem their lands under the shrinkage of values and the disturbance and loss in business that must be inevitable if the resumption law is not repealed? The lands have diminished in value, with a shrinkage already of 20 to 50 per cent., and if submitted to a forced sale would be totally consumed by judgment and costs. No worse policy can be adopted or greater crime ever be committed by any government than by legislation which discriminates in favor of the moneyed aristocracy as against its laboring and agricultural population.

Hon. R. M. T. Hunter, who formerly belonged to the Andrew Jackson and Benton school of politics, which recognized nothing but hard money, recommends the following plan to raise the value of the legal-tender notes, namely:

> The legal-tender notes I would make interchangeable with a Government stock bearing a rate of interest which would make it equal to par in specie. The national-bank notes I would gradually call in and cancel, and supply their place with legal-tenders, so that the amount of currency, $750,000,000, should continue to be afloat. To call in the bank-notes, I would provide that one-half of the customs-dues should be payable either in legal-tenders or bank-notes; the bank-notes taken to be converted into United States stocks now deposited to redeem it at their market value. * * *
>
> To the extent that these bank-notes were called in and canceled, I would allow the Government to issue legal-tenders, interconvertible, as before described, with a United States stock bearing sufficient interest to raise it to par in specie, receivable as heretofore on public dues and for one-half the customs duties. That this entire amount is not too great for currency in the United States has been proved, I think, by actual experience, and if occasion for more should ever come, we may safely leave it to that future day to decide for itself.
>
> But it may be said the legal-tenders in time of peace, and without some manifest necessity, cannot be issued without a violation of the Constitution. If so, the good which might be effected by such a power through the currency would justify an amendment to the Constitution. This might be accomplished by giving Congress either a power to issue an unlimited amount of legal-tender notes, or a power in proportion to the population of the country at the last census before the issue. But should this be deemed inadmissible, the bank-notes might be canceled and an equivalent amount of United States bonds deposited to secure them could be redeemed, and an equal amount of notes re-issued; the said notes to be interconvertible with United States stock at a rate of interest payable in specie, which would make that stock at par with specie. The whole currency of the country would then be at par with specie, and its amount would be regulated, not by human hopes and fears or a mere arbitrary discretion, but by the actual wants of trade. If we attain this, what more do we desire?

These views, so well expressed, do not differ essentially from the opinions of many others, and are gaining ground rapidly in this country. They have met with opposition and ridicule from those wedded to the fossilized notions on finance, and who are unwilling to believe there is anything new under the sun.

Senator SHERMAN, in his recent speech in the Senate, seems to hold to similar views with those expressed by Hon. R. M. T. Hunter. He says:

I am one of those who believe that a United States note issued directly by the Government, and convertible on demand into gold coin or a Government bond equal in value to gold, is the best currency we can adopt; that it is to be the currency of the future not only in the United States but in Great Britain as well; and that such a currency might properly continue to be a legal tender, except when coin is specifically stipulated for.

But while he admits all this, which meets the views of the most radical advocate of greenbacks, by some strange inconsistency he recommends the policy of selling bonds for gold to take up the greenbacks and thus remove them from the currency of the country. His prediction that the greenback will be the future currency of the country is well grounded, if we can judge of the wonderful popularity that doctrine is attaining in the West and South and the progress it is now making in the East.

The question of resumption should be considered in reference to our two classes of national indebtedness. One class is the interest-bearing obligations of the Government, chiefly gold bonds, a greater part of which is held abroad; the other, the non-interest indebtedness represented by our legal-tender currency. The practical question is, which shall be paid first? Here we have before us two distinct lines of policy. We must either pay off the interest-bearing debt or increase it about $400,000,000 by paying off the non-interest debt. We are clearly unable to pay both at once. One debt is held abroad, and the interest on it has become a grievous burden to the people; the other is the domestic debt, which costs no interest. There is only one rational course to pursue, and that is to dispose of the bonded debt first and let the other, represented by the legal-tenders, remain with the people.

If the people, while paying off a debt which by its interest is eating out the vitality of the nation, choose to hold in abeyance a debt that costs nothing, who is cheated or defrauded? Who is dishonored? Have we not heard enough about the Government dishonoring its promises by refusing to pay them? Are not the people and the Government the same? Are they not responsible for all obligations created by the Government? If the people take the wiser course of reducing first the principal of the bonded debt, on which they have already paid in interest over $1,000,000,000, who is dishonored thereby? It is now apparent that this generation cannot permit this heavy interest-bearing debt to remain unpaid. It cannot certainly indulge further in the suicidal policy of creating similar obligations.

The question of interest lies at the foundation of all our financial troubles, and we must strike at the root of the evil. Let us solemnly declare that not another United States bond shall ever be sold abroad. Let us cease troubling ourselves about the greenbacks. They will take care of themselves, or the people will, if we cease all this unnatural and ill-begotten concern about them. Let us be more concerned for ourselves, by taking the earliest steps and surest means of lessening the enormous interest that is crippling our prosperity. This is the only way in which resumption of specie payments will ever be obtained. How soon or how late this will happen is a question that need not disturb us, because its solution will depend on contingencies that cannot be foretold.

The redemption of the legal-tenders should be made entirely subordinate to the great debt that overshadows the nation, and is the bane that is sapping its energies and prostrating its industries.

Under present circumstances it is not possible for this Government to have a better currency than the legal-tenders. As they are not payable at any fixed time, and as the Government is wholly unable without oppression to the people to take care of both classes of indebtedness at once, there is no sound reason why they should not be the money of the country for an indefinite time, if not forever. A strong conviction is gradually forming in the minds of the best thinkers in favor of the legal-tender system, as constituting the only safe and philosophical mode for a true paper currency. The time is rapidly approaching when it will become the great issue in American politics.

The amount of our paper currency in circulation at this time exceeds $760,000,000, and, on the assumption that the population of the country is about 45,000,000, will give about $17 per capita. This is a much larger amount, according to population, than was in circulation prior to the late war. There are some who think that the volume should be increased to a greater sum per capita, but I think there are substantial reasons why it should not be increased. This grows out of the practice now becoming universal in all great commercial countries; of transacting nearly all business involving considerable amounts in bank-checks, certificates, and bills of exchange.

According to the statement of the manager of the New York Clearing-House Association for October, 1875, the ratio of currency required to pay daily balances amounted to less than 5 per cent. of the total transactions. It is safe to say in all the commercial cities of the Union that not more than 6 or 8 per cent. of the sum-total of business is effected with currency. In the rural districts and sparsely-settled sections of the country the proportion of currency required is much larger. This fact is clearly exemplified at the redemption agency by simple inspection of the notes returned, which shows that those from the large cities of the East are much less worn and defaced than those from the western banks.

Without attempting to speculate upon financial issues that belong to the future, I submit the following as the most rational and practicable mode for the solution of our monetary problem and the best means by which resumption of specie payments may be attained:

1. Repeal of the third section of the resumption law of January 14, 1875.

2. That all surplus funds coming into the Treasury should be applied to the steady reduction of the principal of the interest-bearing national debt as it becomes due.

3. That the non-interest debt should remain in abeyance, its redemption being held subordinate to the liquidation of the interest obligations.

4. That the further issue and sale of United States bonds shall be prohibited, and no bonded liabilities be hereafter assumed by the Government.

5. That the expenditures of the Government shall be limited to the actual necessities of the public service.

6. That there shall be no contraction or expansion of the currency by legislation.

7. That the Treasury notes or greenbacks should be made a full legal tender in payment of all dues to the Government and made interchangeable with a Government stock bearing sufficient interest to make them of par value with gold.

The resumption of specie payments, without imposing direful calamity, can only be made practicable and be maintained by a material reduction of our national interest-bearing debt, and such other measures as will diminish the foreign demand for gold, or by some change in our commercial relations with foreign countries that will enable us to pay a large portion of our debt abroad by exports of the products of our industry and by the influx of gold to our shores equal to or greater than the amount sent away. Resumption then may be promoted by restoration of confidence, by such means as will revive the various industries of the country, and by retrenchment and economy in all public expenses. Adam Smith asserts that—

The quantity of money in every country naturally increases as the value of the annual produce increases. The value of the consumable goods annually circulated within the society being greater will require a greater quantity of money to circulate them.

If this proposition is true its converse must likewise be true, namely: If from any cause the quantity of money in the country is moderately in excess of the uses required of it, that increased productions of the country in all its industrial pursuits would sooner or later create a demand for all the money.

In urging the repeal of the resumption act and in the general discussion of the question, I have not sought to introduce any new or speculative notions concerning money. I have not sought to demonetize gold, but to recommend a policy that will advance our paper money to par value with coin, which it represents. I have not gone outside of the law or the Constitution. The statutes of the United States define what a dollar is, namely, 25.8 grains of gold, nine-tenths fine, and that each of our paper dollars is a promise of the Government to pay a dollar; that is the lawful dollar of the country. But while the Government is not able to pay coin for its paper currency, and thus redeem its promises, it should do the next best thing possible, and that is to make its paper dollar equal in value or purchasing power with coin. This is the first and most important step that can be taken in preparation for the general resumption of specie payments. The Supreme Court has forever set at rest the question relating to the nature of our paper currency by declaring "that the dollar note is an agreement to pay a dollar, and the dollar intended is the coin dollar of the United States, a certain quantity in weight and fineness of gold and silver authenticated as such by the stamp of the Government."

I oppose the opinion of those who promulgate the doctrine that the stamp of the Government on any substance of intrinsic value, as gold or silver, confers upon it a new and different value. The clear and explicit declaration of Blackstone cannot be improved. He says:

The coinage of money is the act of sovereign power that its value may be known on inspection. Every nation fixes on its own impression, that the weight and standard wherein consists the intrinsic value may be known.

He further states that—

The king's prerogative seemeth not to extend to the debasing or enhancing the value of the coin below or above the sterling value.

While gold, like all other commodities, is subject to fluctuations in value, yet it is our constitutional measure of value, and there is no good reason why we should abandon it in quest of something better. The discovery of the gold mines of South America in the sixteenth century caused a depreciation of the value of gold to one-third of what it had previously been; and the discovery of the gold mines of California likewise caused a similar decline. Yet gold is the common currency of the world, and is used to effect exchanges between nations. Our paper money, being promises to pay gold, should be made equal in usefulness to what it represents. We cannot establish a monetary system on any other basis, neither is it desirable if we could.

The public mind is in the utmost state of confusion in regard to a proper solution of our financial difficulties. While one class of politicians declares hostility to the legal-tenders, and asserts that no substantial prosperity can exist till they are swept out of existence, another, active and progressive, has inaugurated a revolution in favor of them as against all banks, declaring that the future salvation of the country, financially speaking, can only be secured by the greenback policy. If the doctrine is true that revolutions never go backward, we need not be surprised if this country is now on the broad highway and rapid march to a financial system that will be in accordance with the progressive spirit of the age and adapted to the great ends of civilization.

River and Harbor Improvements.

SPEECH OF HON. GEORGE G. DIBRELL,

OF TENNESSEE,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

April 8, 1876,

On the subject of river and harbor improvements.

Mr. DIBRELL. Mr. Speaker, it has been the policy of the United States Government since the establishment of our national existence from time to time to make liberal appropriations to improve our rivers and harbors and to open up our great thoroughfares to facilitate commerce and navigation and to afford cheap transportation to the citizens of this growing and prosperous country.

This policy has developed vast sections of country in the West and Northwest that now appear to be the most flourishing and prosperous part of this continent. And without this liberal policy on the part of the General Government and the large sums expended in behalf of their works of internal improvement the great Northwest would be greatly behind her present greatness in point of commerce, wealth, and population. The liberal appropriations by Congress of money to open the rivers and lakes and other improvements has had a wonderful effect in developing the great resources of the Northwest; so much so that they are outstripping many of the older States in all the elements of wealth and prosperity and in commerce and navigation.

The subject of internal improvements by the General Government has been discussed amply and is one upon which parties in former days differed widely. It is now conceded on all sides that the Government not only has the right, but that it is the duty of the General Government to provide cheap transportation for the commerce of the country by aid in the opening up of our rivers, aiding in constructing railroads, and otherwise. The policy has so far become a national one that now it would be suicidal upon some sections of the country to abandon that policy. She has aided in opening rivers, building railroads, establishing telegraphic lines, and many other grand improvements that have proved to be great national blessings.

Many of our former statesmen were opposed to the internal-improvement policy by the General Government. This was particularly so with a large class of the members of Congress formerly representing the Southern States. Consequently, they would not, or did not, ask Congress for appropriations to improve our rivers, thus opening up our great highways to the markets of the world. The result is that, while millions of money have been expended upon the rivers, harbors, and railroads of the North and the Northwest, scarcely anything has been expended for like purposes in the South. The fault of this is not with the people of the North and Northwest, but is with our own people, for not demanding what they had a right to demand, the fostering care of the General Government in developing their section in like manner as it had done other sections, and what I have no doubt would long since have been granted had the necessary efforts been made and the great advantages of the country to be developed been made known to Congress. It is not the interest, nor do I believe it is the wish of any patriotic citizen of this great country of ours to make any distinction in legislation or to give any one section undue advantages over another; but to build up all alike, throw the strong arm of the Government around all alike, and bind us together in bonds of love and fraternal feeling, and make us as one people, having in view but one object, the glory and prosperity of the whole country. No American citizen can look back at our past history without rejoicing at our great progress, and none can comprehend the future. This being the centennial year, when we look back but half a century and see the vast improvements made in our commerce, in the arts and sciences, and in the agricultural and manufacturing interests of the country, our great rivers and lakes dotted by vessels from all the nations of the earth, and our railroads extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific, all bearing the commerce of the country, well may we exclaim that America is the greatest country in the world and Americans are the best people in the world.

The country has been thrice amply paid for every dollar expended by Congress in developing the resources and material interests of the country. Every national improvement has been a blessing to the country; and the people enjoying the especial benefit of such improvements always express a grateful appreciation of such help. It proves to the honest tax-payer that he is to derive some benefit from his hard-earned taxes and that his country is mindful of his wants. For what more laudable purpose could we contribute our taxes and revenues than to be expended in the developing and improving our common country. Who is benefited more by such legislation than the honest farmers, mechanics, and laboring-men of the country? Then if they are benefited we are all benefited. The merchant, the lawyer, and even the politician are all dependent, either directly or indirectly, upon the success of the agricultural interests of the country. Every other branch of business falls back directly upon the agricultural resources of the country, and unless they prosper no other branch of business can last long. The laboring-men of the country who produce the corn, the wheat, the cotton, and the tobacco of the country are the stays upon which our vast population depend for food and raiment, and without them we would be without a country; they are the main stays, the pillars of our common country, and any legislation looking to their pecuniary interests should always be granted. And what is calculated to give them more encouragement than to open up our great rivers and highways so that they may be furnished cheap transportation for their surplus products to the best markets? And when they are thus benefited every other branch of business will in like manner be benefited. The farmers, the miners, and the manufacturers pay the bulk of the enormous taxes under which the country is now groaning on everything they eat, on everything they wear, and in fact on everything consumed by them. Then why should Congress not expend large sums to enhance the value of their products, to develop the material interests of their country, and to afford them cheap transportation to a ready market for all of their supplies? And I believe that this can be done as well in opening up our rivers by making improvements therein that will open up cheap transportation as in any other way that a public improvement can be made.

It is not strange that in many parts of the country our people are restless and dissatisfied, and are complaining of the enormous taxes paid, none of which is ever returned to them in the shape of public improvements or anything of the kind; but they know that their hard-earned taxes are taken to feed an army of office-holders seventy-five or eighty thousand strong, many of whom are paid enormous salaries for very small amount of labor, and many holding sinecure offices with liberal pay and no labor; and the usual daily labor of an official is six hours per day, while the laboring-men of the country are compelled to labor from sunrise until sunset, with a very small reward for such hard labor. Another source of complaint is that their hard-earned wages is taken from them in the shape of taxes to be used in paying to the rich bondholder or banker the interest upon his bonds, upon which he pays no taxes. This is a great source of complaint, and I wonder that our Government ever committed so grave a blunder as to omit taxing these bonds. The average profit of each national bank is from 20 to 30 thirty per cent. per annum, their net earnings for the last fiscal year exceeding $58,000,000 upon a capital of $200,316,000. When they paid into the Treasury in the shape of taxes the modest sum of $7,200,000, their net profits of fifty-eight millions is declared, after deducting all taxes, costs, and charges; and with all this advantage the bondholder and money-lender are not satisfied, but are seeking to draw the knot closer around the laboring classes of the country until they will become but hewers of wood and drawers of water for the moneyed men of the country.

Another source of complaint is our internal-revenue laws, which greatly oppress the poor and build up monopolies for the rich. Look at the enormous tax collected during the past year upon the article of tobacco of about $39,000,000, when the value of the entire crop is estimated at only $40,000,000. It is said tobacco is a luxury and ought to bear a heavy tax. Is the use of tobacco as great a luxury as it is to be a banker or bondholder making 25 per cent. per annum upon his capital and paying no taxes? Be just and deal fairly with those upon whom we depend for the mainstays of our existence, and with the very men who never fail to respond to their country's call in times of danger. Give us temperate laws that can be obeyed; let taxation be equal and fair; let every branch of business bear its burdens; let the resources of the whole country be developed; and my word for it in another half century the world never saw such a country as this.

By reference to House bill No. 487, which I had the honor to introduce, it will be seen that it asks for the sum of $700,000 for the improvement of the Tennessee River at the Muscle Shoals; $150,000 above the Muscle Shoals; also $50,000 for the improvement of the Hiwassee River. The Tennessee River is the sixth in size of all the rivers in the United States, and is, in my judgment, the second in importance to any in the country, draining, as it does, a territory of thirty thousand square miles, rich in soil, rich in minerals, and with a climate unsurpassed by any on this continent. Yet with all these advantages the Tennessee is as two rivers—the great Muscle Shoals, in the State of Alabama, cutting it in twain, as far as navigation is concerned. These shoals are about twenty-seven miles in length. There are now at work upon the channel around these shoals, which I am informed is twelve feet deep and eighty feet wide, about nine hundred hands, and by the 1st day of June next the contractors are to have nine of the twenty-seven miles of said canal or channel finished, being one-third of the entire distance. And by that time the appropriations heretofore made will have been exhausted, and it is of the utmost importance that this Congress shall make a liberal appropriation to continue the work, or there is danger of great damage and loss by failing to do so. It is impossible for steamboats to ascend the shoals except at very high tide, and then at great risk; and flats and keels can only descend in like tides, and always with great danger and frequently with great loss.

The Tennessee River is upon an average from six hundred to one thousand yards wide; is navigable for steamboats, flats, and keels a distance of ten to twelve hundred miles, with numerous tributaries above the shoals, navigable for small steamers, flats, &c. It has no sand-bars, but a rock and gravel bottom easily improved, and when once improved it is an improvement that will last for all time to come.

There are now eleven steamboats plying in its waters above the Muscle Shoals, doing a thriving business, besides numerous flats, keels, and other crafts, and if the obstructions at the Muscle Shoals were out of the way, it would be one of the grandest water thoroughfares in America, flowing as it does from the lofty mountains of Western Virginia and North Carolina, which are full of minerals, through the full length of East Tennessee, "the Switzerland of America," passing along the northern line of the State of Georgia, through North Alabama, West Tennessee, and Kentucky into the Ohio River, traversing a magnificent agricultural country.

The Tennessee River bottoms, as well as those of all of her tributaries, are of a rich alluvial soil, producing corn, wheat, cotton, tobacco, &c., in great perfection. The amount of produce of various kinds shipped up and down the Tennessee and transported south by railroad from Chattanooga and Decatur is immense. From the city of Chattanooga alone there is twenty million bushels of grain annually shipped south, a large part of which is raised or produced in the Northwestern States and shipped south by railroad for want of water navigation over the Muscle Shoals. If these shoals were removed nearly all of the produce of the Northwest would flow South via the Ohio, the Wabash, the Missouri, and the Mississippi and other streams, up the Tennessee to the proper shipping point to supply the demands in North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Florida, and Mississippi, thus saving to the producers by this cheap water navigation from 10 to 20 per cent. upon the coast of shipping his supplies to a southern market, enough in itself to in a few years repay the cost of removing said obstructions, as all will agree that water transportation is much cheaper than railroad. Then in addition to the advantages to be derived by the farmers and producers of the country by opening this stream and affording cheap transportation and travel for their products to a ready market, the great advantages to be derived by the whole country from opening up this great highway, to the millions of minerals lying loose and wasting in our country, only awaiting the blow of the sturdy miner to prepare them for the markets of the world.

There is not a country in the world richer in minerals with so many advantages combined incident to manufacturing, as is East Tennessee. A geological survey of the State of Tennessee shows that the table plateau in said State which borders on and is convenient to the Tennessee River, contains five thousand square miles of coal, most of which is of a very superior character, and can be used in manufacturing iron, direct from the mines, without the expense of coking; then in convenient distance is the limestone for fluxing, sandstone and fire clay for furnaces, splendid water-powers, and mountains of iron ore as fine as can be found in America.

The stone coal is from two to six miles from the river, while the iron ore is found in every hill around the city of Chattanooga, on the banks of the river, and all up the river for hundreds of miles. Furnaces may be erected every five miles on the north side of the river that would be convenient for iron, coal, limestone, and all the ingredients used in the manufacture of iron.

The manufacture of pig-iron at Rockwood, and the blast-furnaces and rolling-mills at Chattanooga, are grand successes and paying investments, and with water transportation East Tennessee can compete with the world in the manufacture of iron, as the following figures will show, they being extracts from a letter of George T. Lewis, esq., an experienced and extensive manufacturer of iron in Tennessee, addressed to Ex-Governor R. M. Patton, of Alabama, and whose statements are fully verified by those of General John T. Wilder, one of the founders of Rockwood and the other great iron industries in East Tennessee, both of whom are gentlemen of unimpeachable veracity.

The cost per ton of manufacturing iron in—

Eastern Pennsylvania	$29 63
Central Pennsylvania	29 65
Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania	29 50
Shenango, Pennsylvania	30 58
Youngstown, Ohio	30 53
Stoutonville, Ohio	29 00
Jackson, Ohio	29 00
Saint Louis, Missouri	32 05
Southern Indiana	28 45
England, Wales, and Scotland, in American currency	19 00
Alabama	16 00
Georgia	16 00
Tennessee	14 43

I have no hesitancy in vouching for the above-named gentlemen, and the truth of their statements as to the cost of making iron in Tennessee.

Then, with iron manufactured in Tennessee at $15 per ton, and the obstructions in the Tennessee River at Muscle Shoals removed, you may "away with your high tariff on iron for protection." We only want the high tariff put upon us by the railroads taken off to allow our East Tennessee iron to compete with all the markets in the world for cheap and durable iron, thereby saving to the farmer and the mechanic the 50 to 60 per cent. duty they now pay upon iron, and everything they buy or use made of iron and steel.

The Muscle Shoals are in the State of Alabama, but Tennessee has a much greater interest in their removal than has Alabama. The States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, Kansas, Missouri, and Kentucky are all interested in this grand improvement by affording them a longer water navigation to the southern markets.

The recommendations of Major Walter McFarland, United States Engineers, and the secretary are reasonable and should be respected, as they know the great importance of the enterprise. It is due to Major McFarland to say that he has managed the appropriations heretofore made with great prudence and care; and the work done under his supervision has been of the most substantial character, and if the amount asked for under this bill is appropriated, it will be sufficient to keep the work going for the next year, and will insure the removal of this great and long-dreaded eye-sore to the free navigation of the Tennessee River, one of the finest water-courses that flows through any country.

The Hiwassee River, for which the bill aforesaid asks an appropriation of $50,000, is a tributary of the Tennessee River, heading in the State of North Carolina, running southwestwardly, and emptying into the Tennessee River about fifty miles above the city of Chattanooga, passing Charleston and Calhoun, at which places the East Tennessee, Virginia and Georgia Railroads cross the Hiwassee. This river was examined by Major Walter McFarland, United States Engineers, in September, 1874, by authority of an act of Congress passed 23d June, 1874, who submitted his report in detail to Brigadier-General A. A. Humphreys, Chief of Engineers United States Army, from which I make the following extracts, to wit:

The part of the river over which his examination extended passes through a rich farming and mineral region, but no reliable statistics of the amount of its products could be obtained. The estimate is based upon a depth of two feet at low water and a channel width of forty feet. And the amount estimated for a distance of thirty-three miles, which would take it to the Savannah farm, is $20,000.

Maurice Kingsly, the assistant engineer, says in his report, dated October 19, 1874:

A channel two feet in depth at lowest-water mark and forty feet wide could be opened at comparatively small cost, giving an average channel therefor of two feet and six inches in summer and fall and of three and a half feet in the winter and spring seasons.

In the Chilhowee Mountains there are deposits of gold, silver, lead, and copper, the latter being worked extensively at Ducktown, twenty-five miles from Benton, on the Ocoe River, where about 1,200,000 pounds of copper were taken out and wagoned down to Cleveland, on the East Tennessee, Virginia and Georgia Railroad last year. For some years the yield of the Ducktown copper mines was brought to Benton and thence shipped down the river, but the difficulties of navigation and the loss of the steamboat that then plied on the river compelled the company to abandon the river, and freight the whole distance by land to Cleveland.

He says further:

There was an appropriation made by the State Legislature thirty years ago for the improvement of this river, but the funds were so badly applied that no permanent benefit was derived from it.

Again he says:

There are at present seven flat-boats and keel-boats, drawing from eighteen inches to three feet of water, which make trips up and down the river during the winter months, and steamboats from the Tennessee River take advantage of the winter tides to make a few trips. The Lucy Coker is now making two trips up the Hiwassee as far as Kinkannon's ferry, and some years ago brought out a full cargo from the Savannah farm.

A new steamboat has just been finished for the Hiwasse, and is now making regular trips up and down the river.

The reasons for asking for $50,000 was to open up the river above the Savannah farm, where the survey ended, and to reach, if possible, the rich beds of iron-ore in the mountains, and to go as near the copper mines at Ducktown as was possible; the valleys along the Hiwasse and Ocoe Rivers furnishing a very large surplus of farm products seeking a market, and the transportation of the copper alone being a large item in connection with the advantages to be derived by opening up this river.

The annual income of the Ducktown copper mines is about half a million dollars; and their transportation account, which has to be done by wagon and teams, is from twenty-five to forty thousand dollars annually; while if the Hiwasse was opened up so that they could have water transportation within twelve or fifteen miles of the mines, it would save to that company alone in three or four years more than the appropriation asked for. This company employs three or four hundred men in their mines, most of whom have families; and nearly all of the supplies to feed and clothe these hands and their families are teamed thirty or forty miles, and the copper teamed forty miles to reach railroad transportation. The gross expenses of the company are about $300,000 annually; and the annual product of the mines is one and a half to two millions of pounds of refined copper, equal to any made anywhere.

Now we come down to the question of right and justice. I am aware of the fact that some honorable members of this House have expressed themselves as opposed to all appropriations. This is certainly very wrong. Members should always reflect before making such harsh pledges. They should view all of the surroundings, the necessities of the country, and with a noble, generous impulse come to the rescue of the country. We need not be alarmed at the financial outlook with the receipts of the Treasury averaging near or quite $1,000,000 daily. Certainly of this vast income enough can be spared to open up our great highways and develop our vast mineral wealth. If it is necessary to do so, let us apply the pruning-knife freely in cutting down the salaries of officials, beginning at the highest and going down to the lowest. Let us dismiss the thousands of supernumerary officials that are now paid from the Treasury and apply the money thus saved to the improvement of our rivers and lakes. But never, no never, go back upon the whole country by refusing to make liberal appropriations to develop the country.

The whole country is benefited by such appropriations and no one is damaged; the amount is a mere trifle to each tax-payer. The disbursement of the appropriation to hundreds of honest laborers who do the work will bring bread and clothing to hundreds of hungry women and children, who would without it probably suffer for the necessaries of life; it cheapens transportation, thereby benefiting the laboring-man who ships his produce to market; it breaks down railroad monopolies, and gives new life and energy to the whole country wherever such improvements are made; and generations to follow will rise up and bless those before them who caused these great benefits to the country.

We of the South do not ask this appropriation as a demand, but we simply ask it as a matter of right and justice, an enterprise fraught with great benefits to the whole country, and a matter that will not be felt as depleting the Treasury.

That members of this Congress may see that we are justified in asking this justice at their hands, I compile a few facts gathered from Executive Docket No. 12, submitted to the Forty-third Congress, which shows that from the year 1789 to the year 1873 the United States had expended on account of public works, railroads, canals, rivers, &c., the enormous sum of $207,999,664.77; and of this vast sum so expended the fifteen Southern States have received only the sum of $18,594,064, and the other States have received $189,405,600; and, to show more plainly that Tennessee feels that she is entitled to aid and can rely upon a generous Congress in this emergency, the same report shows that of all the money thus appropriated that she has received only the small sum of $451,826.29, and that the State of Alabama, in whose territory the bulk of this appropriation is to be expended, has received but $1,178,747.70. These wrongs inflicted upon our people are more the fault and folly of our former Representatives in holding that the General Government should not engage in works of internal improvements, than any one else; and this false idea has at last subsided and given way to the advanced ideas of the nation, that it is the duty of Congress to put the people's money where it would do the people the most good.

To show you where these appropriations have been expended, I append the following table from said report, namely:

There have been expended in—
Maine	$3,167,509 63
New Hampshire	1,285,212 34
Vermont	209,256 35
Massachusetts	6,071,197 65
Rhode Island	880,211 29
Connecticut	676,724 19
New York	15,691,722 32
New Jersey	374,595 82
Pennsylvania	3,574,564 23
Delaware	1,244,731 85
Maryland	1,809,194 02
District of Columbia	15,520,224 10
Virginia	1,955,577 50
West Virginia	5,094 25
North Carolina	898,413 53
South Carolina	792,015 98
Georgia	264,178 08
Florida	2,297,456 41
Alabama	1,178,747 20
Mississippi	1,131,441 95
Louisiana	2,763,944 04
Texas	240,209 09
Arkansas	622,494 09
Missouri	1,545,171 11
Kentucky	1,207,928 90
Tennessee	451,826 29
Ohio	3,183,863 50
Indiana	2,398,626 50
Illinois	9,386,057 23
Michigan	5,012,021 86
Wisconsin	2,203,673 58
Iowa	2,628,787 19
Minnesota	1,373 257 00
Kansas	2,483,061 92
Nebraska	419,826 15
Nevada	422,681 23
California	8,379,995 34
Oregon	1,060,169 14
Arizona	246,415 20
Colorado	53,226 85
Idaho	86,233 15
Indian Territory	7,920 00
Montana	41,575 00
New Mexico	235,068 94
Utah	7,943 70
Washington	214,102 13
Wyoming	77,454 92
Maine and Massachusetts, jointly	10,000 00
Connecticut and New Jersey, jointly	23,499 79
Maryland and Virginia, jointly	180,645 18
Louisiana and Arkansas, jointly	95,000 00
Wisconsin and Michigan, jointly	50,000 00
Utah, Nevada, and California, jointly	34,267,704 49
Utah, Nebraska, and Wyoming, jointly	34,350,703 70
Kansas and Colorado, jointly	7,766,212 11
Iowa and Nebraska, jointly	2,182,703 38
Miscellaneous	23,381,593 39
Total	207,999,664 77

Of this sum, $103,294,501.34 was expended upon public works from 1865 to 1873, and the amount appropriated to the Southern States of that amount was only a fraction over $3,000,000, leaving about one hundred millions in the last ten years to the Northern and Western States. Surely, with this showing, the small sum asked to open up the Tennessee—the second river in importance to any in the United States—and the Hiwassee, a rich tributary, will not be denied us; but that appropriations will from time to time be made, until the obstructions in these rivers will all be removed, when we can ship our surplus products to the markets of the world, and can and will compete with the world in furnishing the best and cheapest iron to be had anywhere.

Homesteads and Pre-emptions Within Railroad Limits.

SPEECH OF HON. JOHN R. GOODIN,

OF KANSAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

April 15, 1876,

On the bill (S. No. 34) reported from the Committee on Public Lands, being a bill to confirm pre-emption and homestead entries within railroad limits.

Mr. GOODIN. Mr. Speaker, during the last Congress several bills were introduced into the House and at least one in the Senate of the same general tenor as the one under consideration. In the first days of this session the present bill was introduced into the Senate and took its number as Senate bill No. 34. In the House the bills previously offered in the Forty-third Congress were re-introduced and all referred to the Committee on Public Lands, of which I have the honor to be a member. In this committee, owing to the vast importance of the subject-matter, the consideration of these several bills was commenced early in the session. The news reached the railroad companies to be affected by this legislation, and agents and attorneys were immediately dispatched to this city to prevent, if possible, the legislation proposed. For months there has scarcely been a meeting of the committee at which some railroad attorney did not appear to resist any report which might be favorable to the passage of any one of these several bills.

Over a month ago the present bill passed the Senate and at this, the only period since that time for reports from our committee, we present for the favorable consideration of the House during the present hour the bill passed by the Senate without amendment. Speeches by some of the ablest legal gentlemen of the land have from time to time been delivered in committee, and the drawers and tables of the committee-room are filled with learned briefs, replete with legal precedents and frightful warnings against any such measure as is now reported; and I will here add, Mr. Speaker, lest some may think that the committee may have turned a deaf ear to adverse argument, that the most respectful deference and attention were given by each member of that committee to the oral arguments, while the printed briefs have been perused with the most studious care. Still, sir, the bill is favorably reported, and for myself I may say that I have never wavered for a moment during the protracted discussions in committee in my belief that it is based upon principles of the surest equity, and means only even-handed justice, the weak with the powerful, the poor with the rich.

Mr. Speaker, on the 20th day of September, 1850, Congress passed the first railway land-grant act to aid in the construction of a railroad from the southern terminus of the Illinois and Michigan Canal to a point at or near the junction of the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers, and two branches, one to Chicago and the other to the city of Dubuque, in the State of Iowa For this purpose 2,595,053 acres were granted. At the same time and in the same act 737,130 acres were given to the States of Mississippi and Alabama for an extension of the same road from the mouth of the Ohio to Mobile. Subsequently grants were made to aid in railway construction up to and including the year 1872, of the enormous amount of one hundred and eighty-three million four hundred and thirty-two thousand two hundred and seventy-four acres!

Mr. Speaker, the same general features were maintained in the several granting acts; the alternate sections for a specified distance along the lines of road were given to the railroads, and usually designated by odd-numbered sections. From the time the land-grant system was inaugurated it has been the custom of the Interior Department, upon the ascertainment of the definite location of a line of roads to which lands were granted, to withdraw the granted lands from market. This has been done by an order to the local land office, whose maps, plates, and field-notes were made to show the location of the road and identify the lands reserved from disposal by the United States.

But, sir, it is scarcely necessary to consume attention by showing what seems to be the manifest justice of this course of procedure. The local land office is by law intrusted with the duty of the disposal of the public lands within the district, in accordance with the several act of Congress. Up to the time of the notification of the local office of the location of a line of road, the register and receiver have no means of knowing what are and what are not reserved lands for railroad purposes. An act is passed, for instance, granting lands to the State of Kansas in aid of the construction of a line of road from one point in the State to another. The road is not in course of construction. It is merely a proposed road. Through what towns, counties, or sections of land the road is to be built can only be determined when it is definitely located—located beyond change. The running of merely preliminary surveys, upon which the road may never be constructed, will not enable any one to say what the granted lands are. The identification of the railroad lands, their separation from the body of the lands not granted, can never be fixed with definiteness until the positive location of the line of proposed road.

But it is claimed by the railroads to whom lands have been donated that where by the terms of the granting act the condition precedent to the passing of title to the railroads is the "definite location" of a line of road, that when such location is made by a railroad company, by its own agents and according to its own mode, title immediately vests regardless of the fact whether the lands are ever withdrawn or not. This, sir, may be the law, but the train of evils which would follow in its wake may well arouse in the breast the doubt whether a judicial tribunal would so declare. The question, it seems to me, would suggest itself to the judicial mind whether the "definite location" of a line of railroad within the meaning of the act did not include more than the survey upon the field of a line upon which a road might be built and the planting of stakes to mark the line thus surveyed. Is the power of the Government for the disposition of the public domain in a large area of territory to be held in abeyance to await the "definite location" of a railroad line which may never be made? Or if it be made, is this power defeated while the company fails or refuses to report its location to the Land Department of the Government? Or, to make the case more pointed, will an unreported survey of a definite route entitle a railway corporation thus derelict in duty to claim rights as vested from the very date of survey, or of the approval of the survey by the managing board of the company?

If, Mr. Speaker, in addition to the millions of acres which have been given away to railroad corporations where there is no question as to the validity of the donation, we are to have superadded such a construction as this, it is high time for the patient people of this country to join together in council and prepare their minds for any innovation which legislative or judicial sanction may impose upon them. The injustice of such an interpretation need scarcely be mentioned. Who knows, aside from the officials connected with a railway, that, when a corps of engineers passes from county to county with chain and compass, leaving here and there a little stake as the only evidence of their presence, they are intending to mark the "definite location" of a railroad line? The toiling tiller of the soil, as he follows the furrow after his plow in an adjacent field, does not know it. The weary immigrant in his wagon with his family, making his way across the broad unfenced acres, looking here and there for a tract of land upon which to build himself a happy country home, does not know it. The surveyors in the field do not know that the line they are running is to be adopted as the "definite location" of the line for the railroad. The officers of the land office, with no marked line upon their plats, do not know it, and in the discharge of their official duties they are daily permitting entries under the homestead and pre-emption laws to be made upon either side of the engineers' line of march. And yet we are told that if perchance the board of directors of the railway at some subsequent period—no matter how long deferred—should conclude to adopt this line at a secret session, in some remote city, from that date the right of the company immediately becomes "vested" under the law, and are beyond legislative control! Not only so, but some of these gentlemen, distinguished for their legal learning as well as for their previously evinced fairness, insist that by the adoption of the line the rights of the company antedate the time of such adoption, and vest at the date of the running of the route of survey.

I opine, Mr. Speaker, that many members of the legal profession upon this floor will seriously doubt the correctness of their opinions in this regard. Surely the representatives of the people, who in furtherance of railway construction enacted these laws making donations of public lands, could not have contemplated that such an interpretation would be placed upon their enactments. While not having any adjudicated case before me from which to quote upon this point, I think I may safely state the judicial rule of construction to be this: That all laws making donations or gifts shall be strictly construed, and that nothing shall be deemed to have passed thereunder save that which plainly appears to have been intended to pass. Or, in other words, where one claims by virtue of a gift or donation, as contradistinguished from a transfer for value, the donation will not be extended by implication.

But, Mr. Speaker, I can to some extent comprehend the assurance of the railroad companies when I reflect upon the change which has come over the spirit of the Interior Department in their behalf. Formerly the organization of this important Department of the executive branch of the Government seemed to give assurance of fair dealing with all persons having business connections with it. Latterly it would seem that the humbler the appeal for justice from it the less liable was it to be awarded; while, on the other hand, the more arrogant the demands from wealthy monopolies the more certainly would they be acceded to.

For the purpose of showing clearly, sir, that at one time there seemed to be no doubt that an actual withdrawal of public lands was necessary before any rights could be vested in a railroad company, I will read an official letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office to the Secretary of the Interior, under date of April 14, 1873, which is self-explanatory:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, April 14, 1873.

SIR: I have the honor to submit herewith papers on appeal from the decisions contained in my letter to the district land officers at Independence, Kansas, dated February 24 last, Topeka, February 27, and Salina, February 24 and 28 and March 3 last, refusing to cancel the following homestead entries upon the application of the attorney for the Missouri, Kansas and Texas Railroad Company, who claims the lands as inuring to the grant to said company, to wit.

Here follow the entries at the Independence, Topeka, and Salina offices.

These entries are of a similar character to those referred to in your decisions of September 3 and December 19 last, in the cases of A. W. Nichol et al. and Frank Hatke vs. The Saint Joseph and Denver City Railroad Company, having been made upon railroad lands after the definite location of the road, but before the date of withdrawal, in accordance with the rulings of the Department then in force; and as the grants are of the same character, it was in accordance with these decisions that I declined to cancel the entries.

The further suggestion that the language of the fourth section of the act requiring the Secretary "as soon as said company shall file * * * maps of its line designating the route thereof, * * * to withdraw from the market the lands granted," presupposes the fact that such lands were intended to remain in the market until such maps should be filed for the protection of the company; and if the withdrawal was made within a reasonable time after such filing, the duty of the Secretary was performed under the law, and the company cannot take advantage of any laches of its own in failing to file such map immediately upon its definite location, and thereby securing to itself the full measure of its grant in place at that time and indemnity for such lands as had been then disposed of. After such definite location, and prior to the withdrawal, I do not understand the law to protect the company or give any indemnity, as it was the business of the company, and not of the Department, to take the first steps by filing, if necessary, a map of general route toward securing their grant unimpaired.

This view of the law is made necessary, in my judgment, in order to give effect to the provisions of the fourth section, under the rule requiring every portion of a statute to be enforced if its enforcement is possible without violation of what is clearly provided for in other parts of the same.

The first section simply defines the rights of indemnity under the grant generally made. The fourth section specifically sets forth the manner in which a withdrawal shall be made "to effect the purpose of the act and subserve the public interest." The papers submitted are as follows: First, homestead paper, marked A; second, extracts of letters containing my decision, B; third, attorneys' letters and arguments, C.

I am, sir, very respectfully,

WILLIS DRUMMOND, Commissioner.

Hon. C. DELANO,
Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. Speaker, from this decision it plainly appears that the rule requiring the company to file a map showing the definite location of its line of proposed route, so that the lands could be withdrawn from market, was no new one. This opinion was rather an adherence to the established practice of the Department relative to the land-grant laws adopted prior to that date, and seems to be in consonance with sound reason and perfect equity. But, sir, the railroads complained of it. The poor men who in good faith had settled upon what was afterward declared to be within railroad limits were not to be permitted to enjoy their little homes, and the head of the Interior Department was vigorously besieged for a change of base. The demand was cheerfully acceded to, as the following extract from the letter of Secretary Delano, in reply to the one just read, will show:

I now hold and you will adopt the rule for your guidance in this case and all like it, that in all cases where patents have actually been executed in accordance with a construction of law adopted by the Department and in force at the time of the execution of the patents, the patent will not be canceled or set aside upon any subsequent controversy arising between the different claimants, but the parties will be left to their remedies in court and the cases will be treated as res adjudicata. But in all cases where the controversy arises before patent has been executed, the rule of conclusion adopted by the Department and in force at the time of the hearing in all its stages, and before any proper officer or officers, will be applied and the case decided in accordance with it, although it may differ from the rule recognized by the Department at the time the respective proceedings were commenced.

In the case now under consideration the right of the railroad attached upon the definite location of its road and before any of the filings of the contesting parties were made. These filings were made before the withdrawal of the lands, but under the construction now adopted by this Department the right of the railroad attached at the time of definite location, and not, as formerly held, at the time of withdrawal. No patents have been executed, and under the law, as I understand it, and the rule above stated, the right of the railroad is superior to that of other parties; and your decision should be reversed. I therefore reverse the same, and herewith return the papers transmitted with your letter of April 14, 1873.

Mr. Speaker, mark this language in the letter of the Secretary:

These filings were made before the withdrawal of the lands, but under the construction now adopted by this Department the right of the railroad attached at the time of the definite location, and not, as formerly held, at the time of withdrawal.

"Not, as formerly held, at the time of withdrawal," says the Secretary. Under the ruling "as formerly held" the pre-emption and homestead settlers were protected in their entries made at any time prior to the withdrawal; "but under the construction now adopted" the railroads get all the land.

Having made this bold stride in the direction of wiping out the former practice and rule of construction, by easy gradations the learned Secretary was brought, on the 20th of January, 1874, to enunciate another opinion, which must have caused the railroad kings to weep for very joy; for was not their cup of earthly happiness full to overflowing? At the date last named Mr. Delano said:

It is held by the Department that when a survey is made in accordance with a resolution of a board of directors of a company authorizing the same, the dates of such survey in the field are to be taken as the definite location of the road. But when the line of route is subsequently adopted by the board of directors as their definite location, the date of such adoption governs.

Here, sir, we have the declaration, broad and comprehensive, if a previous resolution of a railway board of directors authorizes the survey of a line of road, that as fast as the engineer can run the line in the field the lands upon either side are to be deemed appropriated by the railroad company. There is left out of consideration entirely any requirement to file a map or profile showing the route actually selected, and it is decided that the vested rights of the company may be irrevocably secured beyond judicial or legislative interference by the sole act of the railroad company. No approval, no acceptance, no recognition of the surveyed line by the executive department of the Government is essential to pass title. If a report of the surveyed line was never made, the result is precisely the same as if it was promptly presented; and the Government proceeds to sell and otherwise dispose of what it considers a part of the public domain in blissful ignorance of the steps taken by the railroad, which secures to it thousands, yea millions, of acres of land already disposed of under authority of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, in most if not all of the acts making donations of land for railway purposes the grant runs to the State, to aid in construction of railroads. In the several acts which I have examined this provision is found:

But in case it shall appear that the United States have, when the line or route of said road and branches are definitely fixed by the authority aforesaid, sold any part of any section hereby granted, or that the right of pre-emption has attached to the same, then it shall be lawful for any agent or agents appointed by the governor of said State to select other lands in lieu thereof, &c.

Hence it will be observed that, anticipating the disposition to actual settlers of lands prior to notice of selection or definite location of a railroad line, the rights of the company are sought to be fully saved by permitting selections equivalent in amount to those disposed of.

Attorney-General Cushing, in a case decided by him in December, 1856, used this language:

I think all the precedents in the action of the Government as applied to previous grants in the same or similar terms tend to confirm this conclusion; for, in the analogous cases the contingent strips of public domain subject to such future railroad location were withdrawn from private entry by proclamation of the President, thus implying that without such withdrawal private entries would go on as usual; and the power of the President to make such withdrawal the means, and the only means, of preventing anticipatory private appropriations in the case of railroad grants has been recognized by a recent act of Congress.

Here, sir, Mr. Cushing speaks of the custom prevailing at the time he pronounced that opinion of withdrawing by executive proclamation the lands sought to be appropriated for the benefit of railroads. And let me say that the same practice has prevailed ever since that time. Any other would tend to confusion of rights and produce chaos in the administration of the land laws of the country.

The act of Congress which Mr. Cushing had in view at the time of giving the opinion quoted I think must have been the following, as it seems to be harmonious with his utterances. It was passed in March, 1854. I will read it:

That every settler on public lands which have been or may be withdrawn from market in consequence of proposed railroads, and had settled thereon prior to such withdrawal, shall be entitled to pre-emption at the ordinary minimum to the land settled and cultivated by them: Provided, They shall prove up their rights by such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior and pay for the same before the day that may be fixed by the President's proclamation for the restoration of said lands to market.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we must not lose sight of the fact that this statute is still in force and that all of the rulings of the Interior Department adverse to the homestead and pre-emption settlers have been made in the full glow and radiance of its generous provisions. I have not been able, sir, to ascertain the number of persons who have been permitted within railroad limits, according to the former rulings, to make entries under the homestead and pre-emption laws. They number in the States of Kansas, Minnesota, Nebraska, and Iowa, however, many thousands; and a class more deserving of protective legislation cannot be named. These are the men who with their families and all of the worldly possessions owned by them, with faces westward turned, led the advancing hosts of civilization. With honest hearts and sinewy arms they sought the undisturbed prairies as their common heritage, and laid, as they supposed, the certain foundations of peaceful and prosperous homes. From year to year, with brimming hopes of future happiness, unvexed by exacting landlords whose rents consumed the annual products of their toil, they sought places for permanent habitations:

Like ocean in its tided might,
The living sea rolled onward, on!

and their tents and camp-fires gave evidence of the immense army of husbandmen who dared to brave the hardships and trials incident to the establishment of new homes in a new country! They found the land vacant; they went to the land office of the district within which they proposed to locate; the maps and plats there disclosed no adverse claim to the tracts selected; they complied with the instructions of the Land Department of the Government; they obtained their certificates of entry and homestead receipts, and vigorously set about breaking the soil, building their dwelling-houses and barns, and otherwise making visible, permanent improvements upon their chosen selections. Subsequently their lands were withdrawn in behalf of railroads and the Secretary, as we have seen, reversing all former rulings, directed a cancellation of the entries so made.

Mr. Speaker, I have adverted to the land-grant laws, the rulings of the Interior Department from time to time, the peculiar injustice which so grievously affects the thousands who with the purest of motives and the sincerest good faith have staked their all upon the solemn and oft-repeated decisions of those in authority. I have labored with earnestness and unfaltering zeal to secure the legislation here proposed, which is to restore, so far as legislation can affect this purpose, the anterior practice and rules of construction which have governed the class of cases enumerated in the bill. If the essential features of it shall be passed into a law, and the courts of final judicature shall sustain the present claims of the railroad companies, I shall feel that I have at least performed my duty fearlessly, and, with those so immediately affected, will yield, however sorrowfully, a graceful obedience to rightful authority. If, on the other hand, the passage of this bill shall serve to render secure in their homes those hardy pioneers who have already suffered so sorely the privations of a frontier life, and who are now well-nigh crushed with anxiety for the security and safety of the little homes for which they have so gallantly battled, the reflection of duty conscientiously performed will come to me through future life as among the most pleasant remembrances of my official career as a member of this House.

Sir, the passage of this bill, which seeks to confirm the homestead and pre-emption entries heretofore canceled, will give to the settlers patents for the lands claimed by them. In many instances—not in all, however—patents have likewise been issued to the railroad companies. If in such cases the legal questions which have been so elaborately discussed in committee for so long a time shall come before the courts for judicial determination, the settlers will have in possession the muniments of title, and in this respect will stand on an equality with he monster corporations against which they will be arrayed. The popular demand for the passage of this bill cannot be mistaken. Not a day passes that I do not receive at least a dozen letters urging my exertions in its behalf, while from other western States similar appeals are continually made to their Representatives. Now, Mr. Speaker, in conclusion permit me to observe that for the reasons already given, as well as for others which might as consistently be presented, I think that the pending bill should become a law. The equities are certainly with those for whose benefit it was framed, and we should be regardless of a plain duty if, seeing in the distance the right, we should close our eyes upon the path which unerringly leads to it.

Habeas Corpus—Hallet Kilbourn.

SPEECH OF HON. W. B. WILLIAMS,

OF MICHIGAN,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

April 17, 1876,

On the report of the Committee on the Judiciary in relation to the case of Hallet Kilbourn.

Mr. W. B. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, in the question under consideration it is important that we clearly understand the position taken by the majority of the committee as to the present status of the witness Kilbourn. I regret to say that in my view there is a broad discrepancy between the gentlemen who addressed the House upon the majority side of this question. There should be no misunderstanding upon this question, no two-faced propositions. Let the line be clearly drawn, so that all may understand it; so that the people of this country may know the power we are now exercising and the power it is claimed that we should exercise affecting the personal liberty of the citizen.

Are we detaining Hallet Kilbourn in jail as a witness or are we detaining him in execution?

Is he imprisoned for an offense committed and in punishment for such offense, or is he simply detained as a witness to prove some material fact? It is important for us to know the precise position of the witness before we refuse this writ of right, a writ that every citizen illegally restrained of his liberty has the right to have, and no judge has a right to refuse upon a proper case being made.

The question first to be settled is upon what grounds and under what pretense is Hallet Kilbourn confined in the jail of this District?

We have the preamble and resolution of the majority of the committee to aid us in the solution of the question, and we find it asserts that Hallet Kilbourn was duly subpœnaed to testify, &c., and refused to answer certain questions and to produce certain books and papers, and that for such refusal the House adjudged him in contempt of its authority and ordered him into custody until he shall purge himself of such contempt and answer the questions propounded and produce the books and papers.

Upon the theory here enunciated he is claimed to be virtually his own keeper; that his confinement is subject to his own order; that he can at any time unlock his prison doors, if he will unlock his mouth and reveal the secrets claimed to be hidden in his own breast and unlock his safe and produce his private books and papers. This the witness takes issue upon and claims that his private business and private books and papers are not subject to or within the scope of our powers of investigation.

The issue thus made is clearly defined, and the witness is not claimed to be in contempt in any other matter than in this particular; in other words, his contempt consists, if contempt it is, in refusing to disclose his private business and to produce his private books, and upon this the House adjudges him in contempt of its authority. So that the issue is upon the right of the House to pursue the investigation into the private affairs of the witness. This is certainly a very important legal question, and it is jurisdictional so far as the imprisonment of the witness is concerned; and with a view to a continuance of these investigations it is important that it should be settled at the earliest possible moment.

The question is not free at least from doubt, and the only question for us to consider is, will we permit the courts to decide it?

It is claimed that we have the right to punish for contempt, and having that right no court has the right to inquire into the cause of the detention of any person held as for contempt by this House. That is, in my judgment, begging the whole question; the witness makes the issue directly here: he denies any contempt of the House, and pleads to its jurisdiction. Has he not the right to have that question decided by the courts? It is claimed that this body is as to that question the court to decide, and that there is no tribunal to review our decision. If that doctrine is correct, the court would on the return of the writ to it with the body of the witness Kilbourn be obliged to remand him back into the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, and the question will be settled by the tribunal authorized by the Constitution to determine what the law in its application to a given case is. But if it should not be correct, then the court will go further and inquire into the jurisdiction of this House to commit the witness Kilbourn for contempt—in short, the right of the House to require him to produce his private books and papers and to disclose his private business.

I do not concede the truth of the position claimed, that this House is the sole judge of what constitutes a contempt of its authority, and that its action upon a question is not subject to revision. In my judgment, no more startling proposition could be enunciated. It places the personal liberty of the citizen at the mercy of the House. It overrides the system of checks so wisely interwoven into our form of government to prevent the arbitrary exercise of power. It overthrows the power of the judiciary, and claims the extreme exercise of the judicial functions. Adopt it as the rule for future government, and you strike a more dangerous blow at the liberty of the citizen, and necessarily at the nation itself, than any it has ever sustained. Adopt it and make the return proposed by the majority of the committee, and you virtually destroy the efficacy of the writ of habeas corpus as effectually as in the days of Charles I and from 1625 to 1679. Adopt it, and you turn back the wheels of civilization and enlightenment to the regal power of the seventeenth century. Adopt it, and the great battle then so fiercely fought in favor of personal liberty and against despotic power will have to be fought over again, and the advantages that inured to Englishmen by the act of Charles II will be lost to American freemen.

The return proposed in this case in effect deprives the court of the power to act, as it has no power over the alleged prisoner. The return will give the court no more power over the prisoner than that made by the warden of the Fleet in the days of Charles I, when the return was in substance that the prisoner was held by the warrant of the privy council and committed by the special command of His Majesty, a return that the corrupt court held to be sufficient, and thereby, as Hallam informs us, overthrew and destroyed the effect of every statute designed to protect the personal liberties of Englishmen from the days of Magna Charta, a decision that gave birth to the Petition of Right, which again was paralyzed by a corrupt judiciary in the interest of the king, and finally Parliament adopted the habeas corpus act of 1679. This act, like our own, was made compulsory upon the judges, and required the return to be accompanied by the body of the applicant.

The return proposed here is in effect the return per speciale mandatum regis of the days of Charles I, as it gives no more power to the court than that return did. And, strange as it may seem here in the centennial year of our liberty, we see the House of Representatives in the United States of America attempting to usurp the same power that it cost so many years of bitter struggle to wring from the king. In the same power I mean the arbitrary power over the liberty of the citizen that prevents review by the courts. It matters not whether this power is excised by the king or by the commons, once granted to either its deadening, blighting influence is the same.

But much has been said about our judicial power. Where do we get it? Certainly not from the Constitution. If we exercise judicial powers in any sense it is a legislative usurpation. It is claimed that having the power to punish for contempt, the doing so is a judicial act. This power to punish, if it exists, is not granted to us for judicial purposes; it is not in fact granted to us at all, but we acquire it as a necessary incident to our legislative powers and duties, and for the protection of those powers and duties, and for no other purpose. It is strictly a legislative power whenever and wherever exercised by a legislative body, as much and as fully as it is a judicial power whenever and wherever exercised by the judiciary. And all this array of authorities and argument of gentlemen to show that one court will not inquire into the action of another of competent jurisdiction has no force or bearing upon this question.

The assumption that a judicial tribunal stands upon the same footing as a legislative body is a gross perversion of the relative powers of each. The scope of judicial powers, as I have already said, is to determine what the law is, while legislative power determines what the law shall be. The former acts upon laws in existence, the latter determines what the law shall be in the future, and there is therefore in this case no danger of a conflict between courts or between powers of the same nature. The authorities would have a bearing upon a question of a similar nature between the Senate and the House, but none whatever upon the case under consideration.

The judicial power was established to protect the rights of property and the rights of person of the citizen, and in doing so is constantly reviewing our acts as a legislative body; and shall we say that this one act of ours they shall not review, simply because we think we have the power to prevent it? Or shall we comply with the law and not seek to nullify it and surrender the custody of Hallet Kilbourn to the court under a writ of habeas corpus, in order that his right to personal liberty may be solemnly determined by the tribunal authorized to adjudge upon the personal liberty of the citizen?

To my mind the duty is clear and imperative, and I shall not hesitate to vote accordingly, and to so vote that the right of the citizen may be respected, the power of the courts be sustained, and the provisions of section 9 article 1 of the Constitution prohibiting the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus not be violated; a refusal to return with the writ the body of Hallet Kilbourn, being in and of itself a nullification of the power of the writ, makes a virtual suspension of it.

Habeas Corpus—Hallet Kilbourn

SPEECH OF HON. B. T. EAMES,

OF RHODE ISLAND,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

April 17, 1876,

On the report of the Committee on the Judiciary in relation to the case of Hallet Kilbourn.

Mr. EAMES. Mr. Speaker, we live under a government of law, and not of men. The Constitution of the United States and the laws passed in pursuance of it are the defense, protection, and safety of the American citizen in his rights of life, liberty, and property. Under this Constitution there are three departments in this Government: the legislative, the judicial, and the executive; and these three departments, each acting within its prescribed constitutional limits, constitute the Government upon which every one of us depends for the security of his rights as an American citizen. The legislative power is vested in a Congress, consisting of a Senate and House of Representatives; the judicial power is vested in one Supreme Court and in such other inferior courts as Congress may ordain and establish; and the executive power is vested in the President of the United States. Under these provisions of the Constitution Congress has the sole and exclusive power of national legislation, the courts have the sole and exclusive judicial power, and the President the sole and exclusive executive power. And it is of vital importance to the life, liberty, and property of the citizen that neither of the departments should in the slightest degree infringe upon the powers of the others or assume powers which have not been vested in it by the Constitution.

Now, keeping in mind these universally-acknowledged principles of the Government under which we live, what is the power of the House of Representatives in the case of a recusant witness who has been by order of the House committed for contempt and who has sued out from a court having jurisdiction the great writ of habeas corpus, upon a sworn statement that he is unlawfully restrained of his liberty?

This is the question, in a case of personal liberty, which the Representatives of the people under a free Government are called upon to answer, and it is a question of the most serious importance; for as applied in this case it may be applied to every American citizen.

Now, Mr. Speaker, under the Constitution the legislative power is vested in Congress, and not in either the House or the Senate, nor even in both without the act of the Executive. The powers of the House as prescribed in the Constitution are few and limited. It can choose its Speaker and other officers. It can judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members. It may determine the rules of its proceedings; may punish a member for disorderly behavior, and by a vote of two-thirds expel a member, and it has the sole power of impeachment. These are the powers which the Constitution expressly confers on the House of Representatives. They relate to the officer who shall preside over, and the persons who shall participate in, its deliberations, and the manner in which the questions before it shall be conducted and determined. But the Constitution confers upon Congress certain powers of legislation, and the House as one branch of Congress must of necessity be vested with such incidental power as may be necessary to perform its part in the legislation of the country. And it may by its rules or by special orders do whatever may be necessary or proper to enable it to discharge its legislative functions. But it is only as a branch of the legislative department upon some matter pertaining to legislation that it may exercise this power. It may summon witnesses, compel their attendance, and, in the absence of any statute forbidding it, may prescribe a punishment by commitment or otherwise for a refusal to answer any question which under the law the witness is bound to answer. I say, in the absence of any statute, because inasmuch as any inquiry which may be made must be limited to some question of legislation, if Congress, which only under the Constitution can pass laws, has prescribed the mode of proceeding, it of necessity takes from either branch of Congress the power to follow the inquiry in any other mode than that prescribed by law.

Now, the statute in cases like that now pending has prescribed the course to be followed. I hold its provisions to be binding upon the House. The expression in the statute of the mode of proceeding excludes any other mode. The mode prescribed must be followed.

Now, the statute in substance, so far as applicable to this case, provides that any person duly summoned to give testimony or produce papers upon any matter under inquiry before any committee of the House who refuses to answer any question pertinent to the question under inquiry shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, punishable by a fine of not more than $1,000 nor less than $100, and imprisonment for not less than one month nor more than twelve months; and makes it the duty of the Speaker of the House to certify the facts to the attorney of the District of Columbia, whose duty it shall be to bring the matter before the grand jury for their action.

Now, this is precisely the case of the recusant witness, Kilbourn, and the direction of the statute has been promptly complied with by the Speaker of the House; and inasmuch as the statute has prescribed the course to be pursued and the punishment for the offense, by what authority, I ask, of the Constitution, either express or implied, can this House claim the right to prescribe any other proceeding or penalty? But in the course of the debate upon this subject it has been said that the statute in force previous to the revision of the laws of the United States provided in substance that in such case the recusant witness should be subject to this punishment in addition to any other penalty to which he was lawfully subject, and that it was not the intention of the revision to do more than to re-enact the law then existing; and therefore the power of the House is now the same as if the revision had not been made. The reply to this is that the law as it appears in the Revised Statutes is the law of the land. The law as in the Revised Statutes was no doubt intended in general to be the law as it was when the statutes went into effect. But these laws as embodied in the revision passed through all the formalities required for the enactment of any law under the Constitution, and the presumption is that the change in this respect was at the time intended. If it had not been, it no doubt would before this have been amended, as the statutes have been in many other instances. In any event it is the law, and binding as such until changed by legislation. The fair presumption is that it was intended to prohibit any other penalty than that prescribed by the Revised Statutes.

But, Mr. Speaker, aside from this view of the question before the House, there is another reason which is equally conclusive against the resolution recommended by the Committee on the Judiciary.

The powers of Congress over a witness are limited to questions pertaining to national legislation. The power of the House is surely no broader. The question raised by this writ of habeas corpus is a question of the right of the House, upon the facts upon which the House ordered the commitment, to restrain a citizen of his personal liberty. This is strictly a judicial question, to be determined by the courts. The House is in no true sense a judicial tribunal, and never ought to be allowed to sit as a judicial tribunal for a final determination of its own decision, especially upon a question involving personal liberty.

The purpose of the writ of habeas corpus is to ascertain whether a citizen is unlawfully restrained of his liberty. The Constitution, neither in its language nor its spirit, confers on the Senate, or the House, or Congress, the power to determine a question of this character; but in express terms excludes such authority by vesting the judicial power exclusively in the courts. It is, therefore, clearly the duty of the House to remit this question to the courts.

Mr. Speaker, in my judgment Mr. Kilbourn never ought to have been committed for contempt. He disclosed all the knowledge which could have aided the committee in their investigation, and the course of the House in the order for his commitment seems to me to have been taken without due consideration. I think that the Sergeant-at-Arms ought to be directed to discharge the witness from further custody under the order of the House passed on the 14th of March last. If without due consideration we have deprived an American citizen of his liberty, justice to him, as well as to ourselves, demands that the order should be revoked.

Hawaiian Treaty.

SPEECH OF HON. N. P. BANKS,

OF MASSACHUSETTS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

April 10, 1876.

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and having under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 612) to carry into effect a convention between the United States of America and His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands, signed on the 30th day of January, 1875—

Mr. BANKS said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: It is not, sir, from any local or sectional interest on the part of the people I represent in the execution of this treaty that I venture to trouble the House with any remarks; but rather from a deep interest in the principal subject embraced in the treaty, and the still more important and higher question as to the manner of dealing with measures of this character by the House of Representatives, to which I propose to address myself.

ORIGIN OF THE TREATY.

It is not difficult to answer the question so much debated here, Who wants this treaty? It comes to us in the natural order of events. It does not spring from the speculations or machinations of men, nor the special interests of individuals, corporations, or particular sections of the country. It is in part a result of that revolution which is going on in all forms of government, and which at no distant day is destined to change the basis of the civilized states of the world.

It is less than ten years since the embassy from the Chinese Empire—the most remarkable that has ever visited the civilized states—was presented to the Representatives of the people in this Hall. At the head of that august embassy stood a young man who had attained a national reputation as a member of this House, and who by his courtesy, high sense of honor, and chivalrous bearing had won the respect, esteem, and affection of the people of the country. The government and people of China, disturbed by revolutionary elements within their borders and assailed on every side by foreign enemies, felt the pressure of impending disintegration and dissolution, and that empire, that for thousands of years had closed her gates and barred her doors to those whom she had regarded as outside barbarians, was compelled to abandon the policy of isolation and appeal to the nations of the earth for protection and the maintenance of her existence.

After China came Japan, from the same quarter of the world, in the same manner, for the same purpose; and here in the same Capitol her embassy, equally respected and illustrious, appealed to the Congress of the United States with an emphasis and eloquence that can never be forgotten for the preservation of their empire and the institutions of its people. And they were successful. The treaties they negotiated in this country were adopted by the civilized nations of the earth; and as a consequence of the amity and friendship thus established these two great empires were relieved from the impending dissolution which threatened them on every side, and are now as permanently established as any of the civilized nations of the earth. Their success is one of the marvels of human history. The changes that have been inaugurated in the habits, laws, and institutions of these empires, numbering between four and five hundred millions of people, are without parallel.

And now after China and Japan comes Hawaii, disturbed by the ambitious schemes of foreign nations or the native races of the Pacific, her influence undermined and her existence threatened, to ask of the American people their aid to protect her from dissolution and from destruction. This is what the treaty means that we are asked to put in operation. It is no individual or local interest which brings it here. It is the same principle which actuated and compelled the people of China and Japan to change their policy and seek protection beyond their limits and empire for their institutions and their existence as a nation.

THE HAWAIIANS.

The people of Hawaii are weak. We are told that the race is decaying and will soon disappear. They represent, it is true, a receding race, and they have but slight claims to the respect of the people of the world on account of their present power or their prospects for the future. Yet nevertheless they come to us for a recognition of their rights to exist as a nation, and it may be our interest, as it is certainly our duty, to extend to them such countenance or assistance as the welfare of both nations may justify. Who are they? They are the descendants of the Malays. Not a great while since they belonged to the race of cannibals. They were as low in the order and scale of being as any people of the two hemispheres, but gradually by an energy that does them great credit, and a wisdom which is still more honorable to them, they have lifted themselves out of earlier associations, and established a state upon the basis of civilization, recognizing the Christian faith, educating their people, increasing their trade, strengthening that section of the globe which is confided in part to them. And they have as just a claim to the respect, assistance, and protection of civilized states as any people on the face of the earth.

THEIR POSITION.

The position they occupy is one of great importance. They are in the central part of the Pacific Ocean. The Hawaiian Islands may be said to be a key to that vast expanse of water which covers more than one half of the breadth of the earth, and extends from the arctic to the antarctic circles—the greatest of the oceans of the earth—that is destined hereafter to be the theater of the grandest enterprises of which the history of man has given or ever will give an account. More and more the Atlantic Ocean and the States bordering upon it are dwarfed in their power and influence, and the spirit that controls the nations and directs the forces of the earth will pass from that sphere to this greater theater between the eastern and western worlds.

There are six thousand islands and innumerable border seas in different parts of this great ocean. It is separated by geographers into three grand divisions: Malaisia, Australasia, and Polynesia. Malaisia borders upon the Indian Ocean; Australasia controls the Southern Pacific; and Polynesia, of which the Hawaiian Islands are the most important, occupy and command the Central and North Pacific Oceans. The three divisions now support twenty-one million people. But a small portion of them are in any marked degree or extent civilized; but they occupy and control a position which is destined to be of vast importance to civilization and the ultimate destiny of the human race.

No portion of the earth has a grander destiny for the future, and to no portion of its people is it more interesting and vital than to ourselves. Civilization will ultimately plant its throne there. The great discoveries and inventions that mark the epochs of human history, resulted from the struggles of the ancient and medieval empires to reach and occupy this grand center of the globe; and the nations of the East and West, imitating their example, are now silently and steadily moving to this new theater of action in the hope to win something of its future wealth, strength, and power.

We were ourselves among the first of modern states to begin this later movement; we were the first to lift its populous empires out of their self-imposed isolation, and bring them into peaceful and permanent communication with modern civilization. The pioneers of the New World opened a pathway to the shores of the Pacific, from the East westward, and drew after them emigrants from the Old World to re-occupy and hold the vacant settlements that advancing enterprise had abandoned. On their path towns, cities, and States have risen. Education, civilization, Christianity, and liberty have dispelled from the face of the continent less propitious influences, and given to the world a new hope for the regeneration of society and of man. We were the first to unite the two oceans by railways. We have commenced others north and south of the central lines, until, with the aid of our neighbors north and south of our own borders, railway explorations and enterprises from the East westward promise to be as numerous as the parallels of latitude and to cover the face of both continents from the Arctic Ocean to the Straits of Magellan.

European powers are engaged in a similiar work from the West eastward. Russia has mainly completed railway and steam connection from the Black Sea to the Sea of Okhotsk, on the Pacific. The Suez Canal unites the Mediterranean and Red Seas and the continents of Asia and Africa.

The commercial world is interested in the perforation of the Isthmus of Darien, by which the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans must soon be opened to the commerce of the rivers, lakes, and seas of all nations. This development of the means of communication, transportation, and trade is to bring the active and increasing forces of the globe to the Pacific Ocean, henceforth to be the pivot of its political and commercial operations, and the treaty before us secures to us a commanding if not controlling position in these majestic movements of the future.

THE HAWAIIAN ISLANDS.

The Hawaiian Islands occupy what may be well called the central and commanding position, the key of this commercial center to which with centrifugal forces the nations of the earth are moving. It may be of little consequence now, but in a quarter of a century the character and policy of the government that controls these islands will be of vast import to the people of this country and to the world. Now, sir, just as the Chinese and Japanese suffered from the encroachments of other nations, the people of the Hawaiian Islands have suffered and are now suffering. The governments of Europe have for a long time been looking with great interest upon these islands and have naturally desired to possess or control them. The French government at one time actually entered with military and naval forces and took possession of them, and the British government at a later period did the same thing.

The native races of the Pacific, in imitation of the great states of Europe or stimulated by them, have coveted the possession of these important islands. That policy which has prevailed in so many parts of the world with such success, which leads to the concentration of the people of the same races, has been imitated by the feeble races of the Pacific, and the people and government of Polynesia that embrace the northern part of the Pacific Ocean and for a considerable extent below the equator, have contemplated a scheme which should bring all the islands of Polynesia, of which Hawaii is the head and chief, into one central political organization under the English government, styled "the southern dominion of Great Britain." The people of the Hawaiian Islands are illy able to resist influences and appeals having this object in view. It has been stated in the course of this debate that they have dwindled from two or three hundred thousand, as they were when visited by Captain Cook, to fifty thousand and even forty-five thousand. Their government must necessarily be one of great expense to them. They are keeping watch and ward for all the nations of the earth, and defending themselves against all comers from whatever quarter of the globe they appear. Holding an utterly isolated position in the center of the Pacific Ocean, midway in the path of commerce between the east, west, north, and south, they have been constantly the recipients and are obliged to make provision for naval and commercial visits of all nations. They furnish them supplies, they repair their ships, they administer the laws, they settle controversies between mariners and officers, and these duties entail upon the government an expense which the people are illy able to bear. They are required also from their position to maintain a respectable diplomatic and consular representation in different parts of the world. They have a minister plenipotentiary of superior character and capacity at this capital. There are more than forty chargés d'affaires, consuls-general, and consuls at the principal diplomatic and commercial centers, commissioned by the Hawaiian government, discharging their duties with the same fidelity and maintaining the same dignity that distinguishes the diplomatic and consular representatives of other more powerful and wealthy states. They support two hundred and forty-five schools in the islands, with a teacher for every twenty-seven children. They have organized expensive scientific surveys of that part of the world which is in their possession, now nearly completed, after the manner of our own coast surveys. A multitude of charges of this kind have brought them to the consideration of the means, and indeed to an apprehension of the absolute necessity, possibly of abandoning their purposes and position for want of means to maintain the enlightened but expensive policy upon which they have entered. And they come, sir, just as China and Japan came, to the Government and people of the United States, with a manly request for the same consideration and support that under similar circumstances we accorded with so much satisfaction and success to China and Japan. It is an appeal for the continued existence of a nation that throughout its history has struggled with unswerving heart and hope for the elevation of its institutions and its people against unexampled difficulties. It is the prayer of a race just emerging from pagan darkness to the light of Christian civilization for countenance and protection. The government of a friendly people, whose welfare is of vast importance to us, invokes a recognition of its right to exist—a right for which we, of all nations, have contended. There are no minor interests of diplomacy, commerce, or trade that might not do as well under another government, but it is the cry of a nation for its own chosen autonomy that comes to us. The suggestion of individual or trade interests dishonors the cause they represent. The vulgar clamors of sugar-planters or sugar-boilers for an increase of their profits are not heard. It is the voice of the government of the Hawaiian Islands, speaking for a people that are likely to be crushed to the earth, to be driven from their possessions upon the pathway of universal commerce on the greatest ocean of the globe, asking us to aid them.

They come to the United States, of course. Who is there but the Government of the United States that would not despoil these people? Who was there but the Government of the United States that did not desire to dismember China and Japan; and who is there except our own Government that would not gladly possess or dismember the Hawaiian Islands if it were in their power?

THE SPIRIT OF THE TREATY.

It is not their first appeal. In 1855 they made an application of this kind; they proposed a purely commercial treaty with the Government, which was not acceptable and was not ratified. In 1867 they made another proposition more liberal, but of the same character, which failed for the same reason. Both of those treaties embraced commercial propositions alone. They gave us comparatively a small list of articles which they were willing to receive from us, and they presented a more important list of articles which they desired this country to receive from them. Their negotiations failed because the protocols were thought alike inequitable and impolitic.

Now, sir, they present a third treaty; but it is different in its character, and presents an entirely different question for consideration. One article of the treaty I will read in which it differs from the others. It is the latter part of the fourth article:

> It is agreed on the part of His Hawaiian Majesty that so long as this treaty shall remain in force he will not lease, or otherwise dispose of, or create any lien upon any port, harbor, or other territory in his dominions, or grant any special privileges, or rights of use thereof, to any other power, state, or government, or make any treaty by which any other nation shall obtain the same privileges relative to the admission of any articles free of duty hereby secured to the United States.

This article is the soul of the treaty. The commercial regulations proposed are of no consequence to us whatever; they are of no importance to any section of our country or any portion of our people except those of the Pacific coast. But they are of infinite import and consequence to the Hawaiian government and people so far as they enable them by the increase of their local trade, their general commerce, the extension of their industries, and the growth of their revenues to maintain their government for themselves and their descendants.

The clause that I have read, so far as the United States is concerned, is the very soul of the treaty, and it is one of vast importance to this country and to the world as well. Gentlemen who have spoken upon this question have said that the treaty does not provide for the concession or surrender of any harbor to our Navy; that it does not authorize the construction of any forts; that it does not admit of our sending one or more regiments of troops, or one or more batteries of artillery there, and that there is no indication that they intend or even contemplate either now or hereafter the annexation of these islands to the United States.

That is all very true and very well. We do not want harbors there; we do not want any portion of our small Army there; we do not want to fortify positions or occupy forts there; we do not want to provide for the annexation of these islands to the United States; we want none of these things, and it was a wise arrangement, for which possibly we are indebted to the government of Hawaii, that a treaty is made, for the first time, I think, in diplomatic history, upon a basis which recognizes their right to possess and maintain indefinitely their own government, and at the same time secures, without cost and without peril of any future complication whatever, the protection for our States on the Pacific that every administration of our Government has asserted would be imperiled if the Hawaiian Islands should fall now or hereafter into the hands of indifferent or hostile states. All that we ask of them is that they maintain their government; that they shall prevent any nation whatever, Germany, France, England, Russia, or any other government, from getting a foothold that shall ultimately give them the possession of this key to the Pacific Ocean, and this important and vital result is accomplished by this treaty. If there is another to be found in our archives that does so much for us at so little cost I should be glad to see it.

This treaty will be remembered as an embodiment of a new principle. It constitutes an era in diplomatic history. It is a fact of signal import in the intercourse of civilized and Christian states, that we offer them the advantages which they want on no other condition than that they shall keep their own possessions undisturbed by us, and at the same time secure for ourselves a complete defense of the most exposed portion of our extended coast by a modification of our commercial regulations of no detriment whatever to anybody, and without sacrifice of principle or probity, disabuse them of any suspicion that we intend or desire to interfere at any time in any way with their possessions or their rights. No event of this centennial year, or the century that closes, or that which opens, can better represent the possible comity of nations, and the exact justice which all governments, if they choose, may attain, than the Hawaiian treaty of 1876.

CHARACTER OF MODERN TREATIES.

Gentlemen have said that the treaties of Christian nations are of little import and no account. The honorable gentleman from Texas, [Mr. MILLS,] in the early discussion of this question made a speech remarkable for its research and the generous spirit in which his views were presented in the discussion of this question, but his conclusion was that treaties, when they were needed, were of no authority, and that nations that made war upon each other did not care for them or regard them. But his illustrations carried us back to the beginning of this century. Three-quarters of a century have passed since the treaties were made to which he reverted, and the principles of intercourse between the nations of the earth have been substantially revolutionized in this period of time.

When Napoleon was fighting for his existence against Great Britain and her allied powers, it is quite probable—and it might perhaps be justifiable in him under the circumstances—that he disregarded the treaties with which he had been bound before that war began. And other nations may have followed his example or have set a bad example for him. But they have expiated their acts, one and all. History has pronounced its judgment upon this man and these states; and the policy by which they were led is no longer the policy of the civilized nations.

Treaties now are substantive facts. The treaty which China made first with the United States and then with the other treaty powers is stronger for her protection than any navies or armies she could ever gather, discipline, or command, with her 400,000,000 of people. The treaty which Japan made with the United States and afterward with other governments will do more for the protection of that empire and the integrity of its territory than all the navies and armies she could organize, discipline, and command.

There is a public opinion, now everywhere recognized and everywhere influential, by which all civilized states are constantly governed. What more remarkable than the appeal to that universal public sentiment, which constitutes public opinion, made by Prussia at the beginning of her late war with France? Treaties now are recognized as material facts, potential in the adjustment of international controversies. As physical forces, they represent what there is of moral power in the administration of international law.

Just south of us, within a couple of days' sail of the very heart of this continent, there are eight hundred islands, every foot of which belongs to the governments of Europe that were inimical and hostile to us during more than four years of war, and yet, being protected by treaties with the United States, during the war there was never the slightest interference by this Government with their rights. Those islands, as every man knows, on whichever side he was, were made not only the depots but the distributing points of the munitions of war during the whole of that terrible and bloody struggle; every one knew that ships, privateers, arms, and ammunition were concentrated there; but, protected by their treaties and disclaiming any interference in the contest, these governments were never disturbed in their ordinary intercourse with the United States in the slightest degree.

The treaty-making power is a great power. It is one of the potential influences that control the world. More and more, as public opinion is enlightened and concentrated, this exposition of public sentiment in the intercourse between Christian and civilized nations in the form of treaties will be extended and observed. The obligation and sanctity of treaties is a matter of daily recognition among governments. They are not only equal to armies and navies, but they displace physical force, substituting therefor the principle of arbitration, which is an appeal to the justice of an enlightened public opinion.

ITS RESULTS AND ITS DEMANDS.

We have, therefore, accomplished by this treaty all that we desire for the protection of our interests in the Pacific Ocean. It is an alliance, a protection for an exposed frontier, an outpost in the center of the Pacific, in friendly hands, for our defense, which will continue as long as we choose to maintain friendly relations with the Hawaiian government. There will be no interference on the part of other nations. Great Britain, France, Germany, or any other power that desires to obtain a naval position in the Pacific Ocean or elsewhere, and might under certain circumstances very safely and readily attack and dispossess the Hawaiians of their islands, will find that below them and above them is this treaty stipulation and relation, which secures us against the transfer of these islands, either by treaty or by conquest, to any other power without our express or implied consent.

It does not mean that we are to go to war for the protection either of their interests or our interests; nothing of this kind is implied or understood. The very fact that these islands, by the execution of this treaty, are deprived of the power to transfer their territory, or any privileges incident to it, to any other nation, makes it impossible for a foreign state to get a clear and unquestioned title, either by treaty or by conquest, over these islands. The treaty stipulations of the United States are as good against conquest as against a cession by treaty. It does not call upon us for an exhibition of force or any violence whatever. It is a legitimate title, made in the interest of peace for a valuable consideration, of which we cannot be justly dispossessed by any nation without our consent, and sooner or later our claim would be recognized and acknowledged by all nations; and upon appeal to them the universal judgment of men would be that no nation could take a title to these islands, either by purchase, as against the United States, or by conquest, as against the Hawaiians, without inexcusable injustice to one or the other of these contracting parties. Both would be interested and consulted in any change, either by agreement or force, and the consent of both would be necessary to a transfer in either form.

It is for that reason that I say this treaty is a memorable event in the intercourse between civilized nations—an era in diplomatic history. Why, then, should we not, under circumstances so favorable as these, seal with our approval these negotiations, and give to this treaty the same effect between each government and their subjects that it now has as a covenant between the high contracting parties; for as between them, without our intervention, it is, according to the Constitution, the supreme law of the land. Gentlemen say that there are serious objections to it, and a principal one seems to be a loss of revenue.

THE QUESTION OF REVENUE.

Mr. Chairman, the principle embodied in the fourth article of the treaty dwarfs, as I have said, all other considerations in regard to it. Here is a principle which will preserve the interests that we have in the government of the Pacific Ocean without any outlay of money or any expenditure of strength on our part. All that it does is to assure us that at the end of a quarter of a century, when the destiny of this part of the world may have been more completely developed, our successors will not then have discovered that by our fault the interests of this country were surrendered, abandoned, betrayed by its rejection.

But let us consider the question of revenue. The propositions in regard to the revenues to be derived from these islands, which have been presented by different gentlemen, especially by the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. MORRISON,] and also by the minority of the committee in their report on this subject, are based entirely upon the present condition of things. Whether upon that showing the revenue interest is for us or against us, I will not say; but this much I will say, that the present condition of trade between this country and the Hawaiian Islands is no proper basis upon which to calculate our loss or our gain. There is an influence and power which will be engendered by the enterprise and vigor of our people as compared with that which now controls the commerce of the islands, which will change instantly and largely the balance of trade as it may now exist, giving us always the advantage.

RECIPROCITY AND ITS EFFECTS.

Look at the condition of trade between us and the Canadas twenty-two years ago. The reciprocity treaty between us and Canada of 1854 found us with an export of but $1,599,000 from the United States to Canada, and we imported at the same time from that country $10,840,000. This balance was against our agricultural products—a very disadvantageous showing for our farmers—particularly for the farmers of the West, who were most interested in this matter. Breadstuffs were coming from them to us in the ratio of 9 to 1 instead of going from us to them in the same ratio. In 1863, however, we imported from the Canadas but six million dollars' worth of breadstuffs and exported fourteen million dollars' worth to that country. The export from Chicago in 1854, the first year of the treaty, was less than $13,000,000. In 1864, it was $41,000,000. We had $30,000,000 value to buy of them and Canada had but $3,000,000 to sell to us. Yet in ten years under the operation of that treaty, imperfect as it was, we sold to them more than they sold to us. The lumber product of the United States in 1864 exceeded $100,000,000, and the highest import of lumber we had from the Canadas in that year was less than $90,000.

So we say that the interchange of trade, the removal of restrictions to commercial intercourse, is constantly in our favor as against any nation with whom we have yet been brought in contact; and it will be much more for our advantage in regard to trade between Hawaii and the United States than with the Canadas in proportion to the importance of the interests that are involved.

Gentlemen ask what reciprocity can exist between 40,000 people on the one side and 40,000,000 on the other. Mr. Chairman, the reciprocity is exactly the same, as just and as perfect, as it would be between 40,000,000 on the one side and 40,000,000 on the other. They take from us all that 40,000 people can receive and they transfer to us all that 40,000 have to send. The disparity of population does not affect the result. So far as the reciprocity extends, it is as perfect as it would be if each party represented 40,000,000 people.

Let us look at the question of revenue as stated by these gentlemen on different sides. It shows a loss on our part of $456,000 of revenue on the imports of last year as the result of this treaty, chiefly if not wholly upon the duty on sugar; and if the growth of sugar should increase as they say it will, and reach ultimately 50,000,000 pounds per annum, the loss would be $1,200,000 each year, and at the end of seven years $10,000,000. I do not think I misstate or misrepresent in any degree the argument of gentlemen who have presented these figures. But, sir, this revenue upon the increased product of sugar—$1,200,000 a year and $10,000,000 for seven years—we do not now receive, and therefore we do not and cannot lose it. We cannot lose what we have not. If we defeat the treaty, we shall never receive this $1,200,000 a year and this $10,000,000 for seven years. We need not trouble ourselves very much about losses which it is not possible for us to suffer, and of which, if this advice is taken, we shall be in no danger whatever. We cannot lose their $10,000,000 nor this $1,200,000 upon the increased product, because if the treaty be rejected it cannot and will not exist, nor shall we lose the $456,000 of revenue on the first year, because, as I have said, it is assumed as the basis and origin of the treaty that the Hawaiian government will be unable to maintain its separate and independent organization upon its present resources for any great length of time. They will be compelled to make arrangements with other governments—with Germany, France, or Russia, or with Polynesia—and receive from them the advantages of trade which we refuse them, with loans of money or other advantages indispensable to the perpetuity of its government, sacrificing its independence, and our security therefor. They will be compelled to merge with them, and with that will go their trade as well as the political influence and the territorial possessions of that government. We cannot drive them from us and keep their trade, and we shall lose the $456,000 in duties which we now receive. We lose nothing, therefore, by giving effect to the treaty, and we may gain in the same proportion as in former relations with the Canadas. The increase of wealth and trade is more important than the duties imposed on commerce with other nations.

Gentlemen will see then that in regard to the first item of loss, if we refuse to give effect to the treaty, we lose it any way; and that in regard to the increased product of fifty million pounds of sugar, the yearly revenue of $1,200,000 and the $10,000,000 in seven years will go the same way, in company with the loss of other things we never had.

But, sir, the fact is not as it is assumed to be. If this treaty is carried into effect, the trade between these islands and the United States will be largely increased. The very exceptions that have been made by the opponents of this treaty in regard to the items of clothing, machinery, and some other things of that sort, are the very items which strengthen the interest and power of the government of this island. We have nothing to gain by making a sharp bargain with them. They give to us the advantage of their possessions in our interest and for our protection for the next quarter of a century if we choose to continue the treaty; and if by any little importation of clothing, machinery, or other articles of that sort they make a little money, it is for our benefit more even than theirs.

But the fact is not as stated in that regard. The tariff of the Hawaiian government is but 10 per cent. upon their imports, while ours ranges from 70 to 125, or more; I do not know what it is. On many articles it is something enormous. Therefore the continuance of this wholly unimportant duty of 10 per cent. upon some articles in which for the present they are interested is of no account whatever in comparison with the gigantic assessment of duties which are paid to us. Thus, looking at the question of revenue, it does not seem to me that it possesses any weight which for a single moment ought to lead the House from its duty.

MONROE DOCTRINE.

They say there is another principle which will protect our interests in that quarter of the world apart from this treaty and any advantage or friendship which it may secure for us from Hawaii. What is that? It is the Monroe doctrine. Now the honorable gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON] spoke against the principle of the Monroe doctrine as applicable to this measure, in the belief no doubt that its friends had relied upon some undefined advantage which it might give their cause; but I have not heard one of them speak of the Monroe doctrine in support of the treaty. On the contrary, whenever mentioned, it has been by its opponents. They assume, for example, there may be some detriment to this country and its interests if the islands should fall into the hands of indifferent or hostile nations; that then the spirit of Monroe, or the Monroe doctrine, is to be applied in some undefined manner to restore to us the advantage we ourselves by our own fault have discarded and lost. The honorable gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] mentioned it in that way. The honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] spoke of it with great unction in the same light. He went so far as to enumerate the means, the ammunition by which this Monroe doctrine was to be applied to recover territory which by our fault had been repelled and driven from us into the hands of our enemies. He said the rebel yell in unison with the songs of the Union would be heard together urging the people to the recovery of that which they had thrown away for the purpose of getting it again under the instrumentality of this novel application of the Monroe doctrine.

But I do not think that will happen, sir. In the first place, taking the utmost possible latitude of the Monroe doctrine, it is scarcely applicable to this particular possession. The utmost stretch of delineation which has been given to that indefinite political principle is to say that no European nation should be allowed to get a new foothold upon any territory in this hemisphere. Well, sir, I suppose the Hawaiian Islands must be considered as within this hemisphere, barely so, no more. But the Monroe doctrine never did apply and never will apply to any territory, wherever situated, which we ourselves reject and drive from us, disregarding interests and friends, into the possession of foreign and hostile governments. There is no interpretation of the Monroe doctrine that will give us the control of a country we have lost by our own neglect, by our own imperfect anticipation of the necessities and destiny of the future. Therefore we have no hope if we let these islands go in the application or success of the Monroe doctrine to cover our folly or recover our losses.

But gentlemen have said if Great Britain, for example, takes these islands, they are going to attack the Canadas. They give up to Great Britain the possession of the islands in the first place, and then make war upon her in another part of the world. That would be worth considering if we had not tried the experiment. Every Yankee knows there was one man who did give up an important military possession of this country and who also attacked the Canadas, and we made as little by the betrayal of the country and the surrender of its military position as by his attack upon Canada; and it will be the same now. We have no hope of advantage to be sought in this manner.

Mr. Chairman, the only remedy for us is to enforce our rights when we can—and while we have the opportunity, to make our relations with the people and government of Hawaii so strong as to secure them in the possession of their territory, which is all we want, and thus to make it impossible for other nations, either by conquest or by purchase, to take from them their possessions or from the United States the rights they claim, which is that those islands shall remain in the hands of the people to whom they belong.

THE SUGAR DUTY.

Then it is said the repeal of this duty on sugar of two and one-fifth cents per pound is a bounty to the sugar-planters of Hawaii. It is scarcely so. It is no bonus; it is no advantage to them; and the sugar-planter does not get one dollar more for his crop transported to California or to the Pacific coast with the duty removed than he would with the duty maintained. The duty is paid by the people of the Pacific States. If the price of sugar falls, they have the advantage of it, and the money remains in their pockets. The income and profit of the planter are precisely the same one way or the other.

The only advantage to the Hawaiians is that they can increase their crops. They will find a larger market in the Pacific States and therefore they can grow more sugar, they can cultivate more land, they can employ more labor, and the position of all parties is improved with the increased prosperity of the country. The duty there or here or anywhere else is paid by the consumer, and not by the producer or exporter. Therefore we have nothing to lose in that way, but, on the contrary, much to gain. The people of the Pacific coast are benefited by the remission of duties.

THE PACIFIC STATES.

And, Mr. Chairman, have not the Pacific States some claim upon us? Is there any portion of this country more isolated from the great expanse of the North American continent than the people of the Pacific States? You heard the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] speaking with an air of triumph on another question some time ago of the advantages which the States of the Mississippi Valley had in respect to immigration and the increase of population and wealth over the people of the Pacific States. It was because the immigration of Europe came to the Mississippi Valley and staid there. The homestead law, it might almost be said, is limited in its effect westward to the Mississippi Valley. It brings not many emigrants from Europe to the Pacific States. By and by, if we are wise enough, we will extend the operation of the homestead act, and give to the Pacific slope the advantages of immigration and the increase of population and wealth which the Mississippi Valley has so long enjoyed. And I hope even that this House will be willing to make such an extension of the principle of that act.

The people of the Pacific States have labored under great difficulties, but they have done what they could to increase the prosperity of the country. They stood by us in the hour of peril. It was the Pacific slope that for a long time held the balance of the Union in favor of its people and its Government. If they had gone against us, as it seemed possible they might, we are scarcely able to believe that the contest would have ended when it did; and surely no man that loves his country and rejoices in its prosperity and permanence will ever cease to be grateful to the people of the Pacific slope. For them and for the Government the commercial features of this treaty are infinitely better than the treaties of 1855 or 1867, and neither Mr. Guthrie, Secretary of the Treasury under President Pierce, nor Mr. McCulloch, Secretary of the Treasury under President Johnson, discovered in those measures any disadvantage to the financial interests of the United States, nor will they suffer in the slightest degree under the present treaty. And now we talk of the remission of two cents and two-fifths of a cent per pound on the sugar that they get from the Hawaiian Islands as an injury to the country!

WHAT LOUISIANA NEEDS.

The honorable gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON] spoke for a quarter of an hour on the theory that this treaty would give a bonus to the sugar-growers of Hawaii, when in fact it does no such thing. He did not consider it as of any account, not even worth the mention, that it gave some advantage to the people of the Pacific States and did him or his constituents no harm. Sir, there is no State in this country, not even Massachusetts, for which I have a kinder feeling than for Louisiana and its people. I know their interests, and I was not surprised, nor disappointed, nor grieved when I saw the gentleman standing up defending and maintaining those interests, as he ought to do while he is their representative. But I might say to that honorable gentleman that which the people of Louisiana most need was not suggested in his speech upon the treaty. What they want is protection of their sugar lands from the overflow of the Mississippi, which the Government of the United States alone can do, and which well done will cost us at a day not far distant forty or fifty million dollars. But now, when we are pleading for the execution of a treaty that gives us the control of the Pacific Ocean and that puts into our hands one of the most vital elements of national defense in that quarter of the world, he comes to us with a groan about a bonus of two cents and two-fifths of a cent per pound to the sugar-growers of Hawaii which they will never receive, never suggesting what is the necessity as well as the demand of the people he represents, and forgetting the advantages the people of the Pacific coast derive from the treaty, who must in the end tax themselves for the protection of Louisiana. He will find better means of protection for the vast interests of his constituents elsewhere than were suggested in his opposition to the treaty.

But, sir, they say that this treaty interferes with the revenue and with the products of the Gulf States. What the sugar-planters of the Gulf States need I have already stated. But I do not understand, apart from this, that there is any interference with their interests. The very first question I asked of the honorable gentleman from Texas, [Mr. HANCOCK,] who is a member of the committee, was whether this treaty would affect injuriously the sugar-planters of Louisiana; and his reply was instant and decisive: "We have examined that subject thoroughly in its bearings, and we do not find there is a pound of sugar that goes from us to them or comes from them to us."

THE FUTURE OF THE PACIFIC STATES.

Well, now gentlemen say that although sugar may not go there or may not come here from there, yet that refined sugar will do so; but that is not true. The Pacific States will increase in population; that portion of the country which now has but a million and a quarter or less of people will possess the vigor and force of fifteen or twenty million people. They have the wealth to sustain that population, and when the varied interests of the Pacific and the gigantic States upon its borders are developed there will be a population on the western slope of the United States of not less than 20,000,000. There will be then as now a market for the sugar that comes from Hawaii and a demand for all that is refined in California.

ADVERSE INTERPRETATION OF THE TREATY.

There is one objection made by the minority report which strikes me with surprise, or would do so if I had not found how easy it is for one man to differ in opinion with another about very common matters. The report of the minority of the committee, upon page 5, makes an objection to the treaty that "it prevents the Hawaiian King from making any lease or disposition or creating a lien upon any part of his dominion, or granting any special privileges or rights of use therein. But it does not exclude him from giving equal privileges and use to every other nation with ourselves. Nor does it forbid a treaty by which any other nation might purchase such special right." For some time I could not comprehend this; but I saw after a while the distinction set up between that which is special and that which is equal. But it is a difference that appertains to words only, and does not touch the powers conferred by the treaty. Every grant made by treaty to any state is, in the nature of things, a special grant, because the treaty itself is a special contract between specified parties for a special consideration paid by one to the other. The King cannot, therefore, grant to any other government by treaty equal privileges with those secured to the United States, because the grant itself would be a special grant, whether equal or unequal, to other privileges conferred by other treaties, and it is for that reason precluded by this treaty. But it is said by the minority that while the King agrees not to grant any special privileges to any other nation, the treaty does not exclude him from giving to other nations equal privileges with those secured to the United States, "nor does it forbid a treaty by which any other nation might purchase such special right." But the treaty itself removes this objection. The King binds himself not "to lease or otherwise dispose of or create any lien upon any port, harbor, or other territory in his dominion." And no nation can take, either by gift or purchase, from the King that which he has no power to dispose of, alienate, or grant, whether it be equal or unequal to the privileges conveyed to the United States. Such a conclusion is a graceless descent from argument, and it would seem to be unnecessary to put the names of so many strong men to so weak a criticism.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. STEVENSON. I move that the time of the gentleman be extended,

No objection was made.

Mr. BANKS. I thank the House for its courtesy, and hope not to trespass much longer upon its kind attention.

REVENUE FRAUDS.

There is another objection of some importance. It is that the treaty will be subject to frauds in its execution. It is said that it will be impossible to prevent frauds in the exportation of sugar from the Hawaiian Islands; that all the sugar grown in the other States of the Pacific will be brought into the Hawaiian Islands and thence exported to the Pacific States free of duty. They forget that the people of this country have now, or will have at some time hereafter, both the means and capacity of executing their laws. And the treaty itself by express provision gives to us the power for the most complete and thorough execution of the laws under this treaty. The third article of treaty is as follows:

That the evidence that the articles proposed to be admitted into the ports of the United States of America or the ports of the Hawaiian Islands free of duty, &c., under the first and second articles of this convention, are the growth, manufacture, or produce of the United States of America or of the Hawaiian Islands, respectively, shall be established under such rules, regulations, and conditions for the protection of the revenue as the two governments may from time to time respectively prescribe.

Now whatever rule we require for the protection of our revenue they must give to us, or the treaty is at an end. The very moment that the Hawaiian government dissents from any demand we make as to the manner in which our interests shall be protected, that very moment the operation of the treaty ceases, because it cannot operate a day or an hour except with the consent of the two governments.

THE SOVEREIGNTY OF THE ISLANDS.

The opponents of the treaty seem to fear that the sovereignty of these islands may pass into the hands of the feeble races of the East. Asiatic laborers, they say, are to usurp this key to the vast interests of the Pacific, and the overcrowded empires that will occupy its coast; the natives of Malaisia, Australia, Polynesia and the coolies of Japan and China will overpower the Caucasian race, and their numbers counterbalance its superior capacity and character. It is an error. A just comparison of these races will show the impossibility of such a result. No race can more easily adapt itself to the necessities of the situation, or is less likely to be absorbed by the power of others, than our own. It is our line of business; we have followed it from the creation of our Government. Our ancestors began it a long time before these people ever thought or dreamed of seeing us. There is no population of the globe that can stand before the Anglo-Saxon pioneers. See what our own pioneers have done. And may we not hope, as the avant-courriers of western civilization, to compete as successfully with the native races of the Pacific as with other peoples whom we have encountered? We mistake the character of our own people, and overrate in a great degree the importance of the native races of the East.

THE WHALE FISHERY.

If we seek to know who is to control a country, our own or any other, we must ascertain the character of its people and the business in which they are engaged. I shall ask the attention of the House for a few minutes to the legitimate and natural business of the Hawaiian people. In the first place the Hawaiian Islands must be one of the principal centers of the commerce of the Pacific. Among other important interests is the whale fisheries. That interest has been of vast importance heretofore, and is to be of increased importance in the future, because there is now a market for the bone of the whale, nearly equal in value to its oil.

For some years the whale fishery has been partially suspended, but it is now gaining strength. The seas of the north most frequented by the polar whale have been restocked, and there is an immense supply of whales where ten or fifteen years ago it was thought to be exhausted. We never had an opportunity to study the habits of young whales and the comparatively unknown laws of their existence and growth on their breeding-grounds, near the Japanese Islands and Corean Seas, where they find the shallow waters necessary to the delivery of their calves. They cannot live, it is said, out of this narrow belt where they have been found. But these privileges will be accorded at no distant day, and the information thus obtained will furnish the means not only of tracing the growth of these monarchs of the seas, but of protecting them as we do now the seal and other fisheries in the Atlantic and Pacific from wasteful and swift destruction. New hunting-grounds for this majestic game will no doubt be found in the Arctic and Antarctic Oceans. The floating ice-fields afford them shelter, and they will increase as rapidly as they are captured. We did not discover the polar whale until the southern whaling-grounds had been exhausted. These gigantic fisheries must constantly increase in importance and value. New uses are found for its varied products. The commercial and mechanical uses for animal oils will multiply with the constantly growing necessities of civilization, and this branch of industry must expand with the growth of empires and the multifarious wants of associated life. None but the bravest and strongest families of man can engage in its contests or compass its triumphs.

We took millions of barrels of oil from the polar whale in the Sea of Okhotsk until 1867, when the Russian government forbade us to enter there. Those seas having been undisturbed for nine years by the harpoon of the whaler, will be re-opened by the Russians or some other people, and so will all the seas adjacent to the Pacific Ocean.

The minor fisheries, too, are of equal importance. Halibut, cod, herring, salmon, are as multitudinous as the sands of the desert in the North Pacific and its border seas and rivers. All the shell-fish known to the Atlantic, with other superior varieties, are found in limitless quantities on the Pacific coasts. There are few fish, it is said, available for salting or for commerce on the western coasts of the Pacific except in the Sea of Okhotsk, where the cod is not found in great quantities. The eastern coast has the finest fisheries of the globe. Japan and China offer an unfailing market for fish. Cattle are scarce, meat but little used, and fish is one of the principal articles of food. The same is true of the Hawaiian Islands and other parts of the Pacific. We know what the Atlantic fisheries have done for England, France, and the United States. The Pacific furnishes a basis for this industry on an incomparably grander scale, and the Hawaiian Islands are the best position for its development to be found on the globe. The repair and construction of vessels, the purchase of supplies, and the exchange of commodities will create a permanent and prosperous trade. The whale fishery will be carried on in vessels built in its own ports expressly for this pursuit, and steamers employed for transportation in place of the sluggish sailing-vessels that require from three to five years for a voyage.

THE OCCUPATION OF HAWAIIANS.

Honolulu must become a financial city as important as New York, Philadelphia, or Boston were at the opening of this century. The repair and construction of ships and the purchase of supplies will be paid for in drafts on the principal commercial cities of the world. The Danau, an Austrian man-of-war, repaired last year at a cost of $100,000, was paid for in drafts on Austrian bankers.

TIMBER.

The country between the Aleutian Islands and the Sierras, including British America and the Pacific States, embraces nearly all the valuable timber found between Alaska and Patagonia. The South American coasts, Hawaii, New Zealand, and Australia have but little timber suitable for ships or dwellings. They are supplied from Washington Territory and British Columbia, and is a principal part of their trade.

Hawaii, in the very center of this trade, becomes a natural maritime station for the navies and commerce of all nations. Vessels constantly arrive for repairs. They find there the best materials and good mechanics. The richest man in Hawaii is a ship-carpenter, who went there as a common laborer. His name is Robinson, possibly a descendant of the Crusoes. The whaling fleets have no other resource. It is a half-way station for vessels between the United States and South America, Australia, Japan, China, and India.

The maritime decisions of the Hawaiian courts are sought and respected by all nations. Nearly all the commercial states are represented by diplomatic or consular agents, who live in good style and furnish employment for small traders, mechanics, and laborers.

The missionaries have expended a million and a half dollars there, and their influence radiates through all the nations of the Pacific. They have checked the desolating influences that would have swept away its native populations and preserved them for the yet unknown beneficent purposes of God.

There are many varieties of indigenous and foreign products which, when better known, will furnish materials for manufactures and commerce; there is an infinite variety of fibers, unknown to commerce, in the six thousand islands of the Pacific that are used by the natives for making nets, cordage, fish-lines of great strength, clothing, and paper. The ramie plant grows everywhere spontaneously and luxuriantly.

The smaller trades must, of course, follow in the wake of these general pursuits. There are iron-founders, engineers, mechanics, merchants, professors, and teachers profitably employed. People from nearly all the European states have made it their home for life. There are five hundred Portuguese, mostly small farmers, who furnish household supplies and all tropical fruits and grow the best coffee known to commerce. Four of the islands are used for grazing, and produce fine beef, mutton, and wool in abundance.

The government is engaged in an accurate topographical survey of all the islands with the same care and by the same methods as the Coast Survey of the United States. Surveys have also been made under the auspices of the United States from San Francisco, and San Diego to the Hawaiias, and thence will run to Australia, Japan, China, the Indies, and Europe. The northern route by the Aleutian and Koorile Islands has been found impracticable for the present.

Who is to be charged with this new development of the Pacific, and who will control its varied and important interests? That is the question. The Siberian of the Russian coast and the Esquimau of the American are incapable of this work. The native Malays, Australians, Polynesians, and Hawaiians must have been created for a less important destiny. The Japanese, Chinese, and Coreans are undoubtedly capable of rapid and great improvement, and will become great and controlling states, but it is scarcely possible in our day. Who, then, is to direct the rising and overspreading destinies of the Pacific empire in the future, if it be not that race to which we trace the present civilization? It is to that race that we must look for the direction of these new and grand issues of coming generations, and to its chiefs alone will be intrusted the possession of the Hawaiian Islands, the central position of this new theater of human enterprise and the key to its success and power.

COMPLICATIONS WITH OTHER STATES.

What danger, sir, is there of our being involved in complications with other nations in regard to those islands as a result of this treaty? In my opinion, none at all. If we had a harbor, forts, or regiments there, if we contemplated annexation of the islands to the United States, there might be danger. But it is the merit of this treaty that it relieves us of all danger of these complications, no matter what may occur, whether it be the conquest or sale of these islands either to Great Britain, France, Russia, Germany. There is no occasion and no call for us to interfere at any time, under any circumstances, for any purpose whatever. We have only to say to conqueror or purchaser, "The islands you have taken from the Hawaiians are not theirs to give. You cannot take them by conquest nor by purchase. We appeal to the public opinion of the world against your violence and rapacity." Under this treaty we are less liable to perilous complications with other nations than we have been since our independence was proclaimed. There is no danger whatever to be apprehended in that regard.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have spoken longer than I had intended. This is an inviting subject, one of great importance, as well as great interest; and I feel I am trespassing upon the time of my honorable friend from Virginia, [Mr. TUCKER.] I will leave the discussion of the subject now if he desires to go on, or if he chooses to let me go on now and make his speech in the morning I shall be very glad to aid his friends in giving him the opportunity. There are one or two points I should be glad to consider relating to another branch of the subject.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I desire to close this debate to-day if possible, and had made arrangements with the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to transfer the session of to-night to Thursday night, so that gentlemen might know that we intended to take a vote on this bill before the adjournment to-day; but if the House desires that this subject shall go over, after the gentleman from Massachusetts shall have concluded his speech, so that the gentleman from Virginia may speak to-morrow, then, if it can be the understanding that this bill shall be the special order after the reading of the Journal to-morrow, I shall be very glad to have a change of the arrangement already made.

Mr. RANDALL. I think that the arrangement first suggested by the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] had better be made. To-morrow the steamboat bill will come up. I therefore concur in the suggestion of the gentleman that the session of to-night be dispensed with, provided it be understood that this bill shall be disposed of finally to-night. I understand that we can reach a conclusion of this subject about half past five o'clock.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. As I understand the position of this bill, the only remaining speech, after the gentleman from Massachusetts shall have concluded, will be made by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. TUCKER.] I shall then propose that the committee rise and report the bill to the House pro forma. I shall then demand the previous question and, after detaining the House only a few minutes myself, will ask a vote upon the bill.

Mr. BANKS. If the committee will give me till four o'clock I will finish what I have to say.

The CHAIRMAN. Any arrangements that may be made in Committee of the Whole will require the confirmation of the House in regular session, though the understanding may be had in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RANDALL. Then the committee had better rise. Under existing arrangements the Speaker would have to take the chair at half past four o'clock and declare the recess.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee can either rise now to make the arrangement or after the gentleman from Massachusetts shall have concluded.

Mr. BANKS. I would like to finish what I have to say on the subject. I want to touch upon another topic, the duty of the House in regard to treaties; the most important question of all.

Mr. TUCKER. I desire that my friend from Massachusetts shall not feel himself in the slightest degree restricted by any reference to my convenience. I should be very glad to hear him in full upon this subject. It is an interesting one, and I should be pleased to listen to all he has to say before I address myself to the subject.

EXECUTION OF TREATIES.

Mr. BANKS. I will add but a few words. It was my design to speak upon the duty of the House in regard to the execution of treaties. The time to which I have limited myself does not enable me to speak on that subject fully; but I have this much to say: that it appears to me we are taking a new departure in the politics of the country; we are entering upon a new career; and, if I mistake not, there is a sentiment here different from that which has governed the House heretofore. During the eighty-years and more since the organization of the Government there have been nearly six hundred treaties ratified by the United States with different nations, and this House has never refused in a single instance the legislation necessary to put them in operation.

It looks to me as though we were going to enter upon such an experiment, as if gentlemen were acting together for that purpose; and therefore I wish to say a word or two now or hereafter upon that subject. But I will not trespass upon the patience of the committee. [Cries of "Go on!"]

Mr. Chairman, there is an honest difference among members of the House as to its duty and its rights when called to enact laws necessary to give effect to treaties. That difference of opinion has existed for more than three-quarters of a century. It has been said on one side that a treaty made by the President and Senate was the supreme law, and it was the duty of Congress to pass such measures as might be required to put it in operation. It has been held on the other side that if any legislation were required upon subjects over which the Constitution gave to Congress exclusive jurisdiction, the House would have the same right to withhold its assent in the case of a treaty as with any other subject of legislation. Every important treaty has raised this question, and it is a question for us now to consider. It may be assumed that the language of this particular treaty, not found in any treaty heretofore made with foreign nations recognizes the right of the House to enact or reject the laws necessary to put it into operation. But I do not think so. The honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] said in his speech some days since, with emphasis, that he was relieved from all difficulty in regard to his duty upon this treaty, because it was provided in the treaty itself that it should not be promulgated until the laws necessary for its execution were passed, the House participating of course with the Senate in the enactment of those laws. But he was in error. The treaty is ratified by the Senate and has been promulgated and proclaimed as law by the President. It bears the seal of the Government of the United States. It is a contract with a foreign nation. It is a compact with an independent state. It is a solemn covenant, "witnessed by the Almighty God," as John Quincy Adams said of a former treaty with France, and is now, as between the governments that are parties to it, as complete and perfect as any treaty is or can be. I know very well the courts cannot execute it and the custom-house officers will not be free to regard the treaty as superior to the statutes, although, in the language of the Constitution, it is now the supreme law of the land.

Mr. KELLEY. Does it not contain an express clause that it shall not go into effect until approved by the Legislature of Hawaii and the Congress of the United States?

Mr. BANKS. It contains such a clause, but it does not say that it shall not be promulgated until such laws are passed, as the honorable gentleman stated the other day.

Now I wish to read this proclamation. It is in the last paragraph of the treaty, and is as follows:

> Now, therefore, be it known that I, Ulysses S. Grant, President of the United States of America, have caused the said convention to be made public, to the end that the same and every clause and article thereof may be observed and fulfilled with good faith by the United States and the citizens thereof.
>
> In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

It is therefore proclaimed, and the Congress of the United is required to observe and fulfill every clause and article thereof, as the supreme law of the land.

But it does not go into effect, as the honorable gentleman has said, until certain acts are done by Congress.

The fifth article provides that the present convention shall not take effect until approved and proclaimed, &c., and "not until a law to carry it into operation shall be passed by the Congress of the United States of America." It is not to go into operation until then. But it is this day, so far as the two Governments are concerned, as solemn a covenant as if it had been in operation a hundred years, and obeyed by every court and citizen of the land. Nothing we can add to it can give it greater validity as a compact or covenant with the Hawaiian government.

But it does not take effect until a law shall have passed; that I understand. Mr. Chairman, the Constitution requires us to vote a salary for the President. We might put a clause in a bill for this purpose that it should not be paid unless the Senate concurred in our action, or until the President had approved it. Would it make any difference whether or not the law contained such provisions? Certainly not. The Constitution requires the concurrence of the Senate and the approval of the President before a measure of the House can become a law. The payment could not be made without such concurrence and approval. It is, therefore, surplusage. Suppose we said in the river and harbor bill, which we just now passed by suspension of all the rules, "this act shall not take effect," or "this money shall not be paid," until the Senate concurs and the President approves it. Would it make any difference in the operation of that act? Would it be any satisfaction or dissatisfaction to my friend from Pennsylvania if these words were incorporated into every statute we pass?

Mr. KELLEY. I do not see the analogy.

Mr. BANKS. I know the gentleman does not see the analogy, but the analogy exists nevertheless, and the provision is inoperative in the treaty as it would be in the statute. It is inoperative because it does not change in the slightest possible degree the character of the act or the treaty nor affect in any way the duty or power of the House. It is surplusage. While I have not said anywhere in private or in public that a treaty could go into operation until the necessary laws were passed to give it effect, I maintain that these words in this treaty are of no effect whatever. They do not affect in any way the character of the treaty or the duty or rights of the House.

Mr. KELLEY. If the position of the gentleman from Massachusetts be sound, why is the House called upon to vote on the treaty and why is he now speaking on it? If it is already an effective treaty, is not his speech surplusage?

Mr. BANKS. I do not propose to defend or apologize for my speech in any way whatever. It would be impossible for me to speak to the comprehension of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I know that very well. But let me say to him that this is now a treaty, a solemn covenant; that the United States and the Hawaiian government as treaty-making powers have done all they can ever do to perfect it; but that it does not execute itself and cannot go into operation until laws shall have been passed for that purpose.

Mr. KELLEY. Then would it not be well to abstain from voting on it, because you have your treaty?

Mr. BANKS. That is exactly what the gentleman from Pennsylvania proposes and would be glad to do. That is what we desire to prevent if we can. We desire that this treaty shall go into operation; that it shall not stand upon the statute-book unexecuted; that it shall not have been proclaimed to the people of this country and all the nations by the President, under the seal of the United States, and be disregarded by the Government and people. We hope it will not stand on the statute-book a delusion, a snare—the evidence of a solemn covenant that we refuse to execute and thus a burning disgrace and shame to the people of the United States. That is what we mean. That is the point I was going to present. It opens a great question which has occupied the attention of the people of this country from the foundation of the Government. I have not time to present it fully unless the committee permit me to go on and give my friend from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] the opportunity of replying to me to-morrow or at some other time.

I desire to say that this question is one upon which depends the existence of the Government. Upon its decision depends its sovereignty. A government that cannot make and execute a treaty is not a sovereign state. Without the power to make and fulfill treaty stipulations it is not sovereign. There will always be some one party or another that can defeat the best intentions to perform its agreements that our rulers can entertain. It is a question which must at some time be definitely settled, and it is for that reason I spoke of a new departure which was now taking place in the policy of the Government; and I would like to know of those who intend, if they can, to assume the reins of government what the duty of the Government is as to the execution of treaties and when they come into possession of the Government, whether they intend to destroy this treaty-making power and despoil the people of this country of the capacity and privilege of making treaties with other nations under the Constitution as it is.

It is neither a new nor unimportant question. When we had conquered our independence in seven years of war against Great Britain, we found ourselves incapable of assuming an independent position among nations, because under the Confederation we could not make a treaty. Any State could defeat its execution, as it is now claimed the House can. The British King said to our commissioners, When you can make a treaty I will recognize your independence. It was this defect in the Articles of Confederation that led in great part to the adoption of the Federal Constitution.

The Congress of the Confederation took the subject into consideration very early. It issued an address to the States of the Confederacy, signed by Arthur St. Clair, the fourteenth President of the Continental Congress, the 13th of April, 1787. It was drawn up by John Jay, then minister of foreign affairs in the Government of the Confederation. It set forth the difficulties under which the Government labored in regard to treaties with foreign nations. It set forth in strong language the nature of treaties and the necessity of providing some means of executing them when made. "Contracts between nations," it said, "like contracts between individuals, should be faithfully executed, even though the sword in the one case and the law in the other did not compel it." The non-execution of a treaty was a cause of war to be settled by the sword, as the failure to perform contracts among individuals was to be enforced by the authority of courts of law. That was the theory of the Congress of the Confederation, and it is the theory upon which the Government under the Constitution has acted when other nations have failed to fulfill treaties made with us. We have appealed to the sword under the best administrations of our Government against the strongest nations of Europe when they neglected to execute their treaties with us. The declaration of the Continental Congress was the strongest if not the earliest made by the American Government on the subject of treaties. It accepted the theory of treaties stated by Blackstone in his Commentaries on the Laws of England. Blackstone's Commentaries was the text-book of the people of the Colonies, from the inception to the close of the Revolution. Our authority in the assertion of the rights of the American people as colonists, under the constitution of Great Britain, was drawn from the pages of Blackstone. We knew the work better than the English lawyers, and more copies of it were sold in the American Colonies than were sold in Great Britain for years after our Independence was acknowledged.

The sanctity of treaties, under the British constitution, is thus stated by him:

The sovereign power of making treaties is vested in the person of the King, and whatever contracts he engages in no other power in the kingdom can legally delay, resist, or annul. (Blackstone's Commentaries, I, page 256.)

That power did not exist in the Confederation, and to remedy that inherent and fatal defect in the Articles of Confederation it was given in express terms to the President and Senate in the Constitution of the United States. All treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the Constitution, by the President, with the concurrence of two-thirds of the Senators present, "shall be the supreme law of the land." They are the supreme law of the land in all matters affected by them, exactly as the laws of Congress made in pursuance of the Constitution are the supreme laws of the land in matters to which they refer. Each is supreme in its own specified sphere.

Mr. REAGAN. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. BANKS. Certainly.

Mr. REAGAN. The question arises upon this treaty that by the Constitution the House of Representatives is charged with the bringing in of revenue bills; and if we recognize the right of the President and Senate to make treaties affecting questions of revenue we take from the House its constitutional right over the subject. That is the only question I understand to be raised on that subject; and I desire to say that a distinguished statesman of Massachusetts, Mr. Choate, argued this position as an objection to be overcome, and was sustained in that by a very eminent statesman from Virginia.

Mr. BANKS. I know that; the objection stated by the gentleman from Texas I have in my mind. But the theory of Mr. Choate's report is not applicable to this case. Mr. Choate said that, in his opinion—and in that he was sustained by the Senate—it was not advisable to undertake to settle questions of purely commercial relations between us and foreign states by treaties.

That was all, and that has no application to this treaty.

Mr. REAGAN. I never conceived that there was the same objection to this treaty which was then spoken of.

Mr. BANKS. I have not stated that; but I wish to say this, that it is not a purely commercial treaty such as Mr. Choate alluded to in his report, and even in what he said then he would not be sustained by precedents. There are many treaties regulating our commercial relations with other nations upon the statute-book. It was a favorite principle with Mr. Jefferson and others to regulate commerce by treaties. John Adams said that the principle of regulating commerce by treaties, which he advocated in 1775, upon the question of sending an embassador to France, had been the invariable guide of his "conduct in all situations, as embassador in France, Holland, England, and as Vice-President and President of the United States from that hour. This principle was, that we should make no treaties of alliance with any European power; that we should consent to none but treaties of commerce."—Works, volume 1, page 200.

I do not mean to advocate that policy, but I say that if we had only that condition of industrial interest which would spring from treaties which were to remain in force for a stipulated period of time, say ten or twenty years, we should be much better off to-day than we are now with a tariff which is changed by legislation nearly every year.

But that is not what I am discussing. This is my proposition: A treaty made by the President with the concurrence of two-thirds of the Senators present, under the authority of the Constitution, is the supreme law of the land, as obligatory upon Congress as it is upon the people.

DECISIONS OF THE COURTS.

Now I want to call the attention of the House to the decisions of the United States courts on this question. They have had it before them very often, and their general language is that a treaty is a compact or contract between sovereign nations, which the courts cannot restrict or extend as regards the right of the sovereigns that are parties to the contract. They cannot, nor can Congress, change the rights of the sovereign powers that are parties to the contract or covenant or treaty. That is the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. The earliest decision on this question was given by Chief Justice Jay, in the case of the schooner Peggy, captured in the West Indies, within the jurisdiction of the government of Toussaint L'Ouverture in San Domingo. The language of Chief Justice Jay was this:

The obligation of a treaty the supreme law of the land must be admitted. The execution of the contract between the two nations is to be demanded from the executive of each nation.

The execution of the contract is to be demanded of the executive of each nation. The legislature of either nation has no right to refuse it. Either party to the treaty has a right, in the language of Chief Justice Jay, to demand from the executive of the nation the execution of the treaty, which is the supreme law of the land.

In the case of Foster vs. Neilson, Chief Justice Marshall said:

The court recognizes the existence of the contract as between nations over which it could have no jurisdiction. But in regard to third parties, the legislature must execute the contract before it can become a rule for the court.

The compact between the sovereign nations is unchanged; it is untouched; nothing can add to it; nothing can subtract from it, in the language of these most eminent Chief Justices of the Supreme Court, who were familiar with the exigencies which led to the creation of the treaty power and the rule by which it is to be governed.

THE BEST EXPOSITIONS OF CONSTITUTIONAL LAW

in this country take the same view as to the scope and character of the treaty power.

Let me read an extract from the Commentaries of Chancellor Kent, volume 1, page 286:

The argument in favor of the binding and conclusive efficacy of every treaty made by the President and Senate is so clear and palpable that it has probably carried very general conviction throughout the country, and may now be considered as the very decided sense of public opinion. * * * It is as much obligatory on Congress as upon any other branch of the Government or the people at large so long as it continues in force and unrepealed.

Judge Story says:

Treaties are not common rules prescribed by the sovereign to his subjects, but agreements between sovereign and sovereign. The treaty-making power, therefore, seems to make a separate department and to belong neither to the executive nor the legislative, but to partake of the qualities common to each.

Mr. Rawle, whose commentaries on the Constitution have been held in high esteem by strict constructionists of the Constitution in relation to the great questions which have disturbed our political relations heretofore, is more emphatic as to the nature of the treaty power under the Constitution than either Kent or Story.

Having felt the necessity of the treaty-making power and having fixed on the department in which it shall be invested, the people of course excluded from all interference with it those parts of the Government which are not described as partaking of it. The representation held out by our Constitution to foreign powers was that the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, could bind the nation in all legitimate compacts; but if pre-existing acts, contrary to the treaty, could only be removed by Congress this represenation would be fallacious; it would be a just subject of reproach and would destroy all future confidence in our public stipulations. The immediate operation of the treaty must therefore be to overrule all existing legislative acts inconsistent with its provisions. (Rawle on the Constitution, chapter 7, page 60.)

And again:

There can be no doubt of the true spirit and intent of the Constitution in respect to all pecuniary supplies required to support the treaty-making power. It is incumbent on Congress to furnish those supplies. (Page 67.)

Again he says:

But this is not inconsistent with a power to pass subsequent laws qualifying, altering, or even annulling a treaty. (Rawle on the Constitution, page 61.)

I read another authority, less known but not less entitled to consideration, because he states, as to the remedy in cases where treaties are not executed or enforced by either of the contracting powers, the exact course pursued by this Government against Spain and France, not for refusing but for neglecting to execute their treaties with us:

As there is no possible manner of forcing Congress to pass a law carrying out the provisions of such a merely promissory convention, (treaties,) the only remedy which the other high contracting party would have for the neglect or refusal of the legislature to perform its stipulated duty would be to treat the neglect or refusal as a breach of the treaty and a good cause of war. That it would be sufficient ground for war, according to the settled rules of international law, cannot for a moment be doubted. (Pomeroy's Constitutional Law, page 450, § 676.)

But we will not leave this subject to the opinion of any one branch of the Government. I will read a passage from a letter of Mr. Wheaton to the Attorney-General of the United States, written from Copenhagen in 1835, upon the subject of treaties and the obligation to enforce them. He says:

I. Neither government has anything to do with the auxiliary legislative measures necessary on the part of the other state to give effect to the treaty. Each government is responsible to the other for its non-execution, whether the failure proceeds from one or the other of the departments of its government to perform its duty.

The omission is here on the part of the legislature, but it might have been on the part of its judicial department. The court of cassation might have refused to render some judgment necessary to give effect to the treaty.

This letter had reference to the controversy between this country and France in regard to the payment of money due for French spoliations. Mr. Wheaton says:

The King cannot compel the chambers; but the nation [France] is not the less responsible for the breach of faith arising out of the discordant action of the internal theory of its constitution.

Again he says:

The inadequacy of consideration or inequality in the conditions of a treaty—

Just what has been urged here by the opponents of this treaty, is no reason for its non-execution—

The inadequacy of consideration or inequality in the conditions of a treaty between nations, such as might set aside a contract between individuals on the ground of gross inequality or enormous lesion, forms no sufficient reason for refusing to execute a treaty.

One more authority in regard to the officers of the Government, and I leave this question of law. Mr. Caleb Cushing, now United States minister to Spain, when Attorney-General during the administration of General Pierce, giving his opinion, to be found in Opinions of the Attorneys-General, volume 7, page 291, says this:

A treaty, assuming it to be made in substance and form conformably to the Constitution, has the effect—under the general doctrine that "leges posteriores, priores contrarias abrogant"—of repealing all existing federal law in conflict with it, whether unwritten, as laws of nations, or written, as legislative statutes.

That makes what I consider a just representation of the view that the courts of justice and the law officers of the Government have taken of this question. I come then to the action of the Executive Departments on this subject.

Mr. HOAR. I desire, some time during the very interesting argument of my colleague, [Mr. BANKS,] to ask him one question.

Mr. BANKS. Certainly, with pleasure.

Mr. HOAR. I understand his argument to be that this provision in this treaty, that it shall not go into effect until the law carrying it into operation shall have been passed by Congress, is mere surplusage; that that is true of all kinds of treaties; that it is like the case of the salaries of the judges of the Supreme Court, where there is a constitutional obligation on Congress to provide for those salaries, although, of course, they do not receive them until the Congress has passed a law making the appropriation. But is not this treaty something more than that? Is not the effect of this provision to make a condition? In Jay's treaty the faith of the Government was bound, and although the House must take part in the necessary legislation to carry it into effect, yet it was a breach of public faith if the House refused. Now is not this clause of this treaty put in to meet that very case, and does it not notify all foreign governments that we are bound to nothing whatever, as in a matter of ordinary legislation, unless the House of Representatives shall give its assent?

Mr. BANKS. That is the question. We are bound to the execution of this treaty.

Mr. HOAR. Is there any treaty at all now? Does not this convention say that this shall not be a treaty unless the House of Representatives and the Congress of the United States shall give assent to it?

Mr. BANKS. No; it does not say that. If it said it should be no treaty till then, it would be a very different question. But it does not say that it is no treaty. On the contrary, it declares that it is a treaty, signed by the President, bearing the seal of the United States, and proclaimed as a supreme rule of action for everybody, Congress as well as all others. It is to be executed; and all it says in the words my colleague [Mr. HOAR] referred to is that it cannot be executed without consent of Congress. And in the present condition of things it could not be executed without a law of Congress if this clause was not in it.

Mr. HOAR. The point is——

Mr. BANKS. Allow me to say that my colleague is coming to the alternative that was contemplated by the republicans and federalists in the time of the administration of President Washington, but which has never yet been reached, as to what will be done if Congress shall ever refuse to enact the law required for such a purpose. Congress has never yet made that refusal. The question I put to this House is whether this centennial year is to be celebrated by a nullification of the treaty-making power of the United States?

Mr. HOAR. I quite agree with my colleague that the important point is this clause.

Mr. BANKS. I am sorry I cannot make my colleague understand my idea.

Mr. HOAR. If my colleague will allow me, this clause reads:

This convention shall take effect as soon as it shall have been approved and proclaimed, * * * but not until a law to carry it into operation shall have been passed by the Congress of the United States of America.

Mr. BANKS. Well, it never could take effect until a law is passed. But it is our duty to pass the law necessary to give it effect and execution. And every treaty, whether containing these words or not, is just exactly the same. No treaty that requires legislation or the authority of law can go into effect until some power has made that legislation, and at present that power is in the two Houses of Congress. But there is another power, if we push the Government to it, as was contemplated during the administration of Washington, that will relieve the House of Representatives from any obligation of this character. But I am not in favor of that policy, and I do not know that anybody is.

The fact is there is no power to execute this treaty or any other treaty, neither Jay's treaty nor the treaty with France, according to the practice of the Government, until a change be made in the law, which should relieve the officers of the Government from their obligation to obey the laws of Congress and give authority to the courts of justice to enforce its provisions in regard to the interests and rights of third parties. The interpretation of this qualifying clause, that is asserted, would change the constitutional provisions as to treaties, and make the House of Representatives, were it accepted, a part of the treaty-making power. That was never intended.

TREATY WITH GREAT BRITAIN IN 1796.

But, sir, I was coming to this question. I began with the discussion of Jay's treaty in 1796, to which my friend has referred. Mr. Jay had made a treaty with Great Britain which was thought to be greatly to the disadvantage of the United States. It was universally unpopular. Mr. Jay was burned in effigy in his own State. Public meetings were held everywhere, denouncing the administration and the treaty. Measures proposed for the execution of the treaty were discussed for six weeks in the House of Representatives by all the leading men of the country; but they finally agreed to pass the laws. As a matter of fact, the discussion of the treaty and the measures connected with it was made the basis of an organization against the administration of Washington, which became afterward the foundation of the federal and democratic parties, which have substantially divided the people of this country to this day. The opposition to the execution of Jay's treaty was abandoned, and a law passed to carry it into effect; and from that day, though the same question has been discussed often, yet of nearly six hundred treaties entered into with foreign states not one instance has occurred in which this House has refused the legislation necessary to execute a treaty.

[Here the committee rose for the purpose of extending the session.]

Mr. BANKS. I was speaking of the debate on Jay's treaty and its effect, if not its object, and the fact that no failure to execute a treaty had occurred in nearly six hundred cases that had been presented for that particular species of legislation required for the execution of treaties. Now, the fact in regard to Jay's treaty was that, Washington having made the treaty, the House of Representatives was dissatisfied with it, as were a great majority of the people of the country, and called for the papers in the case. The President decided that the House of Representatives had no deliberative power in regard to treaties, and therefore he was not bound to furnish the papers. The resolution calling for information was offered by Mr. Edward Livingston, of New York, who had been three months a member of Congress, and the House of Representatives then declared that in those cases where legislation was necessary to the execution of a treaty or any of its provisions they had a right to determine whether they would execute it or not. Upon that they did proceed to pass the laws necessary for the execution of the treaty, which was the appropriation of about $80,000 or $90,000, the amount required for that purpose.

Now I am not speaking in favor of the course pursued by the administration in the case of Jay's treaty any more than the policy then pursued by the House of Representatives or of the collateral party purposes, whatever they were, that the leading actors had in view. In my opinion, when a treaty has been made under the authority of the Constitution the legislative authority is bound to execute it. It is a moral obligation. There is no force that can be applied. It is exactly like voting the President's salary. The Constitution requires that he shall have it; but we have the power to refuse it, if we please. There is no power to compel us to vote it. So there is no power to compel us to pass the law to execute a treaty; but it is a moral obligation; and another State has the right to hold the Government accountable for either the refusal or the neglect to do it. I do not mean of course that the Hawaiian government would be able or disposed to do this if they had the right.

Undoubtedly if we fail to execute this treaty we as well as they would abandon it. No controversy in regard to the matter could arise between us and a weak nation like that; therefore, the proper and inevitable course would be, if the House of Representatives should fail of its duty, to abandon the negotiations. But it is nevertheless our duty to execute it, and the provision in the treaty that it shall not take effect until this duty is performed makes no difference. The case would be just the same if there were no such provision.

We have not entered into a covenant with Hawaii without an intention of fulfilling it. Our obligation and our duty remain the same whether or not reference is made to that subject in the body of the treaty. Thus much for the treaty of Jay and the administration of General Washington in connection with it. Although the discussion of the question involved has been renewed often, the views of Washington as to the right of the House to call for information have never been re-asserted. It is conceded that the House has the right to inquire if a treaty is made under the authority of the Constitution, whether or not it calls for legislation to execute its provisions. No treaty can be made which changes in any form the nature of the Government or annuls any of its provisions. We have therefore a right to call for any information that relates to it, in order that we may correctly understand its purpose and its result. If not within the province of the Constitution, we can properly inaugurate measures to abrogate or annul it. The first three treaties made with France were annulled in that manner. But if it be within the purposes and made in pursuance of the Constitution, we are morally bound to execute it. We have the power but not the right to defeat it as if it were an ordinary act of legislation.

IT IS NOT A LEGISLATIVE POWER THAT WE EXERCISE IN EXECUTING TREATIES.

We have but little discretionary authority. We are limited to an affirmative or negative vote. The bill must conform exactly to the terms of the treaty. We cannot amend them in any respect. We can but say yes or no. This is not the function of legislators, and this fact should convince the House that in executing treaties we take upon ourselves a duty distinct from ordinary legislation, partly deliberative—ascertaining whether a treaty is within the purview of the Constitution—and partly executive, as joining with the administrative department in carrying into effect its provisions. That, in fact, is the nature of the treaty-making power and all that relates to it under the Constitution.

"The treaty-making power," says Judge Story, "seems to be a separate department and to belong neither to the executive nor the legislative, but to partake of qualities belonging to each." Other authorities concur in this view, and their opinions are only expressions of the simple fact. It is neither an executive nor a legislative power, but a distinct province, a function, most happily conferred by the Constitution on certain officers or departments of the Government. The power of the House is of the same character. It is neither exclusively legislative nor executive, but partakes of the nature of both; a power that results from certain other functions rather than from any authority expressly conferred by the Constitution. And the act by which a treaty is made effective is not a legislative act for which the House could be held responsible. It must be copied in its essence and spirit, if not in express terms, from some other act which has never been submitted to the House for approval or disapproval and upon which it never had authority to pass judgment. This is not legislation. It is in the nature of a revision or codification of laws, requiring careful, conscientious consideration, but neither admitting alteration nor entailing responsibility. And this is the interpretation of acts passed by the British Parliament to give force to treaties, as stated by Judge Story in his Commentaries on the Constitution:

The Parliament, it is true, is sometimes seen employing itself in altering existing laws to conform them to the stipulations in a new treaty, and this may have possibly given birth to the imagination that its co-operation was necessary to the obligatory efficacy of a treaty. But the parliamentary interposition proceeds from a different cause, from the necessity of adjusting a most artificial and intricate system of revenue and commercial laws to the changes made in them by a treaty, and of adapting new provisions and precautions to the new state of things, and to keep the machine from running into disorder.—Article 3, § 1515, page 369.

The same statement is made as to the practice of the British Parliament on the subject of treaties by the writers of the Federalist, and it correctly represents the nature of the duties and authority of the House of Representatives and vindicates the wisdom and patriotism of the framers of the Constitution.

All the distinguished men connected with the civil administration of the Government to this day have accepted this view of the constitutional duty of different departments of the Government in relation to treaties. When men are charged with responsibilities of executive duty they are considerate of the interests of the country. In other situations, where their action is limited to debate, with no responsibility for talking or voting except when a casting vote is unexpectedly thrust upon them, they enjoy unlimited freedom. Of the distinguished men of this body in 1796 who were so eloquent in denunciation of Jay's treaty and so brave in defense of the constitutional rights of the House, I do not recall one who, when intrusted with administrative or diplomatic duties, did not take the other side of the question. Let us look at the course of some of the greatest of public servants.

ACTION OF WASHINGTON AND HIS CABINET.

Let me ask the attention of the committee to the words of Washington, first President of the United States, on this subject. In his answer to the call of the House he refused the papers in the case of Jay's treaty. Hear him:

Having been a member of the General Assembly and knowing the principles on which the Constitution was formed, I have ever entertained but one opinion on this subject, and from the first establishment of the Government to this moment my conduct has exemplified that opinion: that the power of making treaties is exclusively vested in the President, by and with the consent of the Senate; and that every treaty so made and promulgated thenceforward became the law of the land. It is thus the treaty-making power has been understood by foreign nations; and in all the treaties we have made with them we have declared and they have believed that, when ratified by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, they became obligatory. In this construction of the Constitution every House of Representatives has heretofore acquiesced, and until the present time not a doubt or suspicion has appeared, to my knowledge, that this construction was not the true one. Nay, they have more than acquiesced, for till now, without controverting the obligation of such treaties, they have made all the requisite provisions for carrying them into effect.—March 30, 1796.—House Journal, 292.

In this message his declarations are explicit and positive. He knew the principles on which the Constitution was formed and the opinions of the men who made it. He knew, of course, the provisions as to the rights of the House of Representatives, in the appropriation of money, the origin of revenue bills, so much asserted since, and yet he says "that the power of making treaties is vested exclusively in the President, by and with the consent of the Senate, and that every treaty so made and promulgated thenceforward became the law of the land." "Not a doubt or suspicion" had appeared to that time that that "construction was not the true one." More than this: "It is thus," he said, "that the treaty-making power has been understood by foreign nations; and in all the treaties we have made with them we have declared, and they have believed, that when ratified by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate they became obligatory." Was the President in these declarations faithless to this Government and false in his negotiations with others? Who was it that declared to foreign nations that a treaty ratified by the President and Senate was obligatory upon all departments of the Government? His Cabinet: Thomas Jefferson, Edmund Randolph, and Charles Lee, of Virginia; Pickering, of Massachusetts; Hamilton, of New York; McHenry, of Maryland, and the diplomatic representatives, James Monroe, Gouverneur Morris, Rufus King, and the Pinckneys. They were the men who declared to foreign nations that a treaty made by the President and Senate was obligatory upon the Government. Did they comprehend the Constitution? Did they falsify its provisions? Did they betray their own or deceive other Governments?

Washington asked the opinion of the members of his Cabinet as to the treaty made with McGilvray, chief of the Creek Nation, in 1790, by which goods imported into the United States for the use of the Indians were made free of duty. This was a violation of the revenue laws of Congress and of the treaty with Great Britain. It is substantially the case here now. President Washington, who negotiated the treaty, called for the opinion of his Cabinet as to the authority of the Government to conclude a treaty of this character. The opinion of the Cabinet was unanimous in favor of the power. Mr. Jefferson, Secretary of State, stated his opinion, which is given in the fifth volume of Marshall's Life of Washington, page 274, in a note to that page:

A treaty made by the President, with the concurrence of the Senate, is a law of the land, and a law of superior order, because it not only repeals all past laws, but cannot be itself repealed by future laws. The treaty will then legally control the duty act and the act for licensing traders in this particular instance.

This treaty, with a secret article providing for the case, was ratified by the Senate without a division, and no objection was made to it by any branch of the Government or any portion of the people, and no exception was taken to it except by Great Britain.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has again expired.

Mr. KASSON. I hope the time of the gentleman from Massachusetts will be extended by unanimous consent.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. BANKS. I must beg pardon of the committee; I had no intention of speaking this length of time.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there was a treaty with Algiers concerning the imprisonment of American captives. Mr. Jefferson himself in his Anas, page 114, (Jefferson's Works,) gives an account of his interview with the President in reference to that treaty. The date is April 9, 1792:

He (Washington) asked me if the treaty stipulating a sum and ratified by him, with the advice of the Senate, would not be good under the Constitution and obligatory on the Representatives to furnish the money. I answered it certainly would, and that it would be the duty of the Representatives to raise the money, but that they might decline to do what was their duty, and I thought it might be incautious to commit himself by a ratification with a foreign nation where he might be left in the lurch in the execution; it was possible, too, to conceive which it would not be their duty to provide for. He (Washington) said that he did not like throwing too much into democratic hands; that if they would not do what the Constitution called on them to do the Government would be at an end, and must then assume another form.

That is all. It was "their duty to raise the money," but they might decline to do their duty. That is exactly the case of this treaty. There is a moral obligation upon us to execute this treaty. We cannot escape from it. If we fail to do it for the Hawaiian government, with which we have a contract, we must suffer dishonor, and inflict discredit and injury upon a weak yet friendly power. I hope we shall not do it. The treaty was not made for that purpose.

MADISON AND HIS CABINET.

Madison was one of the leaders in the debate on Jay's treaty. When he became President he negotiated a commercial treaty with Great Britain, which was called in that day an imbecile treaty, embracing few articles and of four years' duration only. The question was whether legislation by Congress was requisite to change the tariff duties on the articles affected by the treaty. Calhoun took the ground—and he was the friend of Madison—that it required no legislation at all. I will read a passage from his speech on the Madison treaty of 1816:

He would establish to the satisfaction of the House that the treaty-making power, when it was legitimately exercised, always did that which could not be done by law, and that the reasons advanced to prove that the treaty of peace repealed the act making war, so far from being peculiar to that case, apply to all treaties. They do not form an exception, but in fact constitute the rule.

Which rule was that the treaty was superior to the law.

The truth is, the legislative and treaty-making powers are never in the strict sense concurrent powers. * * * When the two powers under discussion—i. e. the treaty-making and law-making powers—are confined to their proper sphere, not only the law cannot do what can be done by treaty, but the reverse is true: that is, they never are or can be concurrent powers. Why, then, has a treaty the force which he, Calhoun, attributed to it? Because it is an act in its own nature paramount to laws made by the common legislative powers of the country. It is, in fact, a law, and something more; a law established by contract between independent nations. * * * Another fact in regard to this treaty. It does not stipulate that a law should pass repealing the duties proposed to be repealed by this bill, which would be its proper form if in the opinion of the negotiators a law was necessary; but it stipulates in positive terms for their repeal without consulting or regarding us.

That was Mr. Calhoun's view of the treaty power and the rights of the House. Mr. Pinkney, of Maryland, took the same view. They were friends of Madison, and it is well known they sustained his views of the treaty. Madison was then clothed with executive power, and he felt its responsibility. Madison, like Washington, had made known to foreign governments the constitutional organization of the treaty-making power, and the members of his Cabinet—Monroe, of Virginia; Eustis, of Massachusetts; Rush, of Pennsylvania, and Crawford, of Georgia—concurred with him in his views as President. So did Bayard of Delaware, Barlow, Bainbridge, and Decatur, his principal diplomatic representatives. It was upon such representations that Calhoun was enabled to say to the House that the treaty stipulated in positive terms for the repeal of duties "without consulting or regarding us."

And Mr. William Pinkney, another friend and supporter of Madison, who was at one time in his Cabinet, took the same ground in common with Madison and Calhoun, that the treaty having become the supreme law of the land no act of legislation was necessary to give it effect. The House of Representatives insisted on passing an act. No one contended they could defeat the treaty. But they wanted to put the treaty in operation, and they passed a law which re-enacted the provisions of the treaty, and made the House a part of the treaty-making power.

The Senate rejected it. The Constitution provides that revenue measures shall originate in the House. But the law, putting in force the treaty of 1816, originated in the Senate, came down to the House, was disagreed to by the House, and then modified in committee of conference and agreed to by both branches.

There stands, then, the fact that Madison, the leader, the Ajax in that debate against Washington upon Jay's treaty, in almost the last of the acts of his administration, entered into a treaty with Great Britain and did not ask or desire, unless the House chose to do it themselves, that they should pass a law to give it effect, but sent to the House a message with a copy of the proclamation of the treaty, requesting such action as might seem necessary to its execution.

Albert Gallatin, of Pennsylvania, was one of the foremost opponents of Jay's treaty. He was an opponent of Washington's administration. He represented a district two counties of which were engaged in the whisky insurrection; and the whole Pennsylvania delegation, on the first question in regard to the call for papers, was with Gallatin and against Washington. Gallatin was one of the commissioners for the negotiation of Madison's commercial treaty. Did Gallatin as commissioner inform the government of Great Britain that no treaty could be valid unless approved by the House of Representatives? Of course not. He was one of the commissioners to whom Calhoun referred when he said that if the negotiators had thought a law was necessary to repeal the duties they would have stipulated for such repeal in the treaty, which would have been its proper form. But Gallatin made no such representation and proposed no such stipulation. He made a treaty which Mr. Calhoun said stipulated in positive terms for their repeal without consulting or regarding the House.

Still later, in 1845, Mr. Gallatin published a letter in which his opinions on the subject of the treaty power were thus stated:

The President may alone negotiate, he cannot make a treaty. A treaty cannot be made without the consent of two-thirds of the Senators present. An attempt to substitute for that express provision of the Constitution the approval of Congress, would give to the House of Representatives a direct agency in making treaties. Any law to that effect would be a nullity; it might be repealed by another law at any time, for no law which is not in the nature of a contract, which the Legislature has a right to make, is binding on subsequent Congresses.

THE ACTION OF MONROE AND HIS CABINET.

Now I come to the treaty of 1819, for the acquisition of Florida, negotiated during Monroe's administration, which ought to be interesting to the gentlemen from Texas. Monroe was the confidential friend of Jefferson and Madison, and during the discussion of Jay's treaty he was in constant correspondence with them. We shall see what idea Monroe had as to the execution of treaties.

The treaty of 1819 with Spain ceded Texas to Spain in exchange for Florida, dismembering the valley of the Mississippi. It was unanimously ratified by the Senate the day after its execution. Spain demanded new conditions relative to the independence of the Spanish colonies before it would execute the treaty according to its agreement. Monroe, the President, recommended Congress to postpone action against Spain on account of the change of ministry and the distress of the Spanish nation.

The House of Representatives was anxious to instruct the President to take possession of the Spanish provinces without regard to their non-execution of the treaty; and Monroe advised Congress, in his annual message, to execute the treaty by its own act without the co-operation of Spain. Spain, however, ratified the treaty October 24, 1820, more than two months after the time of the ratification had expired, and the final ratification was not completed until February 21, 1821, when Mexico had become independent and driven every Spaniard from her soil.

The English, Russian, and French governments remonstrated with Mr. Monroe against the violence of the United States, and urged Spain at the same time to perform its duty and ratify the treaty.

Mr. John Quincy Adams was Secretary of State, and he stated to the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of this House, Mr. Lowndes, of South Carolina, and to the minister at Madrid, Mr. Forsyth, the President's opinions and purposes. In his letter to Mr. Lowndes he says:

The President (Monroe) considers the treaty as obligatory upon the honor and good faith of Spain; not as a perfect treaty, (ratification being an essential formality to that,) but as a compact which Spain was bound to ratify; as an adjustment of differences between the two nations, which the King of Spain, by his full power to his minister, had solemnly promised to approve, ratify, and fulfill. This adjustment is assumed as the measure of what the United States had a right to obtain from Spain from the signature to the treaty. The principle may be illustrated by reference to the rules of municipal law relative to transactions between individuals. The difference between the treaty ratified and unratified may be likened to the difference between a covenant to convey lands and the deed of conveyance itself. Upon a breach of the covenant to convey, courts of equity decree that the party who has broken his covenant shall convey and further make good to the other party all damages which he has sustained by the breach of the contract. As there is no court of chancery between nations, their differences can only be settled by agreement or by force. The resort to force is justifiable only when justice cannot be obtained by negotiation, and the resort to force is limited to the attainment of justice. * * * The King of Spain was bound to ratify the treaty; bound by the laws of nations applicable to the case, and further bound by the solemn promise in the full power. He refusing to perform this promise and obligation, the United States have a perfect right to do what a court of chancery would do in a transaction of a similar character between individuals, namely, to compel the performance of the engagement as far as compulsion can accomplish it, and to indemnify themselves for all damages incident to the necessity of using compulsion. They cannot compel the King of Spain to sign the act of ratification, and therefore cannot make the instrument a perfect treaty; but they can, and are justifiable in so doing, take that which the treaty if perfect would have bound Spain to deliver up to them. The refusal to ratify gives them the same right to do justice to themselves as the refusal to fulfill would have given them, if Spain had ratified and then had ordered the governor of Florida not to deliver over the province.

Mr. Adams, in another letter to Mr. Lowndes, says:

It was alleged (by France and Russia) that in the present state of our controversy with Spain the opinion of all Europe on the point at issue was in our favor and against her.

Mr. Adams discussed the question with the governments of Europe as to what were the obligations of the powers to ratify and execute treaties made in good faith, and he wrote this letter to Mr. Forsyth, then minister of the United States at Madrid, August 18, 1819, (American State Papers, volume 4, page 658,) in which the theory of the entire Government, legislative, executive, and judicial, as to the obligation of Spain to ratify and to execute her treaties with the United States is vigorously and correctly stated:

Should it be suggested to you that the United States have on more than one occasion withheld or annexed conditions to the ratification of our treaties, it will readily occur to you that by the nature of our Constitution the full powers of our ministers never are or can be unlimited; that whatever they conclude must be, and by the other contracting is known to be, subject to the deliberations and determination of the Senate, to whose consideration it must be submitted before its ratification; that our full powers never contain the solemn promise of the nation to ratify whatever the minister shall conclude, but reserve expressly not only the usual right of ratification but the constitutional privilege of the Senate to give or withhold their assent to the ratification, without which assent by a majority of two-thirds of the members present at the vote taken after consideration of the treaty the President has no power to ratify. In withholding or refusing to ratify, therefore, no promise is violated.

This dispatch was read to the Cabinet, Crawford, Calhoun, and Wirt present, August 17, 1819. It was criticised by Calhoun and Wirt, much to the annoyance of Mr. Adams, but not one word was said against the paragraph relating to the statement of the treaty-making power as above written.

It is an official declaration of what was, and all that was, necessary to make a treaty valid under the Constitution. It was intended for the information of Spain and other European governments that had taken a friendly interest in our controversy with Spain. It was like the declarations made by Washington and Madison for the same purpose. It was supported by the unanimous vote of the Cabinet and the members of Congress of all parties. How can it be said that these distinguished statesmen either falsified the Constitution or practiced an imposition upon the governments whose kind offices in the end prevented a fierce and bloody war between us and Spain?

TREATY WITH FRANCE—PRESIDENT JACKSON AND HIS CABINET.

On the 4th of July, 1831, a treaty was made with France providing for the payment of indemnity for spoliations on American commerce. The French people had committed spoliation on our commerce and we had negotiated a treaty as to the amount of damages which they should pay, amounting to 25,000,000 francs, or $5,000,000, which they promised to pay in three or four installments.

They did not pay the indemnity. The French Chambers neglected to make an appropriation for that purpose; the treaty was intact and perfect, witnessed, as John Quincy Adams said in a speech in this House, by Almighty God. It was a treaty complete and perfect in all its parts, like the one before us, but the French Chambers neglected or refused to appropriate the money necessary to pay the indemnity.

General Jackson, on the 2d of December, 1834, in his sixth annual message to Congress, said:

The idea of acquiescing in the refusal to execute the treaty will not, I am confident, be for a moment entertained by any branch of this Government; and further negotiation upon the subject is out of the question.

He said, further, that there had been five different occasions when the appropriations might have been made, and added:

It is my conviction that the United States ought to insist on a prompt execution of the treaty, and, in case it be refused or longer delayed, take redress into their own hands. The laws of nations provide a remedy for such occasions. * * * It is a dated debt which it refuses to pay. The aggrieved party may seize on the property belonging to the other, its citizens, or subjects, without just cause of war.

After full debate, the House of Representatives resolved unanimously:

That the treaty of July 4, 1831, should be maintained, and its execution insisted on.

Yes,a 212; nays, NONE. And it then resolved unanimously that preparations ought to be made to meet the emergency growing out of our relations with France.

Of the members of the House of Representatives two hundred and twelve stood up in favor of the declaration of the President, and not one man voted in the negative.

Mr. KELLEY. If the gentleman will allow me, I desire to ask him a question. He says that that treaty was precisely like this. I would ask him whether it contained any clause that the treaty should not go into effect until the French Chambers should approve it?

Mr. BANKS. It did not, and in that respect it was exactly like this treaty, because no such provision or condition is necessary or operative. It was a treaty complete and perfect, a covenant which the French Chambers were bound to execute exactly as we are bound to execute this covenant.

Mr. KELLEY. It was a treaty stipulation for the payment of indemnity, without any reservation that the French Chambers should have a voice in the treaty. It stipulated that the French government should pay a certain amount. This treaty stipulates that when this Congress and the Hawaiian Legislature have approved the treaty, it shall go into effect; and if that be not done by the last day of next July, that this treaty shall be void and of no effect.

Mr. BANKS. There is no reservation made in this treaty of a power to refuse its execution. It is precisely the same as if the words were not there. It is a treaty made with an independent state by a Government that assumes the right and power to make a treaty. There is no reservation recognizing the right of anybody else to refuse the execution of that treaty. The legislation required is the execution of the treaty, and it cannot be refused.

It is a duty we are morally bound to discharge, the disregard of which would cover us with dishonor. The House of Representatives has never taken upon itself the responsibility of such a refusal.

Mr. KELLEY rose.

Mr. BANKS. Now let me go on.

Mr. KELLEY. Only a single remark.

Mr. BANKS. I have not been here so many years not to know that while my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] likes to ride in on everybody's speech, it is almost impossible to convince him that he is wrong. He is never convinced of anything except by his own speeches.

Mr. KELLEY. Because he never interferes except when he knows he is right.

Mr. BANKS. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is never right if he interrupts another who is entitled to the floor when he is not.

Now I want to say a word of this treaty with France. Here was a government that was friendly to us, to which we owed in great part our independence, a government that had made a treaty with us. The King was our friend but the French Chambers were inimical to his government; they were bold because he was timid, and strong because he was weak. They appealed to the debates of the House of Representatives on Jay's treaty in 1796, and reproduced, word for word, the arguments that had been made here as to the right of the House to annul a treaty, assuming if we had the right they had it also. And if we have the right now in regard to this treaty they had the same right then.

The minister of the United States at Paris at that time was Edward Livingston, the very man who had introduced to the House of Representatives the resolution upon which was based the organization of the opposition to Washington's administration; the very man who, three months after he became a member of Congress for the first time, led off in the crusade against the Father of his Country, who then had, as he has had to this day, the universal respect and love of all the American people. Edward Livingston was sent to France by President Jackson with reference to this treaty. He had been Secretary of State, and of course had approved all the measures adopted to compel France to execute the treaty, and was sent by the President as minister to persuade the French government to vote the money. He has left to us information as to the manner in which he did his work. He urged the members by private argument, exactly the same argument that Fisher Ames, and Hamilton, and the friends of Jay's treaty had urged in favor of the execution of the treaty which he himself had violently opposed, but to the government itself he only pleaded the obligation and the sanctity of the treaty. In the debate on Jay's treaty, Livingston had disregarded the obligation and sanctity of treaties, and claimed the right on his part and the part of the House to defeat it; but in France, where no money could be appropriated without the consent of the chambers, he urged its obligation and sanctity to secure a vote for the money. Now if he was right in the debate on Jay's treaty, what shall we say of the course he pursued at the court of France in regard to this treaty of 1831?

CONCLUSION.

So I conclude this brief reference to the distinguished men who were parties to the discussion of Jay's treaty by saying that not one of them who became connected with public affairs in the execution of the laws of this country, or the administration of its Government, for a single moment ever recognized the right of the House to refuse or neglect what Jefferson called the duty of raising the money. Here are precedents enough to guide us. Here is the administration of Washington and his Cabinet, with Jefferson at its head; the administration of Madison and his Cabinet, with Forsyth at its head; the administration of Monroe and his Cabinet, with John Quincy Adams, Calhoun, Crawford, Wirt, and other great men composing it; the administration of Jackson, with a Cabinet of great strength under the direction of Van Buren, Livingston, McLane, Taney, (afterward Chief Justice,) Woodbury, Cass, Amos Kendall, and other chiefs of modern democracy, who were ready to declare war against any government that refused or neglected to pass the laws necessary to execute a treaty, asserting the right of this Government in such cases to take into its own hands the execution of treaties.

Now, how shall we refuse, in the face of such precedents as these before us, the passage of a law necessary to the execution of this treaty, with the independent Hawaiian government, of whose population the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] said that a constituent part was composed of lepers? Lepers, forsooth! They have held for half a century the key of the Pacific Ocean in their own hands, against the combined influence of all nations, for our benefit! How shall we refuse to pass the law necessary to execute the treaty which we have made with them, to which all nations have been witnesses?

What matters it whether we say in this treaty, as we knew it must be implied or stated in every treaty, that it cannot be enforced by the custom-house officers or by the courts as against third parties until the requisite laws are passed by Congress for that purpose? It never could be enforced in the absence of such laws without a change of the uniform practice of the Government.

These people, then, occupying a position so important to us, and with whose interests we are indissolubly connected, whose island possessions are the key of the Pacific, ask us to execute the treaty we have made with them. For the first time in the history of this Government, for the first time in a period of eighty-seven years, we meet a House of Representatives that seems disposed to disregard its duty and determine that it shall not be executed as a law of the land, which the Constitution declares it to be.

I hope that I am wrong in this respect; but allow me to say that if the House shall negative the legislation necessary to render this treaty effective, in my opinion it will be a nullification of one of the most important powers of the Constitution, and if followed as a precedent, will undermine the Government itself, not only in its relations to foreign nations but in regard to the varied and important interests of the different sections of country of which it is composed. I hope this will not be done. I hope that we shall not stain the annals of this year, bright with the glories of the past and resplendent with the hopes of the future, by any act that denies that the Government is a sovereign power, or implies that it can make contracts with foreign nations which it has no power to execute. Let this never be said of the members of this House, of whom and against whom, if it be said, it will be remembered forever.

Washington National Monument.

SPEECH OF HON. L. A. MACKEY,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

April 29, 1876.

On the bill (H. R. No. 2338) to aid in the completion of the Washington Monument.

Mr. MACKEY, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, on the 28th of February last I presented to the House a bill, which was appropriately referred, entitled "A bill to aid in the completion of the Washington Monument," and desire to say a few words upon the propriety and importance of favorable congressional action on the subject, with faith and confidence that if the bill is enacted into a law the earnest desire of every American citizen to have that unfinished Monument completed would be gratified, and in a few years it would cease to be a disgrace and dishonor to the nation and a marked reflection upon the ingratitude of the Republic. By the provisions of the act of Congress of the 14th of February, 1876, the sum of $1,500,000 is appropriated to the Centennial board of finance for the International Exhibition to be held in the City of Philadelphia, and in the act it is provided that in the distribution of any moneys that may remain after the payment of the debts of the Centennial board of finance the appropriation made by said act shall be paid in full into the Treasury of the United States before any dividends are paid to the stockholders of said board of finance. Under the provisions of the bill presented to the House the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States is directed to pay out of any money that may be paid into the Treasury under the provisions of the act of Congress relating to the Centennial Celebration of American Independence the sum of $300,000, to be used in the completion of the unfinished Washington Monument in the city of Washington in accordance with the plans that have been or may be adopted by the Washington National Monument Society, the money to be paid as the work progresses, upon requisitions of the President of the United States, after his approval of estimates made by the engineer in charge of the work. It is estimated that under the plans recently adopted by the monument society the sum named will be sufficient to complete the Monument. As the Centennial Exhibition is an assured success, there can be no doubt that the receipts of the board of finance will be largely in excess of its debts, leaving a surplus in its treasury more than sufficient to pay the amount proposed to be appropriated to aid in the completion of the Washington Monument.

But it has been argued that the proviso of the act of February 14, 1876, that no dividend shall be paid to the holders of stock until after the re-imbursement of the amount of the appropriation made to the Treasury of the United States, warrants the construction that the stockholders shall be paid the par value of their stock before the surplus of receipts after payment of debts is paid to the Treasurer of the United States toward a re-imbursement of the appropriation made by Congress. I do not so understand it. The proviso in the bill ap propriating one and a half millions of dollars was not so intended, not so understood, not so received by those who voted for it; and I do not believe the stockholders will make the claim, if the patriotism of the nation is invoked in favor of a construction of the proviso in the act referred to in accordance with the true intent, spirit, and meaning of the same, which wiser men than myself have said was a clear provision against any division of capital, profits, or assets after payment of debts until the money appropriated shall have been repaid to the United States. But it is not my province nor desire here to discuss that question. It must be determined at another time and before the proper tribunal whether, in the ordinary legal acceptation of the term, stock in a corporation is a debt entitled to a preference over other accepted liabilities. I desire briefly to review the history of the national enterprise which it is the design of the bill I had the privilege of introducing to aid and encourage.

As early as 1799 it was resolved by Congress, on the 24th of December of that year, "that a marble monument be erected by the United States at the city of Washington, and that the family of General Washington be requested to permit his body to be deposited under it, and that the monument be so designed as to commemorate the great events of his military and political life." In complying with the request embraced in this resolution the widow, full of the tenderest affection for the memory of the great man for whose loss a whole nation mourned with her, replied in these touching and impressive words:

> Taught by the great example which I have so long had before me never to oppose my private wishes to the public will, I need not, I cannot say what a sacrifice of individual feeling I make to a sense of public duty.

But to this day the resolution remains unexecuted. Washington's remains rest sacred at Mount Vernon, and the Monument is not erected. In 1801 a resolution was adopted by the House of Representatives appropriating $200,000 for the erection of a Monument to Washington, but I believe it failed to pass the Senate. Despairing of receiving any aid from Congress, and its resolution remaining unexecuted as late as 1833, a voluntary association was formed by prominent citizens of Washington City to carry out the original idea of Congress to erect "a great National Monument to the memory of George Washington at the seat of the Federal Government," and this association appealed to the patriotism and invoked the aid of the people of the whole Republic "to redeem the plighted faith of their representatives."

The association, few, if any, of whose original members now remain, was composed of some of the purest men and noblest statesmen of their times, and was headed by Chief Justice Marshall as its first president. At his death, two years later, in 1835, James Madison was called upon to accept the office of president of the association. This illustrious man and honored statesman, then eighty-four years of age, and tottering on the very brink of the grave, expressed his sense of the high honor conferred upon him in a few eloquent words, in which he said:

> A monument worthy the memory of Washington, reared by the means proposed, will commemorate at the same time a virtue, a patriotism, and a gratitude truly national, with which the friends of liberty everywhere will sympathize, and of which our country may always feel proud.

The original design of the society was to allow every one an opportunity to contribute, and to carry out this idea the amount to be received from any one individual was limited to one dollar. The project was a grand one, and their faith in the patriotism of the people unflinching; but the progress of the society, in a pecuniary sense, was discouragingly slow, and in 1826 the subscriptions had reached the sum of only $28,000. The financial storm of 1837 which swept over the land left the society's prospects for the time prostrate. But, not discouraged, in 1845 they removed the restriction as to the amount to be received from any one person, and in 1847, having about $87,000 in their treasury, the members of the society believed themselves warranted in making preparations for the laying of the corner-stone on the Fourth of July, 1848. John Quincy Adams was chosen to deliver the oration, but, in the fullness of a ripe old age, death removed him before the event was inaugurated, and Robert C. Winthrop, then Speaker of the House of Representatives, was selected to perform this honorable duty.

Plans having been adopted, the society prosecuted the work vigorously, and at the expiration of six years, in 1854, the Monument had reached the height of one hundred and seventy feet, a little less than one-third the height originally designed, and the society, having expended $230,000, found itself without funds; and the Monument stands to-day substantially as it was left in 1854. A memorial having been presented to Congress in that year by the board of managers stating that they were unable to collect any more funds and asking Congress to take such action as to it seemed proper, a select committee was appointed by the House to whom the subject was referred, and on the 22d of February, 1855, a most appropriate time, the chairman of the committee, it is said, "made a most able and eloquent report, in which, after a careful examination of the whole subject, the proceedings of the society were reviewed and strongly approved, and an appropriation by Congress of $200,000 recommended." "Unfortunately," it is claimed, "on the very day the recommendation was presented the managers of the society were superseded by an unlawful election." To obviate further difficulties of a like character and to overcome the obstacles presenting themselves in the way of a voluntary association, a charter was asked for and granted by Congress on the 22d of February, 1859, incorporating "The Washington National Monument Society." Among its wisest provisions is that which makes the President of the United States ex officio its president, and the governors of the States ex officio, respectively, its vice-presidents.

The original plans for the Monument have been materially modified by the society, and while when completed it may not be the highest structure of art in the world, it will nevertheless exceed the height of any other monument now erected, and thus, like the character and virtues of the distinguished man whose memory and deeds it is designed to commemorate, "it o'ertops the tallest of them all." Having thus briefly sketched the history of the unfinished shaft as it now stands and of the varied experience of the society whose laudable and patriotic ambition it has been to erect this monument to the man to whom more than any other, or perhaps all others, we are indebted for the growth, power, and prosperity which we have been permitted to enjoy under our republican form of Government, it is fitting that a few words should be said of him whose memory we thus attempt to revere. But it is not my purpose here to attempt a lengthy eulogium on Washington. He needs none; and a hundred others have presented his character and virtues to the world in far more fitting terms than I could. Among all the names that have graced the pages of history, that of George Washington stands pre-eminent as being the only one against which there has never been cast a word of censure or reproach. His is the only name which even the enemies of his country have learned to reverence and respect. It was of him and to him that Erskine wrote when he said:

> I have a large acquaintance among the most valuable and exalted classes of men, but you are the only being for whom I ever felt an awful reverence.

And it was of him that the great Napoleon, the brilliant meteor that flashed along the French horizon in the early days of the nineteenth century, when he learned of our hero's death, proclaimed:

> Washington is dead! This great man fought against tyranny; he established the liberty of his country. His memory will be always dear to the French people, as it will be to all freemen of the two worlds.

The brave and brilliant Frenchman spoke more wisely than he knew. Napoleon's was a brilliant career, but its brilliancy was that of a flitting meteor, that dashes impetuously across the heavens and leaves the world in greater darkness; while that of Washington's was the steady, glowing light of the star that never pales and never sets. From boyhood to youth, from youth to manhood, from manhood till the snows of almost seventy winters had silvered his locks with age, he is the same wise, intrepid, and dignified counselor. His exploits are not those of a brilliant genius, his deeds not those of a dashing cavalier, but caution, wisdom, prudence, and dignity characterize and mark every step and every action of his life. From the time when but a boy of sixteen he explored the wilds of the Alleghanies to that memorable 14th of December, 1799, when his weary couch became his death-bed, his career was one without a parallel in the world's history. His life seemed to be a charmed one; Indian bullets and Indian arrows, British lead and British steel, were alike turned from their course when aimed at him, by an invisible hand.

In the light of the future history of Washington as the Commander-in-Chief of the American forces in the Revolution, as the president of the convention that formed the Constitution, as the first President of the United States, as the bright and shining example of manhood that would not accept the kingly crown of royalty in our new-born country, but preferred rather that such a government should be instituted as would make every man at once both sovereign and citizen, and in the light of the whole history of this Republic, who shall say that there was not a divine guardianship which made this man the humble instrument in the hands of Providence to establish here a government the wisest and most perfect the world has ever known?

Washington was not a genius, as the term goes. He was not quick-flashing and brilliant. His career was not that of the fiery-rushing rocket that for a moment brightens the heavens with its bright glare, then dies away and goes out forever. But he was true as the needle to the pole. His was rather the steady course of the planet in its orbit, never fluctuating, never varying. But if genius be that intelligence which enlightens the judgment, and that judgment which energized and strenghtened by intelligence is directed to sound conclusions then was Washington, indeed, a man of genius, and a genius such as the world has seldom known. His was a genius which searched for the philosophy of events, and, finding this philosophy, wisely based his action for the future on the certainties of the past. His was a genius based on moral principles. No public man ever lived in closer conformity with his conscientious and well-established principles of right. His moral character was the out-growth of his moral principles rather than a superstructure reared upon them.

The guidance of a noble mother and the companionship of a true and faithful wife were his constant support and stay in his bearing before the world, and these added their influence in presenting to the future this noble specimen of manhood. His moral sentiments showed themselves not in speech but in action. No man of so much prominence ever said less and did more to impress the greatness and goodness of his character upon the present as an example for the youth of the future. Your school-boy orator could prate more loudly of freedom than he, as your chronic office-seeker could speak more glowingly of patriotism; but both lights would wane and grow dim in the presence of the shining character of this great man whose very silence would smother their flickering flame. The quiet eloquence of the character of Washington carried with it more force than the impassioned oratory of his most eloquent compeers.

With this great man, duty always took precedence of inclination. Private considerations were always subordinated to the public welfare. Public life had for him no charms. Nothing can excel the modesty with which he was wont to receive the compliments of his friends and of the nation. So great was his embarrassment when he rose to reply to the resolution of the Virginia house of burgesses, to which he was elected at the close of the French war, thanking him for his military services to the colony, that he felt himself unable to utter a word, and the speaker only relieved the embarrassment by saying to him, "Sit down, Mr. Washington; your modesty equals your valor, and that surpasses the power of any language I possess." And when he found at the opening of the Revolution that events seemed to indicate that he would be made Commander-in-Chief of the American forces, so great was his agitation when his name was proposed to the convention that he immediately withdrew from the room, that no one might be intimidated by his presence from interposing any objections. Said Thomas Jefferson, in speaking of him:

> He was the only man in the United States who possessed the confidence of all; there was no other one who was considered anything more than a party leader.

At no time was Washington's disinterested patriotism more fully shown than when at the ratification of the Constitution the question rose to every lip, and was agitated in every circle, "Who shall be placed at the head of the Government? Who shall be made protector of the Constitution?" The name of Washington was uppermost in every mind, but the quiet life of Mount Vernon had more charms for him than the presidential chair. "The Great Searcher of human hearts is my witness," said he, "that I have no wish which aspires beyond the humble and happy lot of living and dying a private citizen on my own farm." What a grand man was this! What an example for the youth of America!

But volumes would fail to portray in fitting colors the greatness of the man whom not only our own Republic but the republics and monarchies of the world alike delight to honor. It is beyond the power of language to express fully the admiration which every true American bears in his heart for the character of this great man "first in war, first in peace," but above all "first in the hearts of his countrymen." To the memory of Washington, loved and revered by our whole people, loved and revered by the wise and great and good of the whole world, it is the design of the bill introduced to pay a fitting tribute.

The founders of the Washington Monument Society in their life-time did what they could. Their successors, with no less public spirit and with a patriotism no less ardent, have nobly seconded their example, but their funds are exhausted and it is now the privilege of this House as the Representatives of the people, and I cannot but feel that it is also their duty, to come to the relief of the society which has given its time and its energies to this great work as a matter of love and patriotism, for its managers, the best and purest men of Washington City, have always served without pay, and aid in the completion of the Monument. It has ever been the pride of our people to do honor to this great man. A triumphal march like that which witnessed his journey to New York to accept the honor of being the first President of the new Government which he had done so much to establish is nowhere on record. The people, ever ready to pay grateful tribute to the man to whom they felt they owed their rights as freemen in the new Republic, overwhelmed him everywhere with their blessings and congratulations. Can you imagine a more tender and touching sight than that which greeted him on Trenton bridge, when in the darkness of a lowering night, as he passed under an illuminated arch-way on which was inscribed in golden letters, "The defender of the mothers will be the protector of the daughters," he was met by the matrons of the city leading their little daughters bedecked with garlands of flowers, and singing the praises of the chieftain as they strewed their floral tributes in his pathway. No scene in this great man's career was to him more touching and impressive than this manifestation of the gratitude which the mothers of the land felt it their privilege to bestow upon him for the gallant defense he had made of the rights of the colonies.

The warm-hearted Virginians, as they ever have been, delighted to honor their favorite citizen, and as early as 1784 the Legislature of that State passed a resolution ordering a statue of Washington of the "finest marble and the best workmanship" as a monument of affection and gratitude to the man who had with combined heroism and patriotism rendered his name dear to all his fellow-citizens. The statue was executed by Houdon, and now stands in the capitol grounds at Richmond. But the Mother of the Presidents, not satisfied with one statue of her gallant son, on the 22d of February, 1858, inaugurated with imposing ceremonies a second one, executed by Crawford, a native artist, in the same city.

But Virginia was not alone in her zeal to do him honor. Her patriotic sister States, Maryland and North Carolina, both vied with her in perpetuating the memory and achievements of Washington. And, indeed, all through the Union the same patriotic spirit made itself manifest in erecting monuments as memorials of gratitude and respect to his memory.

Mr. Speaker, I am unwilling to believe that the Centennial Congress of 1876 is any less patriotic than those of its predecessors who have recommended appropriations for the completion of this National Monument to the memory of Washington. I am unwilling to believe that the patriotism which led our fathers to deeds of glory and victory has departed, and that we are but the degenerate sons of noble sires. God forbid that the day shall ever come when we shall forget the noble band that laid their lives upon the altar of their country's safety as a sacrificial offering in the hour of danger and peril. I will admit that in our busy age we have done too little to perpetuate their glory, but there is no more fitting time and no more fitting occasion than this to kindle anew the half-smoldering fires of patriotism whose embers with a single favoring breath will kindle into a new flame that will dazzle with its effulgent glow all the patriotic ardor of past ages. I have too much faith in the American people, too much faith in American patriotism, too much faith in the patriotism of the members of this House, the representatives of the American people and of American patriotism, to think that they will permit our Centennial year to pass without taking such steps in favor of the completion of this National Monument to Washington as will change it from a monument of our disgrace, as it now stands in its unfinished condition, to a monument representing that patriotism and public spirit which shall ever preserve our free institutions and perpetuate to the remotest ages the benefits of our free Government.

The patriotism of the nation is not dead. The year 1876 will yet witness such an outburst of this sentiment among the American people as the world has never before seen. The same spirit that animated the heroes of a hundred years ago on the battle-fields of Monmouth and Princeton and Yorktown is as strong in the breasts of our people to-day as it was a century ago. But this is essentially a time of peace, and the world witnesses a sight in the celebration of our centennial anniversary in this coming together and fraternal mingling of all nations to join with us in our jubilee such as the most sanguine of us never dared to dream of. And now that France and England and Japan join with us, now that the nations of the earth come together and foes are lost and forgotten in the kindly feeling which brings all to our land to unite with us in our rejoicing, shall we forget to arouse anew the love and veneration for our country and for the noble men who established us a nation? Dare we forget that we this year enter upon the beginning of a new century, and that our institutions are safe only when the spirit of love for our country is instilled into the heart of every American youth? Dare we forget that the youth of to-day will take our places in the generation to come, and that they will be the conservators of the future interest and future welfare of our common country? Let it ever be our pleasant duty to hold before them those brilliant examples which in our own boyhood and youth filled our hearts with a patriotic fervor as we read the records of our early governmental history.

In the design for the National Monument in this city it was provided that contributions of blocks of marble should be received from the respective States and from such societies and institutions as were favorably inclined to the project, each block to bear a suitable inscription or device. These were to be placed in niches designed for their reception in the monument. The congressional committee of 1855 reported that each State and two of the Territories had already contributed their quota, and the same was true of a number of institutions and societies who had with patriotic expressions made similar offers. Even China and Japan and the islands of Loo Choo, whom we have been accustomed to regard as the far-distant heathen, have put us to shame in doing that to commemorate the patriotism and virtues of our hero which we have failed to do for ourselves. Shall this longer be? Shall this unfinished shaft which has weathered the storms of the last quarter of a century stand forever to remind us of our want of zeal and love for our country? Better by odds raze it to the ground and leave not a single stone to mark the scene of our shame than permit it to remain in its present condition as a perpetual stigma of reproach on American civilization and patriotism. But I have faith that the United States will not permit herself to be outdone in paying homage to her own distinguished citizens. I have faith that there is enough patriotism left in these times to forget self and the present in doing a simple act of duty in making the necessary appropriation on the part of the Government for the completion of the Monument. Too many evidences have presented themselves on this floor within the past few months that, notwithstanding the fact that many men here within the last fifteen years have stood face to face as foes in hotly-contested civil war, we are to-day more closely united and more firmly bound together as a nation than at any time since the adoption of the Constitution that made us one people, and I feel assured that honorable gentlemen from all sections of the Union will strike hands with me on this sentiment. If there is one time above all others in our country's history when we should blot out all the unpleasant records of the past and with mutual reconciliation strive to unite and vie with one another in our efforts to breathe anew our vows of eternal fidelity to the cause of our country, it is as we enter the portals of a new century in our nation's existence.

Let it not be said of us when every other nation on the face of the earth comes to our shores with greetings and good-will offerings, as she joins with us in celebrating our Centennial birthday, that we ourselves are forgetful of our highest and most sacred duties in re-awakening among our people those sentiments of patriotism that have guided us for the past hundred years. Let it not be said that, while foreign potentates think so highly of our nation and its founders that they come to join in the general jubilee and at the same time study our institutions, we think so little of ourselves and those to whom we owe so much that we cannot even so much as erect a fitting memorial in commemoration of their virtues and as a testimony of the gratitude we owe. God grant the day may never come when we shall sink so low in our own esteem that we shall fail to perform our duties as patriotic citizens of the greatest republic in the world.

Mr. Speaker, the time has now come for action. The stale platitude which has so often been urged that no monument is so fitting to Washington as one in the hearts of his countrymen has been worn out in the service. But even granting that no monument is so fitting as this, need that in any way prevent our giving some outward expression to the gratitude of our hearts? It is not the thought, not even the speech, but the action which endears us one to another. And it is this outward expression of our reverence for the memory of Washington which alone can place us in the proper attitude before the nations of the world. It was noble action, as the outgrowth of a noble character, that made Washington himself the powerful force which carried the Revolution, with a limited army and yet more limited financial resources, to a successful issue; and it is action, it is this outward expression of our sentiments, which alone will convey to the world the esteem in which the name of Washington is held by his countrymen.

But should this bill fail or any other bill for the same object, should we refuse to make any appropriation to this worthy object, what then? Is not the Monument as it now stands a significant emblem of a waning spirit of patriotism? Does it not seem to show to the world that we are forgetful of the great deeds of the founders of our Govment, and of the great blessings which they have transmitted to us? How can we regard this work as it stands in its unfinished state but as the representative of an extremely limited stock of patriotism which the American people seem to possess? I am not prepared to answer these questions, for my faith in American institutions and in the patriotism of the people is unlimited. But, much as it pains me to express it, I am almost forced by the circumstances to believe that we have been neglectful of a plain duty in the past for which only prompt and decisive action in the present can in any degree make compensation. Now, therefore, whatever may be said of the neglect of our predecessors in the premises—and I disclaim any intent of finding fault with them and their want of action—let it not be said of this the Centennial Congress that we too have failed to perform this simple act of duty as the representatives of a people who, I cannot but feel persuaded, are and ever will be mindful of the debts of gratitude which they cannot in any other manner pay to the memory of their patriotic ancestors. I trust and believe that there is not a member on the floor of this House who does not represent a constituency in full accord with me in this sentiment, and who will not fully vindicate him in his vote in favor of this bill or any other bill to aid in the completion of the Monument. I believe that when it is understood by this great American people that the appropriation of $300,000 would cost them less than two-thirds of a cent each, were it a direct tax, that there is not one among the forty-five millions of inhabitants that would not urge the measure upon the attention of the Representatives here assembled. But I am unwilling, as I have said, to place this on a dollar-and-cent basis.

We have, as I think, wisely and patriotically appropriated one and a half million dollars to the Exposition at Philadelphia, and setting aside the doubts as to the constitutionality of the measure which arose in the minds of many of our best men and some of our most patriotic and ablest Pennsylvanians, I cannot believe there is a member of this House who had these doubts not forced themselves upon him, or who, had he not felt that it was an appropriation of the public funds to the support of a private enterprise, but would have given the measure his most cordial support. This is a measure which pledges a portion of that appropriation when returned to the United States Treasury to the purpose of completing a monument in which the whole nation is interested. It is not a stock nor in any sense a private enterprise, but one in which private individuals have stepped in to do what the Government long before had promised to do, and should have done, and it is only when private funds are exhausted, and private benefactions for the public good have failed, that the public is asked to come forward and do something to support its own dignity and pride. In no sense is it an appropriation of public funds to private uses.

By the charter of the monument society the President of the United States is ex officio the president of the society, and the governors of the separate States, respectively, its vice-presidents; thus the interests of the people are doubly guarded, and by the provisions of this bill no money can be paid out of this appropriation except as the work progresses, and then only upon estimates made by the engineer in charge of the work, approved by the President of the United States. It is an enterprise in which the whole country holds an interest. As the glory of the great man to whom this tribute of affection and gratitude is to be paid belongs to no one State or section, but is the glory of the nation, so is this mark of esteem designed to be national in the fullest sense, and for this reason, if for no other, is it incumbent on the Representatives here assembled that they comply with the wishes of the nation in aiding this great work.

In these latter days, when politicians and political parties have descried unseen and, I cannot but think, purely imaginary dangers to the public-school systems of the land, they have overlooked the more important fact that the demands of the times are not a more cordial support of our school systems, but rather that more attention should be given to the moral culture of youth in all institutions of learning. It is the glory and boast of the Chinese system of schools, which in some points are superior to our own, that morality is the first thing necessary to be taught. Reverence for parents and superiors is instilled into the heart of the Chinese child at his mother's knee; but when that child is placed in the care of the public teacher, to this reverence for parents and superiors is added as the first essential a strict course of moral culture, which places the Chinese citizen as found in his native country on a level to which by no means every one in this enlightened Republic can aspire. If there is one thing demanded therefore above others in our school systems it is a higher degree of moral culture; it is that the lives of our illustrious men shall be held up before the youth of our country for emulation. And this was never more true than it is to-day, when corruption creeps into high places and men holding offices of high public trust are found unfaithful; never more important than it is to-day, when the sacred obligations of the official oath are forgotten and the indiscretions and criminal acts of public officials cause the nation to hang its head in shame at the deeds of those whom it has made its trusted public servants. On this account, also, would I therefore have this Monument hastened to an early completion, that the youth of our land might not fail to study the character of the great and good men who laid the foundations of this Government, and that, studying these characters and the principles of morality of which they are the outgrowth and upon which they are based as the superstructure upon its foundation, their own character may be so established and their own lives be so shaped that the future shall know them as fully coming up to the high Jeffersonian standard of honesty, integrity, and faithfulness. I can conceive of no higher compliment than the judgment of the nation that its servants have been conscientiously faithful to their trust; and I would permit no occasion to pass unheeded of making public recognition of the wise deeds of great and good men; nor, on the other hand, can I picture to my mind a deeper degradation than is his who falls because of his unfaithfulness in the discharge of those public duties which are the attendants of the public position to which he was exalted. Let us therefore not fail in our duty to place before our youth, as a permanent memorial wherever it is possible, monuments to the virtues of the great and good of our land. Generations to follow will reverence the memory of those who have not only been men of virtue in themselves, but who have also not failed to pay tribute to the virtues of the great and good of the past.

I claim, too, that it is the duty of every American citizen to inculcate in the hearts of his countrymen, and especially in the hearts of his own children, a love for our country, her institutions, and her men. Let patriotism be instilled into the hearts of our children; let them learn to reverence and look up to the Government which protects them; let them feel that upon them will devolve duties in the future in protecting our institutions, and the country is safe against encroachments from without and dissensions from within. Already have foreign nations learned to regard us as a model Republic, and, though trite, it is none the less true that the oppressed and downtrodden of the world have learned to look to America as an asylum and a refuge. The last two decades have witnessed the grand spectacle of powerful foreign nations sending their highest and most intelligent officials to our shores to study our principles of government and witness their application. Even China and Japan, our antipodes, have sent to us from the ends of the earth the youth of their highest families to be instructed in our institutions of learning. But not alone have our institutions and principles of government been studied by foreign powers; they have also been copied, and republics have sprung up and flourished wherever these principles have been tried. Switzerland, in her Alpine fastnesses, defying the great powers of Europe; little Greece, the birthplace of countless heroes and scholars; powerful France, that gave us Lafayette in the Revolution; and far-off Japan, little but powerful and apt to learn, have all looked to us and in a measure copied our example. Nor have we yet reached the pinnacle of our glory and greatness. The great Jefferson, apprehensive that the fascinations of Europe might prove too great a temptation to the new Republic, hoped that an "ocean of fire" might roll between the Old World and the New. There may have been cause for this anxiety, but, if so, it exists no longer. It is the New World that now wields the influence upon the Old. Is it too much to hope that year by year this influence shall grow stronger?

But while our example as a government is bearing rich fruits beyond the seas, let us not forget the debts we owe to those of the past whose blood cemented the links that bind us together as a nation. Let us never forget that had not brave hearts and strong hands guided the helm of state in the infancy of the Republic, we must have drifted into utter and hopeless anarchy. We are too prone in the days or our affluence and power to forget that it is not to ourselves we owe our greatness, but rather to those who a hundred years ago laid broad and deep and strong the foundations for this grand and powerful superstructure reared for the American people.

Having therefore full faith in our Government, having full faith in our institutions, having full faith in the patriotism of the nation, I appeal to you and to your patriotism, as the representatives of the people and the people's faith, that you lend your aid in securing the completion of the Washington Monument. It is a grand, a noble work, and it is for this Congress to win for itself laurels with which our predecessors failed to deck their brows. I appeal to you as men loving the Government, of which you are a fundamental part, that you let not the new century be ushered in upon us without showing to our people and showing to the world that we all reverence the name of Washington and that we delight to do honor and reverence to his memory. We have been highly prospered as a nation. We have shown to the world that our Government is based on principles as enduring as adamant. Let us show to the world that we are proud of the heroes who established that Government and that, though we have grown rich and great and powerful, we are not unmindful of the debt we owe their memory. Let this monument be completed, that that debt may at least be partially canceled and that we may show to the world that we have not forgotten the virtues of the illustrious Father of his Country.

Legal Tender of Silver Coin.

SPEECH OF HON. JOHN P. JONES,

OF NEVADA,

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

April 24 and 25, 1876.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, having under consideration the bill (S. No. 263) to amend the laws relating to legal tender of silver coin; the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. BOGY to the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance—

Mr. JONES said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: The act of February 12, 1873, now incorporated in title 37 of the Revised Statutes, an act which, under the guise of regulating the mints of the United States, practically abolished one of the precious metals, was a grave wrong; a wrong committed no doubt unwittingly, yet no less certainly, in the interest of a few plutocrats in England and in Germany and as certainly in the interest of the entire pagan and barbarian world; a wrong upon the people of the United States and of the whole civilized globe; a wrong upon industry, upon the natural tendency of wealth toward equalization, upon the liberties of peoples which are born out of the effects of such equalization of wealth, upon every aspiration of man which depends for its realization upon the development of those liberties.

The act alluded to practically abolished one of the precious metals as money, the one chiefly produced in this country, the one chiefly consumed in the semi-civilized countries of Asia, and the one which at the date of its abolition and under the time-honored laws that previously prevailed was becoming, as it has since become, the more available metal of the two in which to transact exchanges and liquidate debt.

Under the act of April 2, 1792, both silver and gold coins—dollars or their multiples—were made a legal tender in this country for the payment of debts to any amount, at the rate of 15 in weight of silver to 1 of gold. This co-ordination of silver and gold is called the double standard. A similar arrangement existed in the other countries of the civilized world; the relation fixed by law in those countries being either 15½ or 16 for 1. A few countries had a single silver standard, but no country, until 1816, had a single gold standard. In this country, up to 1853, the Government defrayed the expense of manufacturing coins, while in Europe, except in England, where the coinage is also free, the owners of the bullion offered for coinage are assessed with a charge for manufacture. Thus, under our old laws, and, as I shall endeavor to show under the requirements of the Constitution, the owner of either gold or silver bullion had the right, if the Government chose to coin any money at all, to have his bullion coined free of charge; and once coined it became a legal tender to any amount for the payment of debts, whether the bullion was of gold or silver.

Although free coinage only dates from that era of other free institutions, the American Revolution, the double standard of money has existed since the remotest past. This arrangement, so far as we know, has existed everywhere and forever, notwithstanding the fact that at certain periods silver, as compared with gold is yielded by the mines in deficit of the world's consumption, while at other periods gold, as compared with silver, is yielded in deficit. At the period in question—that is to say, from 1792 until the effects of the discovery of the Russian, the American, and the Australian gold mines were felt—gold was produced in deficit; and by reason of this fact, silver, at the legal rate of 15 for 1, was the cheaper metal in which debts could be discharged. Accordingly, silver was used for this purpose in this country to the exclusion of gold, the debtor being at liberty to tender either metal he thought proper. By the act of June 28, 1834, this relation was changed to 16.00215 for 1, and by that of January 18, 1837, to 15.98837 for 1, in both cases substantially 16 for 1, at which figure it stood up to February 12, 1873.

When the great Russian mines threw their auriferous products upon the markets, gold became the cheaper metal at the legal relation of, then, substantially 16 for 1; and our silver legal-tender dollar disappeared from circulation. Nevertheless this coin was not abolished, and the privilege of free coinage and the right to tender the silver dollar for debt remained the same as before. The pivotal point of this event was the period of depression which followed the panic of 1837. About the period of 1863-'73 another great change in the relative production of the metals occurred, and gold instead of silver was produced inadequately. This occurrence began to operate about the year 1865, when the world's product of gold had attained its maximum. However, this change did not appear to have been felt until some few years afterward, when its influence upon the relative value of the metals was greatly intensified by the threatened demonetization of silver by the German Empire and its partial actual demonetization by other European states. In 1865 the relation of gold to silver in the London market was 1 to 15.33; in 1872 it was 1 to 15.63. This is considered the pivotal point of the change, because the legal relation of gold and silver in most of the countries of Europe was 15.50. In 1874 the London quotation rose to 16.15, and at the present moment it is about 17.60, a relation which shows that the value of gold to silver is about 10 per cent. above that fixed by our law of 1792, as amended by the acts of 1834 and 1837.

The double standard, or the legal establishment of a fixed relation between silver and gold at the calculated center of their mutual oscillations, is not the unnatural and one-sided measure which some recent writers have supposed it, but the fulcrum of a just balance whose scales are alternately depressed. Both gold and silver are indispensable, and needed for the coins of the world—gold for large payments, silver for large and small ones; and it will be found that in great commercial countries both gold and silver are needed. Outside of the great bulk of mankind who use either one or both of those metals for money, there is a small number on the one side who are too poor even to use silver, and a small number on the other who are too rich even to use gold. The very poor employ copper; the very rich paper notes and checks. In both of these cases the substitutes for gold or silver are not real money, but representatives. Copper coins are never of full weight, and are called tokens; paper instruments are intrinsically worthless, and are merely promises, direct or remote, to pay money of gold or silver. To the mass of mankind gold and silver are both indispensable for the purpose of exchange, and these two metals constitute the money of the world.

Were their quantitative relation unknown or changing always in one direction—for example, was silver always becoming cheaper or gold dearer—a double standard would prove inconvenient. But such is not the fact. The relation of these metals to one another for many centuries has been very constant, the pivotal point being 15½, and the oscillations—until within the past year, and chiefly in consequence of the demonetization of silver in Germany—quite inconsiderable. This constancy of relation is due to the stock of precious metals already in the world, to the proportion of gold to silver needed for the world's convenience, to the vicissitudes of production, to the occurrence of gold and silver in the same ore matrices, and to other physical circumstances which will be adverted to hereafter.

Without perhaps fully knowing the causes of it, but assured from long experience of its continuance, nations have hitherto been satisfied, in their search for an approximatively immutable measure of values, to adopt the double standard, which, constituting a measure, now of gold and then of silver, nevertheless served to measure with constant efficiency any given quantum of labor or its products; just as a peck measure, whether constructed of gold or silver, will measure always just one peck, or as nearly so as the different effects of temperature upon the two metals will permit.

This is what has been understood in all ages by the double standard, and this is what our forefathers understood by it when they fixed it, first at 15 and then at 16 to 1, a wise and far-sighted mean between the market relation of silver and gold for two generations previous to and after the date of the three enactments which they transmitted to us.

In case no such amendments had been made to the bill now before the Senate, as have been offered by the Senator from Missouri, it was my intention to offer a simple amendment to restore the double standard of the United States, and to base its system of money upon the money of the world, upon which it is now not based. To accomplish this object it was suggested that I might, with, perhaps, greater assurance of success, attempt it by the same indirection which practically destroyed the double standard. But this course might indicate a lack of confidence in the strength of the amendments or the sufficiency of those arguments of sound policy and expediency upon which they rest.

The wrong which has been done can never be fully undone by indirection. The undoing must be as open and explicit as the doing was indirect and implied.

To secure this result nothing more is needed than that the history of the precious metals shall be recalled; that history which is so full of happiness and misery, of affluence and of poverty, of ease and of hardship; that history in part of which my life has been passed, and which has therefore impressed itself upon me not only by study but partly also by practical experience.

The flood of light which this history throws upon the subject, while it will establish the necessity and importance of the double standard, will also serve to allay any fears that may be entertained on the one hand as to the observance of specie contracts, or on the other as to the due recognition of paper credit as an economical and essential element of the currencies of modern nations.

As this history, be it ever so briefly recounted, is of some length, and as the conclusions to which I desire to direct attention are somewhat numerous, I deem it best at the outset to summarize what I propose to say on this subject.

First. I propose to set forth the function and nature of money, the various substances which have been used for money, and the characteristics which during fifty centuries of trials have induced the precious metals as a duality to be always resorted to for this purpose throughout the world.

Second. I propose to show that the use of money and the preference of the precious metals for money were both natural and voluntary acts, not due to law or edict, and that, therefore, money is of right, and ought to be, free and untrammeled by any regulations except of a kind specified.

Third. I propose to trace the stock of the precious metals in the world from the earliest period for which we have authentic data, to show its mutations down to the present time, and the political, industrial, and social phenomena which accompanied those mutations. From this review I expect to be able to show that the world's stock of specie, which is now of great magnitude, consists nearly one-half of silver; that any diminution or disuse of such stock, whether resulting from failure of the mines or arbitrary legislation, is fraught with the greatest disasters which can befall society; and that, therefore, the two measures to which our country is committed by existing laws, viz: resumption in specie, combined with demonetization of silver, are likely, if attempted to be enforced, to end in distress and defeat.

Fourth. Therefore one of these measures will have to be abandoned, and that one is the demonetization of silver. In other words, we shall have to restore the double standard of gold and silver which existed from 1792 to 1873.

Fifth. I next review the relative value of gold and silver from the earliest times to the present, and show how constant that relation has been, particularly since the discovery of America and the opening of the East India and China trades, since which time and up to 1873 it scarcely varied from its pivotal point of 15½ to 1. The sources of this long-continued constancy of relation are then examined, and in their nature is found strong assurance that the relation will continue to be constant in the future.

Sixth. The principal and almost only cause of aberration in this relation is found to be the various edicts or enactments which in various countries and at various times have interfered with the freedom of money. Prominent among these were the demonetization of silver in England in 1816, the monetary treaty of the five powers in 1865, the demonetization act of the United States in 1873, and the pending measures of the German government. These various measures are adverted to and condemned as mischievous interferences with trade.

Seventh. The impracticability of abolishing the double standard is greatly strengthened by reference to the annual supplies of gold and silver separately since the beginning of the present century. From this reference it appears that the supplies of gold to the world have fluctuated between $5,000,000 and $182,000,000 per annum; that the supply has been diminishing since 1852, and that it is at the present time insufficient to meet the demands of the world for that metal for use in the arts and to keep good the wear and loss of coin. On the other hand, the annual supplies of silver have always been steady, and are now but little above the average. Moreover, gold is shown to be essentially a British product, while silver is essentially American.

Eighth. I then propose to show the impossibility of resuming specie payments in gold, the disadvantages and danger of attempting to demonetize silver, the impracticability of demonetizing it permanently, and to discuss the various objections that have been urged against remonetization.

Ninth. I shall also endeavor to show that the effect of remonetizing silver, or rehabilitating the double standard, will be to equalize more nearly the values of the metals, so as to restore or tend to restore the relation that has hitherto, up to within a late date, existed between them for three centuries, and to afford a great impetus to the industrial and commercial prosperity of this country.

Tenth. I shall next endeavor to show that both gold and silver together at a relation fixed by law is the constitutional money of this country, and that all acts of legislation intended to subvert this institution are illegal and void.

Eleventh, and finally. I will quote the authority of the most eminent legislators and publicists in favor of the double standard.

THE FUNCTION OF MONEY.

Money has been fitly described as an instrument designed to equitably measure commodities and services with the view to effect their exchange either at present or in the future, and throughout the world. This is its specific function, and it has no other. The money of the world at the present time, the substance in which prices are quoted, contracts made, and debts lawfully paid consists of gold and silver coins. In most countries silver coins alone; in many countries both gold and silver coins at a relation of weight and value fixed by law as nearly as possible to the market or commercial relation; in a few countries gold coins alone. In some countries some form of paper notes, either representing or promising to pay one or both of the precious metals are employed at intervals as convenient substitutes or temporary expedients for money. In some countries silver tokens or partly representative coins; and in all countries tokens of copper, bronze, or other inferior metals are employed for small payments. The preference for silver and gold for money is the result of thirty centuries of every conceivable sort of experiment to obviate the use of the precious metals, and for this reason it is deemed hardly necessary in this place to advert more particularly to the numerous and well-marked characteristics which have procured for the precious metals this high preferment. Briefly, these are:

1. Eligibility of voluntary interchange into and with other forms of capital. This is the first and most necessary characteristic of money, the one without which it must prove useless. If its interchangeability instead of being voluntary is merely sustained by law, the money cannot equitably measure future exchanges, for human law is mutable and subject to vicissitude, alteration, and overthrow. If its interchangeability is costly, as it would be if the money were made of iron or cotton, the money would be of inferior eligibility to money made of the precious metals, which are easily and cheaply convertible from coins into plate and other forms of capital, and from these forms into coins.

This quality of voluntary and economical interchangeability furnishes constant security to the holder of gold and silver money, a security which no act of legal tender can enhance. Money possessing this and the other characteristics hereafter named needs no law to make it current throughout the world. It is these characteristics which alone can give it currency; not the force of law, which is only the force of one nation at one time and as modified by the defects of administration and the friction of evasion. Since the arts of smelting and refining iron and the other more common and now more useful metals, and of making china and glass, were discovered and perfected, the forms of capital into which the precious metals can be economically converted are perhaps less numerous or important than formerly, many of the materials or instruments of reproduction or ornamentation which are now made of iron, glass, &c., having been formerly made of the precious metals; for example, saddlery-hardware, buttons, buckles, thimbles, bells, lamps, goblets, plates, ewers, basins, &c. Nevertheless the use of the precious metals for these and other and newer purposes, whence they are readily converted into coin, is still very important, as e. g. watchmaking, plate and plated ware, jewelry, regalia, pens, dentistry, &c. They are also largely employed in photography, sign-painting, bookbinding, printing, medals, &c.

The security thus afforded to the owner of gold and silver money is not merely confined to an assurance that he may obtain for it at the present time and anywhere a full equivalent for the commodities or services it costs; it extends that assurance, or the nearest possible approximation to it, over all time. The cheap convertibility of such money into other and numerous forms of usefulness is a check against the heaping up of such money; the cheap convertibility of plate, and many of the other forms into which the precious metals are usually cast, is a check against the depletion of such money. The relation between the supply and demand for the precious metals is by no means a constant one as to either or both metals; this relation varies, but the variation is less, and is spread over longer periods of time thanis the case with any other commodity. Did the precious metals possess no other advantage over other commodities which might be suggested as useful for money, this one of minimum variability alone would be sufficient to render them pre-eminently fitted for that purpose.

2. Adequateness and steadiness of supply to the world. These characteristics are shared with the precious metals by many other commodities or instruments capable, or supposed to be capable, of measuring present and future values. On the other hand, there are others which do not share it, as the principal articles of food, clothing, and shelter, whose inadequacy and unsteadiness are proved by the limits which their supply puts upon population; it having been demonstrated that population would double in at least every twenty-five years, did the supply of the means of subsistence permit. Even the precious metals themselves have sometimes failed of adequate or steady supply, and never, without occasioning the direst calamities; but the danger is less with them than with any other commodities known to man, both because of their profuse and diffused distribution in the earth and of their lasting qualities when produced.

3. Diffusion of supply and consumption throughout the world and ease of recovery. The precious metals are found in all countries and used in all countries for purposes other than money. The diffusion of their supply and consumption is greater than that of any other commodities. In some countries there is no iron, in others no cotton, in others no wool, in others no grain can be grown or cattle raised, and even in many countries where iron is found there is no fuel for smelting it. The competition in smelting causes it to be essentially a monopoly in countries possessing the cheapest fuel. Similar considerations affect all commodities, but gold and silver the least. These metals are often found in a pure state, and were obtained in the early ages of mankind with the aid of a flint-chisel and sometimes even with the fangs of a boar. (Jacob, 17.) It is within the power of the humblest and most solitary adventurer to extract, refine, and coin these metals, processes which can be pursued with the other metals only by the help of co-operation and capital. The supply of the money of the world must be a monopoly to no country and to no class of men; otherwise the fortunes of all the rest might stand in imminent jeopardy from those who monopolized it.

4. Exemption from decay. The precious metals will neither corrode, oxydize, nor evaporate. They resist not only the atmosphere but the strongest acids. There is still extant a legible specimen of gold coins issued in Ionia about nine centuries before Christ. (App. Cyc., 12, p. 443.) There was a legible stamped gold coin in the Earl of Pembroke's collection which was issued by Darius of Persia, about four hundred and eighty years before Christ. (Jacob, 17.) The gold coins of Alexander the Great, about 330 B. C., which have never been excelled in purity of metal or boldness and beauty of design, are still so abundant that collectors regard them as less rare than any American gold piece of the last century. (App. Cyc., 12, p. 444.) There are legible silver coins still circulating in England which were issued by the governments of ancient Rome. (MacLeod.)

In times of war and civil commotion, when the solemn earth becomes the womb of man's rehabilitation, as it had once been that of his existence, and is always that of his support, the quality of exemption from decay of the precious metals is not the least valuable one, nor are these the only times when such a characteristic proves valuable. Accidents from fire, water, and many other causes are continually happening to destroy man's possessions; but the precious metals survive them all.

5. The two precious metals are naturally complementary to each other. Hitherto the precious metals have been mentioned together, and the advantages ascribed to them attributed to both. This is quite correct if both be taken together, but not entirely so if either metal is taken singly. Some countries which produce gold do not produce silver; as Great Britain and its colonies. Others produce more silver than gold, as the United States, Mexico, and the South American states. In others, again, the gold and silver occur in the same matrix, as in the Comstock lode. Some countries consume little or no gold; others little or no silver. Hence the distribution of supply and demand varies; so does its steadiness. During certain periods of time the world's current supply, as compared with its current consumption, of silver, outruns that of gold, as it did from the beginning to nearly the middle of this century. During other periods gold outruns silver, as from about the year 1837 to 1870. Thus, taken separately, the precious metals do not exhibit those advantages which they possess together. Moreover, in many countries, the use of both metals for money is rendered necessary by reason of their very different value as compared with bulk or weight. These considerations will be alluded to again; they are only mentioned in this place in order to justify the employment of the dual term precious metals, and to account for their forming together the money of the world.

6. The superior ductility and malleability of the precious metals is one of the most important of their characteristics, for it renders the cost of manufacturing coins so small, as practically to entail no loss upon the owners in case it became desirable to reduce them to bars. This is always the case when legal enactments place a false or mistaken value (as respects commodities or services already sold, or contracted to be sold in future) upon the coins. The comparative cheapness and ease of transforming the coins into bars, in which form the metal is certain to command its true market value, affords a continual check upon legislation and defeats its every attempt to misvalue coins. Metals possessing inferior ductility are lacking in this advantage, the cost of making them into coins and the loss by reducing them to bars proving an obstacle to their quick and ready transmutation. Substances other than metals do not possess this characteristic at all. The cost of manufacturing coins is called brassage, and is about one-half of 1 per cent. In some countries another and wholly indefensible charge, in addition to this, is imposed. It is called seigniorage, and consists of brassage and a profit. This profit is a royal prerogative, and, as its name indicates, is a relic of the feudal ages of medieval Europe.

There are other well-marked characteristics which render the precious metals superior to all other instruments or services susceptible of being employed to measure values. The homogeneity of these substances renders their genuineness and purity easy to test and difficult to counterfeit or impair; enables all bodies of them, however large or small, easy to divide or unite, and without adding to, or diminishing, the labor or service which they represent. They are easier to transport and conceal, less liable to abrasion, and, being inodorous, are less offensive to handle than other substances.

It is difficult to estimate what relation the cost of this instrument bears to that of the commodities and services it measures, because the commerce of the world is carried on largely by means of paper instruments, some of which are indeed based upon the metals and merely represent them, while others are based upon private or corporative credit, and still others on no credit at all but mere force of law. There is another difficulty in making such a calculation; that which arises from the well-known fact that a vast number of the largest transactions consist of stock-jobbing, or mere bets clothed in the garb of business operations. Making a reasonable allowance for these facts, it has been calculated that specie measures ten thousand times its own value every year, and that taking gold and silver together in the actual proportions in which they exist in the currencies of the world, specie will last, as against abrasion, loss by accident, &c., about a thousand years.* Upon this basis the actual cost of this instrument is an infinitessimal charge upon each transaction, probably as little as that caused by the wear and tear of any other measure, as a tape-line, a pint-pot, a bushel-basket, &c.

On the other hand, money made of the precious metals has several defects. It is somewhat costly to produce, it is somewhat expensive to transport. It is always a misfortune to society, as well as to the individual, when specie is lost at sea, or buried in hoards the secret of which does not transpire. It is subject to loss from abrasion, it fluctuates in value, and the two metals fluctuate unevenly.

Some of these defects have been remedied by the invention of expedients. Transportation and loss are measurably obviated by bills of exchange and places and certificates of deposit; abrasion is lessened by the use of alloy in coins; the uneven fluctuation of the two metals is remedied by a double standard, which, by fixing a mean relation covering a long period of time, past and prospective, enables both metals at that relation to be employed all the time.

There remain two other defects: the first cost of the precious metals and their fluctuating value as a duality even after such fluctuation has been lessened by using them together. These defects are extremely small and are of a nature which renders them unavoidable by any safe or practicable means.

Let us begin with the question of cost. Present and future values cannot be equitably or nearly equitably measured by anything that is not capable of being voluntarily and readily interchanged with other forms of capital; in a word, by anything that of itself does not contain or represent an amount of labor or service easy to determine, and of a kind appreciable to and exchangeable with all mankind.

Value, which is not to be confused with either worth, utility, or desirability, is the quantitative relation between two services exchanged. (Bastiat, Harmonies Political Economy, pages 108 and 109.) This relation can only arise in the social state; while worth, utility, and desirability are qualities appreciable to the isolated man as well as to society. Value is not a quality inherent in a service; as worth, utility, and desirability are; it is simply a relation between two services exchanged.

A measure of value must therefore be a service of some sort, and the more universally such service is appreciated the better measure will it afford. An abstraction, as an imaginary money of account or an irredeemable credit, cannot measure the quantitative relation between two services, and hence cannot be a measure of value.

There is an easy method of testing this assertion. Repeal the promise of payment which now causes Treasury notes to usurp the place of specie, and observe what kind of money will continue current and what not. It will then be seen that the precious metals will circulate as before without the least abatement, indeed with a slight enhancement of their purchasing power. This, indeed, is the case in China, a country which tried fiat currency six hundred years ago, but in which, in spite of the fact that there are now neither legal-tender nor coinage laws, gold and silver both circulate at even a higher value than in countries where such laws are in full force and effect.

If the impracticability of employing irredeemable credit for the purpose of money be admitted, and it is still claimed that some form of redeemable credit, as national, or bank, or individual notes, may with advantage be used as money in order to save the cost of the precious metals, the claim is admitted. There is and can be no objection to the use of such credit so long as its use, like that of the Scotch bank-notes, is entirely voluntary. The moment that legislation or any arbitrary act interferes to place it above this level, its use is fraught with danger. The advantage to be gained, which is merely that of saving the cost of the precious metals in a currency of safe and universally acceptable material, is wholly inadequate to the risk run. And on this point it is never to be lost sight of that so long as we continue to be, as we are, one of the principal producers of the precious metals, we lower to a small extent the value and selling price of all the metal we may have to export, by every expedient, the effect of which is to throw it out of employment in our own country.

*According to Jacob, the stock of coin in Europe at the beginning of the present era received little or no adddition until the discovery of America. This was a period of fifteen hundred years, during which the stock dwindled down to little more than 10 per cent of its original dimensions.

In saying this, it is not intended to deny the advantage of employing credit as a convenient and economical medium of exchange; but such credit must rest upon so firm and broad a foundation of the precious metals as not to need the aid of legislation to prop it up. In other words, its use must rest upon the same foundation as the use of the precious metals themselves—common and voluntary consent.

As to the other unavoidable defect of money made of the precious metals, its fluctuating value, it can only be replied that this fluctuation is exceedingly slow. That is all the defense of it there is, and there can be no better one, for all measures of value must fluctuate, though none of them less than the precious metals. There are men who have imagined an absolute and fixed measure of value, as there have been others who imagined a fixed earth or a fixed sun, an absolute or unconditioned quality or quantity, &c. To such men it need only be replied that there is nothing fixed or absolute; nothing, at least, that the senses of man can perceive or his mind imagine. All is in motion, all is conditioned. The universe and all it contains is incessantly in action, and even the adjectives of language which are employed to qualify or characterize the objects brought to our conception are themselves relative and conditioned. A fixed measure of value is an inconceivability; we can but prefer for such a measure the commodities or services which fluctuate in value the least, and these are the precious metals.

This brief exposition of the functions and characteristics of money may be still more briefly summarized as follows:

1. Money is an instrument voluntarily adopted to equitably measure values, present and future.

2. Value is the relation between two commodities or services exchanged.

3. Hence money is the measure of the relation between commodities and services exchanged.

4. This measure is formed most conveniently and equitably of both the precious metals taken together.

5. Legislation cannot make or unmake money. It may temporarily exalt or depress the value of one metal as against the other, but only temporarily; it may disturb, but it cannot permanently alter or destroy. Gold and silver are money in virtue of their own superiority, and they owe none of their rank to law.

The extent to which legislation can be beneficially exercised with regard to money is to quantitatively define the names of coins, to guard against confusion, counterfeiting, &c., by manufacturing them in a public mint, and to save the transportation and abrasion of them by receiving them on deposit and issuing certificates therefor. (Herbert Spencer, in New York Social Science Review, page 137.)

To insure the fourth provision, that both the precious metals shall form the ingredients of money, it is essential that no legal obstacle shall be placed in the way of the voluntary use of either; that one, equally with the other, shall be a legal tender to an unlimited amount, at a quantitative relation fixed from time to time in view of the past and probable future market ratio of these metals. To these must be added copper tokens for petty sums, and upon the whole will naturally arise a paper credit peculiar to each country; a credit whose volume will regulate itself in view of the basis beneath it, in view of its command of the precious metals, in view of the wants of industry and of the conditions of security which exist within the social or political organization to which it belongs.

These are the essential principles of money which seem to be deducible from the united testimony of history, experience, and reflection. When we come to apply these principles to any existing monetary system not in accordance with them, as is the case with that of this country, we are in the position of a physician who, believing himself to be acquainted with the laws of health, may nevertheless be puzzled how to prescribe for a given case of disease. Happily I have no such task before me. My single object is to remove an impediment to recovery, an impediment the nature and importance of which will, I believe, be recognized as promptly by those who may differ with me as to what are the true principles of money as by those who may agree with me in regard to those principles. The removal of this impediment, while it will afford that ease which one school of currency demands, nevertheless affords it entirely within the scope of action which the other school prescribes. It simply proposes the re-establishment of the double standard, unwisely abolished by the act of 1873, a piece of legislation whose evil effects can only be estimated by referring to that history of money from which I have ventured for a few moments to digress.

These views are not merely those of the ablest men who have devoted their attention to the subject; they are gathered from the history of money from the time when this instrument was first known to mankind to the present. They are enforced not only by precept, but by example; they are written in the rise and fall of states and of social systems, in revolutions, in wars, in the annals of freedom and in those of feudalism and slavery. They are imprinted in sweat, and tears, and blood; and to disregard them is to disregard the lessons of thirty centuries of time.

The use of gold and silver for money is not a recent one, neither were these costly metals adopted for the purpose until after every other expedient practicable at the time had been tried. The following table furnishes a list of these expedients and other chronological data in reference to money:

Table showing some of the substances which have at various periods and in various countries been used as money.

Period.	Country.	Substance used as money.	Authority.
B. C.
1900	Palestine	Cattle, and gold and silver by weight.	The Scriptures.
	Arabia	Gold and silver coins	Jacob.
	Phœnicia	Gold, silver, and copper coins	Anonymous.
	Phœnician colony in Spain.	Same, (some still extant)	Carter.
1200	Phrygia	Coins by Queen of Pelops	Julius Pollux.
1184	Greece	Brass coins	Homer.
862	Argos	Gold and silver coins by Phidon.	Dictionary of Dates.
700–500	Rome	Brass by weight	Jacob.
578	Rome	Copper coins	Ibid.
Uncertain.	Carthage	Leather or parchment money, first "paper bills" known.	Socrates, Dial. on Riches, Journal des Economistes, 1874, p. 354.
491	Sicily	Gold coins by Gelo, (some still extant.)	Jacob.
480	Persia	Gold coins by Darius, (two still extant.	Ibid.
478	Sicily	Gold coins by Hiero, (some still extant.)	Ibid.
407	Athens	Debased gold coins, foreign	MacLeod, 476.
400	Sparta	Iron, overvalued	Bœckh.
360	Macedonia	First gold coins coined in Greece by Philip.	Jacob.
266	Rome	First silver coins coined in Rome.	Ibid.
54	Britain	Pieces of iron	Ibid.
50	Rome	Tin and brass coins	Dic. of Dates.
Uncertain.	Arabia	Glass coins	N.Y. Tribune, July 2, 1872.
A. D.	PERIOD FOLLOWING THE FAILURE OF THE ANCIENT MINES.
212	Rome, (Caracalla.)	Lead coins silvered and copper coins gilded.	Anonymous.
1066	Britain	Living money, or human beings made a legal tender for debts at about £2 16*s.* 3*d.*, per capita.	Henry's History of Great Britain, vol. iv, p. 243.
	PERIOD OF REPRESENTATIVES FOR MONEY.
1160	Italy	Paper invented; bills of exchange introduced by the Jews.	Anderson.
1240	Milan, Italy	Paper bills a legal tender	Arthur Young.
1275	China	Paper bills a legal tender	Marco Polo.
	Africa, part of	"Machutes," (ideal money. This view doubted.)	Montesquieu.
1470	Granada, Spain	Paper bills a legal tender	Irving.
1574	Holland	Pasteboard bills, representative.	Dic. of Dates.
Uncertain.	Iceland	Dried fish	Anonymous.
Uncertain.	Newfoundland	Codfish, dried	Anonymous.
Uncertain.	Norway and Greenland.	Seal skins and blubber	Anonymous.
Uncertain.	Hindostan and parts of Africa.	Cowry shells	Jacob, 372.
Uncertain.	North America Indian tribes.	Agate, carnelian, jasper, lead, copper, gold, silver, terra-cotta, mica, pearl, lignite, coal, bone, shells, chalcedony, wampumpeag, &c.	Anonymous.
Uncertain.	Oriental pastoral tribes.	Cattle, grain, &c	Anonymous.
Uncertain.	Abyssinia	Salt	Anonymous.
Uncertain.	China and India	Rice	Anonymous.
Uncertain.	India	Paper bills	Patterson, p. 13.
Uncertain.	China	Pieces of silk cloth	Ibid.
Uncertain.	Africa	Strips of cotton cloth	Ibid.
	Not stated	Wooden tallies or checks	Ibid.
	PERIOD FOLLOWING THE DISCOVERY OF THE AMERICAN MINES.
1631	Massachusetts	Corn a legal tender at market prices.	Macgreggor.
1635	Massachusetts	Musket-balls	Anonymous.
1690	Massachusetts	Paper bills, colonial notes	Macgreggor.
1694	England	Bank-notes	McCulloch.
1700	Sweden	Copper and iron coins	Voltaire's Charles XII.
1702	South Carolina	Colonial notes	Macgreggor.
1712	South Carolina	Bank-notes	Ibid.
1716	France	Interconvertible paper bills a legal tender.	Murray.
1723	Pennsylvania	Paper bills, colonial notes	Macgreggor.
1732	Maryland	Indian corn a legal tender at 2*3d.* per bushel.	Anonymous.
1732	Maryland	Tobacco a legal tender at 1*d.* per pound.	Anonymous.
1776	Scotland	Tenpenny nails for small change.	Adam Smith.
1785	Frankland, State of, (now part of North Carolina.)	Linen at 3*s.* 6*d.* per yard, whisky at 2*s.* 6*d.* per gallon, and peltry as legal tender.	Wheeler's History of North Carolina, 94.

A. D.	PERIOD FOLLOWING THE FAILURE OF THE AMERICAN MINES.
Period.	Country.	Substance used as money.	Authority.
1810-1840	All commercial countries.	Great era of bank-paper bills.
1826	Russia.....	Platinum coins, (discontinued in 1845.)	App. Encyc.
1847	Mexico, parts of...	Cocoa beans; and at Castle of Perote, soap.	Anonymous.
	PERIOD FOLLOWING THE OPENINGS OF CALIFORNIA AND AUSTRALIA.
1849	California.....	Gold dust by weight, also minute gold coins for small change, coined in private mints.
1855	Australia.....	Gold dust by weight.
185-	Communist settlement in Ohio, called "Utopia."	Paper bills, each representing "one hour's labor."	Private information.
	PERIOD FOLLOWING SUSPENSION OF SPECIE PAYMENTS IN THE UNITED STATES.
1862	United States.....	Paper bills a legal tender....	Act of Feb. 25.
1863	North Carolina ...	Tenpenny nails, at 5 cents each, for small change.	Anonymous.
1863	Camp at Florence, South Carolina.	Potatoes for small change ...	Yorkville Enquirer.
1863	United States.....	Postage-stamps for small change, temporary.
1865	Philadelphia, Pa..	Turnips for small change, temporary and local.	Philadelphia Ledger, April.
1865	United States.....	Nickel coins for small change, overvalued.	Act of March 3.

It will be observed that the commodities selected to serve the purpose of money during those early ages when the countries of the world were not connected by commerce were always those of adequate, steady, and diffused supply, and therefore of most common acceptation in each country. Thus, in forestal ages, the skins of wild animals were usually employed; in pastoral ages, cattle;* in early agricultural ages, grain; in early mining ages, base metal; in early manufacturing ages, glass, musket-balls, nails, strips of cotton, &c.

The significance of this deduction will not fail to be appreciated. After commerce had connected many of the countries, substances common to all countries, namely, the precious metals, were found to be necessary for the purpose of money, and later still, balances of trade were settled by means of bills of exchange representing those metals; and it is worthy of remark that gold and silver are the only substances which have ever been universally used for money.

Development from the early agricultural to the mining, manufacturing, and commercial ages indicates not only a development of occupation, but also a development of political organization. The hunter, the shepherd, the early agriculturist, needed neither social organization nor government. He could prosecute his occupations alone; and in these stages of development mankind lived in isolated families or small tribes of freemen. The progress of agriculture and of mining, which must have followed agriculture,† of manufacturing and of commerce, rendered fixed residences and division of labor necessary, and the protection of the one and regulation of the other demanded the offices of government. The hunter and shepherd could defend himself and his possessions or convey them out of the reach of enemies; the agriculturist, miner, manufacturer, and merchant needed the protection of a military force and the security of well-executed laws.

Following the local or feudal powers which sprang into existence to meet these demands came also those abuses which always, sooner or later, accompany the exercise of power.

The warrior classes reduced the working classes to a condition of predial servitude, and those who at first were mere chieftains of choice became arbitrary and despotic lords paramount. Not least among the powers which they abused were those relating to the coinage and denomination of the precious metals.

Up to this period in the history of countries it is to be remarked that, whatever substance came to be employed for money in each country, whether, as at first, the peculiar and most common product of each respective country, or, as afterward, those substances more or less common to all countries and most convenient everywhere, namely, the precious metals; such substance was employed, as it is now in China, without command or force of law. The importance of this fact cannot be overestimated, for its recognition must ever form the basis of all sound legislation upon this subject. The precious metals do indeed, no doubt, derive some small element of their purchasing power from the fact that now all governments provide that, when coined in a certain way, they shall be a legal tender for the payment of debt; but this element of value is very small, and probably does not exceed the seigniorage or charge for coinage. Whatever it may be, it is so small that there can be no risk in asserting that, were all the legal-tender laws of the world repealed to-day and forever neither gold nor silver would lose an appreciable atom of their power to purchase present commodities, secure future contracts, or pay past debts. Indeed, with the example of China before us, an example which in this respect at least is not without utility, it is believed to be more than probable that their purchasing power would increase; for setting aside the effect of such repeal upon the continuance of unrepresentative paper notes, it would dissipate the very considerable fears that now attach themselves to every contract wherein the words dollar, pound, or franc are employed to express a given weight of metal.

It has been stated that with the growth of governmental power came abuses in coinage and the denomination of coins. These abuses, like all others, were of gradual growth. The power and authority of feudal lords and monarchs were first employed in this respect beneficially and government was exercised within its proper scope. Local, separated, and diverse systems of weights and measures and of the weights and measures of gold and silver pieces gave way to national, united, and uniform systems. Isolated and anomalous measures of values, adopted in small localities for greater temporary convenience—as pieces of iron in Africa and Sparta and of glass in some parts of Arabia—were prohibited by legal-tender laws; for, so long as they were suffered to exist, they promoted provincial isolation and defeated national homogeneity and political unity. The same laws also provided in what substances debts were to be paid in cases unadjudicable either by express stipulation or common usage.

In these early ages, while men yet retained the power to resist misgovernment, the names attached to pieces of the precious metals were always those of the weights contained in such pieces, as the Jewish shekel, of nearly one-half of an ounce troy; the Attic drachma, of little more than one-fourth of an ounce troy, &c.

To prevent counterfeiting* and economize time, and thus facilitate exchanges, these pieces of metal were ordered to be coined, and governments monopolized, as governments do still, the function of coining. To the coins thus manufactured were given the names of their weights, and thus far the laws regulating the coinage of the precious metals were honestly conceived and probably as honestly executed.

With the lapse of time, however, coupled with use of coins and the increasing power of authority, abuses crept into the coinage which have lasted to this day. The names of coins, which at first were literal weights, came, for convenience' sake, to be used as symbols; and men no longer bargained for so much gold or silver as would weigh a shekel or a drachma, but for so many shekels or drachmas "current with the merchant." In this state of affairs the temptation on the part of rulers and the classes who environ power to commit abuses became too strong for resistance.

Owing to the frequency of the practice of degrading and debasing the coins in all countries and ages, the quantitative meaning attached to the names of coins has been so often changed, that to interpret these names or the sums of money mentioned in them, in ancient or medieval historical works, into modern weights is almost an unsafe proceeding, even in the hands of professional metrologists.†

In order to deceptively reduce the pay of the army, what more easy method offered itself to a ruler than that of diminishing by decree and recoinage the weight of pure metal in the "drachma." In order, at other times, to exact greater fees or subsidies, what more easy expedient suggested itself to a feudal lord than to increase the weight of the "drachma?"‡ In cases where the ruler was not unscrupulous enough to tamper with the coin for his own profit, there were never wanting powerful classes of men, both ecclesiastical and secular, to urge him to similar practices for their advantage. Though instances occur in history where the standard was restored after the coins had been debased, the general course of affairs was in the opposite direction—a fact due to the inability of the government to redeem the debased coin.‖

I do not propose at this time to enter any further into the history of these events; my object thus far having been merely to show that money, in the early ages, whatever it was made of, came into use voluntarily; was always composed of substances of supposed adequate and steady supply; owed none of its utility to legal-tender laws, which were originally enacted for other and more practicable purposes; and up to the period of the Dark Ages in Europe had consisted for at least three thousand years of gold and silver coins only.

We have now to consider three other points in this connection: the world's supply and consumption of the precious metals, the effects of an inadequate or monopolized supply, and the necessity of adhering to both of the precious metals for the basis of a national currency, whether the same shall consist wholly of the precious metals or partly of convertible paper credits or representative money.

Shekel, a lamb; pecus, (whence pecunia, pecuniary, &c.,) cattle; feoh, (whence fee, Saxon, German, &c.,) cattle.

†Mining doubtless originated in that up-turning of the soil which occurs in the pursuit of agriculture. Indeed, history affords an instance of the kind. "In Pæonia the husbandman, while plowing, found pieces of gold." Strabo, VII, (Chrestom,) page 331, as quoted in Bœckh, page 10.

*False gold coins from Samos were successfully passed in Sparta so early as B. C. 540. (Bœckh, 233.)

† The "dollar" of a few grains weight was formerly the "thaler" of more than an ounce, and anciently the "talent" of many pounds.

‡ See instance of Lord King's exaction of his tenants' rents in gold during the bank suspension. (MacLeod's Dictionary, Polit. Econ., I, 98.)

‖ The gold scriptulum was debased in Rome so early as B. C. 207. (Bœckh, 44.)

HISTORY OF THE SUPPLY AND CONSUMPTION OF THE PRECIOUS METALS IN EUROPE.

The repeated destructions of historical works previous to the invention of paper and the subsequent one of printing, have left us but little exact information on this subject. We only know generally that previous to the Macedonian empire both of the precious metals were comparatively common in farther Asia* and scarce in Europe. This much we gather from the sizes of the pieces that were coined and used for circulating money in the respective regions, the prices of commodities and services, the enumeration of royal and princely treasures, and the employment of the precious metals in the arts. The relation of gold to silver in ancient and farther Asia has not been determined.

At a later period, about B. C. 500, we hear of it in Persia, at 1 to 13. After this period and on this point the annals of the Orient were closed for many centuries. At about the same period the relation of gold to silver in Europe was about 1 to 12.5. From this relation gold rose to 1 to 13½ and even 15, until the time of the expeditions of Alexander the Great. These, through the influence of the vast treasures in gold of which they despoiled the eastern countries, brought gold down again to 1 to 10, at which rate it stood in the time of the comic poet Menander, about B. C. 300. That it was the fluctuations in the supply of gold, and not those of silver, which occasioned the most of these changes in relation, we are assured from the sporadic influxes of gold alluded to, and from Xenophon's encomium on silver, written about B. C. 383; while Bœckh himself, in his work on The Public Economy of the Athenians, from which these details are gleaned, says generally that "the value of gold is more fluctuating than that of silver," and that "the latter, therefore, may be considered the scale for determining the price of gold as well as of other commodities." (Bœckh, 33.)

After the Macedonian conquests the stock of the precious metals in Europe increased very rapidly until at about the beginning of our era, when, according to the estimate of Mr. William Jacob, it amounted throughout the Roman empire to a quantity equal in value to about $1,740,000,000 of the present time. The relative proportions of gold and silver are not calculated. The relation of value between the metals in the Roman empire was, about B. C. 207, 1 to 13.7; and about B. C. 50, or 64 years before the period of Jacob's estimate, 1 to 11.9.

From about the beginning of the Christian era to the present time the history of the precious metals has been traced very closely and with great labor and acumen by three great historians: William Jacob, whose work covers the entire period from the year 14 to the year 1830; Baron Von Humboldt, whose work covers the period from the discovery of America until the early part of the present century; and Michel Chevalier, whose work brings the history up to within twenty years of the present time.

The salient points of this long though extremely interesting history are: First, the separation of the Asian and European histories of money from the downfall of the Roman military power until the eastern trade was re-opened in part by the medieval Italians and Arabians and wholly by the Portuguese navigators; and, second, the failure of the European mines previous to the downfall of Rome and the gradual decline of the stock of precious metals thenceforward until the ninth century; its stationary condition until the discovery of America; its rapid increase thereafter until about the beginning of the present century; its subsequent temporary decline from the year 1809 to 1830; its slow increase thereafter; its rapid increase from the time when the effects of the opening of the Russian, American, and Australian mines were felt until within late years; and its stationary condition at the present time.

Omitting from further mention all that is not necessary for the purposes of this review, let us briefly follow Mr. Jacob's history of the precious metals from the beginning of the Christian era.

From the enormous wealth of individuals, the high prices of commodities and services, the vast revenues of the state, and other circumstances, Mr. Jacob conjectured that in the time of Augustus Cæsar the quantity of money in existence in ancient Rome, which then substantially comprised the whole civilized world, was £358,000,000, or about $1,740,000,000. The correctness of this sum is deemed to be rendered the more probable from the fact that Vespasian, when afterward he succeeded to the imperial dignity, asserted that a sum equivalent to £322,916,600 was necessary to support the commonwealth—meaning, not the government, for neither the annual revenue nor the accumulation of the treasury bore any proximate relation to this vast sum, but the nation at large. It is believed that he mentioned a sum which coincided, as far as is known, with the whole mass of coined money then believed to exist, and upon this supposition, and the inferences to which it leads, historical writers have hitherto been content to rest.

A few instances of the abundance of money at that period may not be out of place. Crassus possessed in lands bis millies, (£1,615,000,) besides many slaves and furniture valued at much more. Seneca possessed cer millies, (£2,420,000;) Pallas an equal sum; Tentullus, quarter millies, (£3,230,000;) Augustus Cæsar obtained from private legacies quarter decies millies, (£32,300,000,) and Tiberius left at his death vigesies cisepties millies, (£21,800,000,) which Caligula lavished away in a single year. Cæsar when he went to Spain was in debt £2,018,000, and Antony squandered of the public money more than £5,600,000 sterling.

These facts were compiled by Jacob chiefly from Adams's Roman Antiquities, while the sterling sums were computed by Arbuthnot. I prefer to retain them as originally computed.

Augustus frequently gave congiaria, ranging from 4*s*. 10*d*. to £2 2*s*. 1*d*. per head, to the whole population, men, women, and children; and at his death, left all the common men £2 8*s*. 5*d*. each. In this prodigious liberality he was even exceeded by several other emperors, but the instances demand too much space. Milo gave each voter a bribe of £32 8*s*. 10*d*. Claudius promised each soldier for his vote £113, and Julian £210 16*s*. Otho promised to the retainers of Galba a reward of £403 12*s*. each, and paid them £80 14*s*. in advance, &c.

In the time of Augustus the gold and silver mines which had kept good Rome's supply of treasure gave out and ceased to be worked. Moreover, there was no more spoil of the precious metals to be obtained in Asia or Northern Europe.

This was due to the exhaustion of those conquered countries, to the unsettled condition of the empire, to wars, the incursions of barbarians, the insufficiency of mechanical resources, the loss of life and hardships of the slaves employed in the mines, which induced them to desert their occupation whenever civil commotion afforded them a convenient opportunity, and to other causes set forth by our author.*

From that time, therefore, the stock of money decreased, and it has been calculated that the decrement proceeded at the following rate:

Year of the Christian era.	Stock of coin in civilized world.
14	£358,000,000
50	322,200,000
86	287,980,000
122	259,182,000
158	233,263,800
194	209,937,420
230	181,943,678
266	163,749,311
302	147,374,380
338	132,636,942
374	119,373,248
410	107,435,924
446	96,692,332
482	87,033,099
518	78,329,700
554	70,406,720
590	63,364,057
626	57,027,653
662	51,324,889
698	46,192,399
734	41,573,160
770	37,415,840
806	33,674,256

A calculation so hypothetical as this must not, of course, be taken too literally. It is sufficient if its general correctness is supported by all the facts we know, and this seems to be the case. The gradually deepening misery of the populations of Europe during the medieval ages, the decay of the civil law, the demoralization of society, the disintegration of government and authority, the institution (probably re-institution) of feudalism, the poverty, filth, pestilences, abominable crimes, ignorance, and wretchedness that characterized this period of history and gave to it its well-deserved name of the Dark Ages—these facts are too well known to need repeating. That such a condition of affairs was promoted solely by means of a gradual and constant diminution of the currency is not contended; though it would not be difficult to argue the result from the predicate. But that the diminution of the currency largely contributed to bring it about and maintain it may be affirmed with entire confidence; and the careful thinker will find it difficult to discern a cause that will more satisfactorily account for that extraordinary breaking up of governments and arrest of social development and of the growth of population which occurred in Europe from about the beginning of the present era to the time of the discovery of America.

From the age of Augustus Cæsar to that of Charlemagne and the Saxon heptarchy is like going from the mouth to the bottom of the

* There is an instance in Strabo's sixteenth book of an eastern country, (possibly India,) bordering on that of the Sabaens, (Arabia?) where gold to silver was only 1 for 2, and to bronze only 1 for 3. With the instance before us of modern Japan, where gold (purity not stated) was quoted in 1853 at 1 to 4 of silver, it may seem bold to challenge this assertion; but other instances in regard to China assure us that oriental quotations are unreliable, from the fact that in the early ages gold and silver ingots, impure and largely burdened with base substances, circulated as money, and the quoted relation referred to the value of these impure ingots and not to the value of the pure metals. Consult a pamphlet by "a disciple of Franklin," in American Philosophical Society library, Philadelphia, No. 6332, page 9, where it is stated that Chinese gold from Sumatra, Celebes, &c., was but 16 to 18 carats fine, and that the relation in China in about the year 1810 was 1 in gold, as thus found, to 12 in (pure) silver. At least we can feel fully assured that the relations mentioned by Strabo were local and only referred to the particular locality indicated. Consult Bœckh, page 43. Another anomalous and still more extraordinary though possibly not unauthentic instance of the kind is related in Jacob's History of the Precious Metals, page 57.

*An ancient law of the Roman senate actually forbade the Italian mines to be worked at all. (Pliny, book iii, chapter 6, quoted in Jacob, 51.)

ancient mines—above, all lightness, happiness, and life; below, all darkness, misery, and death.

These were the ages of alchemists and false coiners. They both sought to obtain gold from base metals; the first by transmutation, the others by arrant roguery. The base pieces they produced were known by the names of pollards, crocards, schuldings, brabants, eagles, leonines, sleepings, &c. Those who were pitched upon as the fabricators of these pieces were visited with fearful punishment. Racking, pressing to death, burning, drowning, and tramping were common enough. Whole families were exported, whole communities robbed and banished, under the pretense of punishing coiners.

Such was the scarcity of the precious metals that living money was used instead. This consisted of men and women, who were thus passed from hand to hand as a legal tender. (Henry's History of Great Britain.) The poverty and degradation of the people were inconceivable. The price of a hawk was the same as that of a man, and robbing the nest of one was as great a crime as depriving of life the other. (Jacob on Precious Metals, p. 170.) Famine and pestilence, superstition and tyranny, terror and outrage, reigned supreme.

These were the Dark Ages; and so profound were the depths into wheih they cast humanity that nearly a thousand years later Arthur Young thus quoted from the cahiers of the "tiers élat" of that feudal system to which the Middle Ages had given birth:

> Fixed and heavy rents; vexatious processes to secure them; appreciated unjustly to augment them; rents solidaires and reveulbables; rents, cheantes, and levantes; fumages. Fines at every change of the property, in the direct as well as collateral line; feudal redemption (retraite) fines on sale to the eighth and even the sixth penny, (part;) redemptions (rachats) injurious in their origin, and still more so in their extension; banalite of the mill, of the oven, and of the cider-press; corvees by custom; corvees by usage of the fief; corvees established by unjust decrees; corvees arbitrary and even fantastical; servitudes; prestations, extravagant and burdensome; collections by assessments incollectible; aveux, minus, impunissement; litigations, ruinous and without end; the rod of seigneural finance, forever shaken over our heads; vexation, ruin, outrage, violence, and distinctive servitude, under which the peasants, almost on a level with Polish slaves, can never but be miserable, vile, and oppressed.

Even the liberty to bruise between two stones a measure of barley was sold to these miserable creatures, while the names of the tortur s to which they were subjected are eloquent in their very jargon and variety.

In order to preserve the game, in the pursuit of which the nobles trampled down the wretched crops and rode over the very bodies of the poor, there were numerous edicts, which prohibited weeding and hoeing, lest the young partridges should be disturbed; steeping seed, lest it should injure the game; manuring with night-soil, lest the flavor of the patridges should be injured by feeding on the corn produced, &c.

Recollect that this was nearly a thousand years later than the period from which we have digressed, when, instead of tending downward, as it did until the middle of the twelfth century, society, under the combined influences of an increasing stock of coin, an increasing diffusion of wealth, and increasing industrial activity, was rapidly progressing toward liberty and affluence. Consider, then, what must have been the condition of affairs in the year 806; a period so unspeakably wretched that we have not even a contemporary account of its wretchedness.

Gold was nowhere to be had, and the few gold pieces in circulation were of an ancient Byzantine coinage, (Jacob, 169;) while silver was so scarce that, together with gold, it was at a subsequent period forbidden by an act of Henry V to be used in the arts. (Ibid., 167.)

These instances could be multiplied almost indefinitely, but it is not necessary. It is sufficient if they attest the poverty, wretchedness, and tyranny that attend a decline in the quantity of money or of the only bases upon which any system of money, representative or partly representative, can stand—the precious metals.

I am aware that the reply to this implication may be that it makes no difference how much the stock of coin is, if its only function is to measure value which is merely a relation. This position I admit to be well taken if the stock of money remains forever stationary, or rather stationary per capita of population. In such case a grain of silver will measure quite as effectually the relation between a day's work and its equivalent in commodities as a pound of silver will, with a stock of coin fifty-seven hundred and sixty times as great, and if money was already not concentrated in a few hands and there were no debts. The only limitation to the perfect equality of these two conditions of affairs would be that in the one case coins might have to be made too small for convenient handling, or in the other too large.

But in point of fact there is not and never can be a continuously stationary amount of money in existence or even a stationary amount per capita. Money; as related to population, has a natural tendency to increase in quantity, because increase of money quickens industry and distributes wealth. Opposed to this tendency are wars, the failure of mines, the abrasion and loss of the precious metals, the insufficiency of mechanical resources, and the influence of wealthy classes. We have seen to what an appalling strait the first three of these causes brought, or assisted to bring, the European world—a strait in which it remained for nine hundred years, until it was freed by the discovery of the mines of Potosi. We shall yet see how the fourth cause operated at about the beginning of this century, and how the fifth cause is operating now.

These opposing tendencies, operating with varying force, alternately diminish and increase the stock of precious metals, and place the subject quite beyond the category of fixed things. There is nothing fixed about it, and legislation must deal with it with all its eyes and ears opened. Left to itself and the industry and self-seeking of mankind, money would increase as all other commodities increase, and society would rapidly undergo that equalization of wealth which the vagaries of fortune would stamp with equity; but reduced to an unwilling wardship by monarchs and legislatures, dragged hither and thither at the nod of plutocrats, legal-tendered, single-standarded, royaltied; taxed, and bedeviled in every imaginable manner, it has been restrained and dwarfed in its increase, and made to become the instrument of half the misrule and misery which the world has undergone.

Though there was no increase in the European world's stock of coin from the beginning of the ninth century until the discovery of America, nevertheless there was no diminution. This arrest in the shrinkage of money is due to the invention, or, more probably, the reinvention of bills of exchange, which served to quicken money and enable a limited stock to perform the work of a large one.

The bill of exchange was unknown to the ancient Greeks and Romans. They were even without the use of paper upon which to inscribe these instruments, obligations of debt even so late as the time of the Roman empire having been inscribed upon tablets of wax; the limited supply of parchment being reserved for the higher purposes of literature. Paper was made in China so early as the second century before Christ, at about which time papyrus was invented in Egypt and parchment in Europe.

It is difficult to conceive of a great commercial nation—and there certainly was such a one at the time mentioned—having the use of paper and ignorant of the device known as bills of exchange. Be this as it may, an instrument known as the hoondee, and corresponding precisely with the modern bill of exchange, was known in India at a very early date; and the Hebrews, always a trading race, who were among the first to trade with India, "by Tadmor in the desert," very likely learned its use from that country.

These historical conjectures are, however, of little practical value in this connection. The material point is that no sooner was paper invented or introduced into Europe, and possibly a little before,* than bills of exchange came into use, and that these events correspond with the time of lowest diminution in the stock of coin in Europe.

It has been suggested by some writers that the invention or introduction into Europe of the bill of exchange is due less to the ingenuity of the Jews or the art of making paper than to that improvement in social organizations and extension of political authority which distinguished the Italian republics of the medieval ages. To this suggestion it need only be repeated that bills of exchange were unknown to the Greek and Roman civilizations, and that long after they came into use their use was confined to the Jews, who, whatever may have been their confidence in medieval society and medieval justice and political security, took great care never to trust to them, and traded chiefly with each other.

Following the introduction of bills of exchange came the establishment of those great fairs which for ages performed the functions of so many clearing houses for the inland commerce of Europe; and next the establishment of banks in Italy, Spain, and Holland. The first fair dates from the year 886; the first bank, from which however no circulating notes were issued, was that of Venice, in 1167. These dates are oases in a desert of wretchedness and gloom.

But by far the most important of the several methods of relief which society so eagerly sought in this long era of money dearth was that adopted in Milan, A. D. 1240, this being the year in which, according to Arthur Young, (Travels, 2, 173,) paper circulating notes were first used in Europe. From the fact that at about the same time, or within a few years afterward, paper notes of the same character were employed in China, (Marco Polo,) there is some ground for the belief that the dearth of money in Europe was felt also in that distant and almost unconnected part of the world. In both these instances the notes used were issued by government and made a legal tender for the payment of debts.

Severe bullionists may scoff at this, at the debasement of coins, and at the many other financial dishonesties and enormities, as they are pleased to call them, of the Dark Ages; but let me tell them, who am also a bullionist in so far that I recognize the superior economy, stability, and justice of a money system consisting of, or at least based representatively, wholly or in part, upon, the precious metals, that society could not have been preserved without these measures. Mankind had paid dearly enough in nine long centuries of tyranny, anarchy, and slavery for the boon of a common medium of exchange. To have paid any more for it would have been to pay with life itself, for that which at the best could only economize its labor and alleviate its burdens.

These fiscal measures not only eked out the scanty and stationary stock of coin which existed at that period; they economized its use, saved it from abrasion and loss, added to the rapidity of its circulation, made it perform double work, and thus bridged over the five hundred years of further dearth of money which was to continue until the discovery of America.

* Some authors (e. g. Putnam's Cyclopedia) date the bill of exchange in Europe as far back as the year 808; others (e. g. Anderson in his Hist. of Com.) date it, with greater probability, in A. D. 1160.

It is hardly worth while to specifically trace the wonderful and beneficial effects of the relief thus obtained or the era of industrial activity, commercial enterprise, and political enfranchisement to which it contributed, and which it is quite safe to say could not have occurred without it. The financial history of the past three hundred years is sufficiently familiar to every one, and all that is necessary in this place is to insert Mr. Jacob's hypothetical table of the increasing stock of the precious metals following the Dark Ages:

Year A. D.	Stock of coin.
1066	£34,600,000
1500	34,000,000
1546	49,400,000
1600	126,600,000

The ancient mode of obtaining the precious metals has been described. It consisted of washing auriferous sands and picking with rude instruments such scanty deposits of pure metal as could be found. With the invention of bronze tools and of smelting-furnaces a great impetus was afforded to mining, and this was increased by the invention of iron tools. It was in this condition that the art stood at the Roman era, the use of mercury in quickening and perfecting the process of recovering the precious metals not having been acquired until after the discovery of America. The sixteenth and seventeenth centuries therefore gave to the European world three great sources of increase to its stock of the precious metals: 1. The stock despoiled of the West India islanders, the Mexicans, and the Peruvians. 2. The new and great mines of Central America and Peru. 3. The use of mercury in the amalgamation of ores.

Notwithstanding all these new and additional sources of supply, so utter had been the exhaustion of the European world's stock of gold and silver, so eager was the demand for these metals, so rapidly were they absorbed in the arts, in the Asiatic trade,* and by abrasion and loss, that the world's supply again came to a stand-still shortly after the beginning of the present century. The following are Mr. Jacob's hypothetical figures, which, for the period toward which we are now approaching, must be regarded as corroborated by the various careful computations of Humboldt and other authors. The reduction to dollars is at the rate of five to the pound sterling:

Year.	Stock of coin in the commercial world.	Authority.
1700	$1,445,000,000	Jacob.
1700	1,318,000,000	Tooke.
1809	1,687,000,000	Gerboux.
1809	1,849,000,000	Tooke.
1827	1,720,000,000	Humboldt.
1829	1,557,000,000	Jacob.
1830	1,600,000,000	Storch.
1839	1,420,000,000	Storch.

The social phenomena of this period are too widespread and too directly traceable to monetary disturbances to admit of much doubt as to their connection with the decline in the world's stock of coin. To say nothing of the French revolution and the wars and great political events to which it gave rise—all of which, if they did not spring from, were certainly precipitated by, the unendurable poverty and suffering of the French peasantry, which culminated in riots for bread and the distribution of wealth—this period is characterized by disorders all over Europe. The Newcastle and Scotch banks in Great Britain suspended in 1793, the Bank of St. Petersburg suspended in 1796, the Bank of England in 1797, and again in 1822.† It was during this period that arose the State and provincial banking systems of this country and Great Britain, through which the actual and threatened dearth of money was alleviated by means of circulating notes representing but a small basis of specie. These desperate and unsafe expedients always evince a scarcity of the precious metals. It was during this period that these systems failed over and over again, not, however, without answering for precious intervals of time the important purpose of their establishment. The State banks of the United States failed in 1816, 1819, and 1827, and signally in 1837; the provincial banks of England in 1826 and 1847. Specie payments were suspended in France in 1790, and an enormous issue of assignats and mandats followed. As for the American suspension of 1837 it was felt all over the commercial world, which it shook to its foundations.

What had happened? Some people say wars; others, over-speculation. Perhaps they are right. Causation is a difficult science. But certainly the well-attested decrease in the stock of the precious metals which occurred at about the beginning of the century may have had, and in my opinion did have, much to do with these events. In fact, as Mr. Patterson has shown in his Economy of Capital, they were in every case preceded by an export and local scarcity of specie.

* Humboldt's statement on this subject would lead to the inference that Asia had taken two-thirds of the entire American supply. Forbonnais supposes that between 1492 and 1724 Asia took one-half of the American supply, and Gerboux's estimate even exceeds this. Mr. Jacob, who reviewed them all, settled down to the opinion that Asia took two-fifths of the American supply between 1700 and 1810. (Jacob, page 307.)

† An abortive attempt to resume specie payments was made in 1817. MacLeod's Dict. Polit. Econ., I, 99.)

Be this as it may, two new sources of relief were hastening to the assistance of society: 1. The adaptation of steam to the processes of mining; 2. The discovery or rather rediscovery of the Ural mines, and the subsequent and more important opening of California and Australia. The new mines were discovered first. The adaptation of steam to their development came much later—indeed, belongs to the past few years.

The following are the statistics of the amount of specie added to the stock of the commercial world from 1848 to 1865:

Year A. D.	Stock of specie in the commercial world	Authority.
1848–'53	$2,500,000,000	McCulloch.
1857–'60	2,800,000,000	Ruggles.
1872	3,600,000,000	Ernest Seyd.

The following are the estimates of various authorities of the stock of gold coin (only) in the commmercial or occidental world since 1848:

Year A. D.	Stock of gold coin in the commercial world.	Authority.
1848	$1,200,000,000	Chevalier.
1848	1,332,000,000	Est. on Newmarch.
1848	1,090,000,000	Est. on Levasseur.
1849	1,306,000,000	Jacob.
1853	1,464,000,000	Est. on Waguelin.
1860	1,998,000,000	Est. on Newmarch.
1860	2,209,000,000	Est. on Newmarch.
1867	2,600,000,000	Ruggles.
1872	2,600,000,000	Ernest Seyd.

With this vast and refreshing increment of specie, which more than filled the void left by the failure of the superficially worked mines of Mexico and South America at the close of the last century, a new era of industrial activity, progress, and development awaited society; an era which, if entered upon without reserve, might have crowded ten years into one, advanced us a century beyond the present time, and conferred upon each individual of to-day the practical benefits of longevity.

But it was not entered upon without reserve. The plutocrats of Europe took alarm at the rapid increase of specie. They could manage to dispose of the surface-washings of gold in California and Australia, but they feared the application of steam machinery to the quartz veins of the Sierra Nevadas, and they put their long heads together and conspired to cheat labor and enterprise of their reward, and mankind of the main element of its circulating media. This was effected by the demonetization of silver.

To succinctly trace the narrative of this ingenious financial device carries us back to the point from which I diverged in order to sketch the history of the supply and consumption of the precious metals in Europe.

The course of the narrative will now be in respect of the relative value of gold and silver.

HISTORY OF THE RELATIVE VALUE OF GOLD AND SILVER.

This history naturally divides itself into four periods: The ancient, medieval, modern, and recent. The first extending from the most remote times to the beginning of the Christian era, or failure of the ancient mines; the second extending from the last-named period when the effects of the discovery of Potosi were first felt; the third from that period to the year 1865, or the date of the arbitrary partial demonetization of silver by five nations; the fourth period to the present time. The accounts which have come down to us of the ancient period are inexact and partial. The relation is either stated in round figures by some careless author or calculated from laws the precise meaning and application of which are not beyond dispute. Each of these accounts relates to a single country, sometimes to a single city, and centuries occur between the date of one account and another. Such as they are they are given herewith:

Table showing the ratio of gold and silver in various countries of the world during the ancient period.

B. C.	Ratio.	Authorities.
1600	13.33	Inscriptions at Karnak, tribute lists of Thutmosis. (Brandis.)
705	13.33	Cuneiform inscriptions on plates found in foundation of Khorsabad.
—	13.33	Ancient Persian coins; gold darics at 8.3 grams=20 silver siglos, at 5.5 grams.
500	13.00	Persia. Darius. Egyptian tribute. Herod. III, 95. (Bœckh, page 12.)
490	12.50	Sicily. Time of Gelon. "At least" 12.50. (Bœckh, page 44.)
470	10.00	Doubtful. Asia Minor. Xerxes's treasure. (Bœckh, page 11.)
440	13.00	Herodotus's account of Indian tributes. 360 gold talents=4,680 silver.
420	10.00	Asia Minor. Pay of Xenophon's troops in silver darics. (Anab.; Bœckh, p. 34.)
407	.....	Spurious and debased gold coins at Athens. (MacLeod, Polit. Econ., p. 476; Bœckh, p. 35.)
400	13.33	Standard in Asia, according to Xenophon.

Table showing the ratio of gold and silver, &c.—Continued.

B. C.	Ratio.	Authorities.
400	12.00	Standard in Greece, according to "Hipparchus;" attributed to Plato.
400	12.00	Various authorities adduced by Bœckh.
400	13.50
400	15.00
404–336	12.00	Values in Greece from the Peloponnesian war to the time of Alexander, according to hints in Greek writers. There were variations under special contracts—unit, the silver drachma.
404–336	13.00
404–336	13.33
340	14.00	Greece. Time of Demosthenes. (Bœckh, p. 44.)
338–326	11.50	Special contracts in Greece.
343–323	12.50	Egypt under the Ptolemies.
300	10.00	Greece. Continued depression of gold, caused by great influx under Alexander.
207	13.70	Rome. (Bœckh, p. 44.) Gold scriptulum arbitrarily fixed at 17.143 for 1.
100	11.91	Rome. General rate of gold pound to silver sesterces to date.
58–49	8.93	Rome. Continued depression of gold, caused by influx of Cæsar's spoil from Gaul. [N. B.—Cæsar's headquarters were at Aquileia, at the head of the Adriatic, where there was also a gold mine, which at this period became very prolific.]
50	11.90	Rome. "About the year U. C. 700," the rate was 11 19-21. (Bœckh p. 44.)
29	12.00	Rome. Normal rate in the last days of the republic.
A. D.
1–37	10.97	Rome. Rate under Augustus and Tiberius.

None but the gravest events—events which affected many nations and were felt through long periods of time—sufficed to disturb this relation. The two most noteworthy of these were the vast spoil of Alexander, which he gathered in the Orient and brought into Europe, and the spoil of Cæsar in Gaul, which he sent to Rome by way of Aquileia. These events temporarily depressed gold from the ratio of 12 to that of 10, in the first instance, and from 12 to 8 in the second; but the depression was both local and temporary. Omitting these temporary aberrations, the general range of the ratio in ancient times, so far as the evidence now available furnishes ground for opinion, seems to have been about from 12 to 13.33.

The accounts relating to the medieval period partake more or less of the characteristics peculiar to the ancient. Lesser intervals of time intervene between the dates, lesser distances between the countries, and lesser differences between the rates in one country compared with another. Nevertheless, the condition of medieval society was too unconnected, and the arbitrary and conflicting laws governing the production, consumption, and legal attributes of the precious metals in various countries are too little understood at the present day, if, indeed, they ever were fully understood, to render these quotations of practical value. They will be found below:

Table showing the ratio of gold and silver in various countries of the world during the medieval period. Range 11.44 to 13.51.

A. D.	Ratio.	Authorities.
37–41	12.17	Rome. Reign of Caligula.
54–68	11.89	Rome. Reign of Nero.
69–79	11.54	Rome. Reign of Vespasian.
81–96	11.30	Rome. Reign of Domitian.
138–161	11.98	Rome. Reign of Antoninus.
		The silver coinage much debased, consequently the ratio of the metals pure was about 1 to 11.
312	14.40	Byzantium. Reign of Constantine. Arbitrary.
438	14.40	Byzantium and Rome. Theodosian code. Arbitrary.
864	12.00	Probable ratio, as shown by the Edictum Pistense, under the Carlovingian dynasty.
1260	10.50	Average ratio in the commercial cities of Italy. Local or doubtful.
1344–1660	——	England. Numerous mint indentures given in MacLeod's Political Economy, page 475. The ratio, except when fixed arbitrarily and in violation of market-price, varied between about 1.12 and 1.14 during the two hundred and fifty-seven years included in this period.
1351	12.30	Ratio in North Germany as shown by the very accurate rules of the Lubeck mint, corroborated in the main by the accounts of the Teutonic Order of Knights, averaged in periods of forty years.
1375	12.40
1403	12.80
1411	12.00
1451	11.70
1463	11.60
1455–1494	10.50	Ratio according to the accounts of the Teutonic knights. As the ratio fixed in England by numerous mint indentures from 1465 to 1509 was about 1.12, this German ratio is considered local or doubtful.
1497	10.70	Spain. Reign of Isabella. Edict of Medina. Local.
1500	10.50	Germany. Adam Riese's Arithmetic. Local or doubtful.
1551	11.17	Germany. Imperial mint regulations. Arbitrary or local.
1559	11.44	German Imperial mint regulations.
1561	11.70	France. Mint regulations.
1575	11.68
1623	11.74	Upper Germany. Mint regulations.
1640	13.51	France. Mint regulations. Transition period.

The extreme range of all of the above quotations which are considered even measuredly reliable is from 11.44 to 13.51, the latter a single instance at the close of the period and after the opening of the American mines. Most of the quotations come within the range of from 11.70 to 12.40, which, considering that the table covers a period of sixteen centuries and numerous countries but little connected by commerce until a late period, serves to show the remarkable constancy of the relation between the metals.

From the time of the conquest of England, A. D. 1066, until the reign of Edward III, there was no gold coined in England,* and probably none in circulation, and this was doubtless substantially the case also in Continental Europe. Taking this inference in connection with the commonness and large size of gold coins in ancient times, we are justified in ascribing the decrement of coin during the medieval ages rather to the falling off in the supplies of gold than to that of silver and the fluctuation of the ratio, such as it was, to the aberrations of the gold supply.

We have thus an additional corroboration of the superior stability of silver to gold; a corroboration still further strengthened by the fact that silver alone was, in fact, if not always legally, the standard in England, (Harris, i, 61; ii, 85; ii, 106–7,) and throughout Europe up to about the beginning of the present century.

For the modern period we have more reliable data. This results from the fact that during this period countries became united by commerce; and quotations in one hold good with slight variation for all the others. As at about the commencement of this period all those events occurred which have had any material influence in altering between the metals the relation which previously existed, to wit, the opening of the East India and China trade, the opening of the American mines, and the use of quicksilver in the amalgamation of ores, it is wholly useless in this or any other practical connection to consult any other data concerning the relation of the metals with the view of determining such relation for the future.

Table showing the ratio of gold and silver in various countries of the world during the modern period, or since the opening of the East India and China trade. Range 14.74 to 15.83.

A. D.	Ratio.	Country.	Authorities.
1665	15.10	France	Mint regulations.
1667	14.15	Upper Germany	Mint regulations. Doubtful.
1669	15.11	Upper Germany	Mint regulations.
1670–1817	.....	England	Numerous mint regulations quoted by MacLeod.
1679	15.00	France	Mint regulations.
1680	15.40	France	Mint regulations.
1687–1700	14.97	Hamburg	Ratios calculated from the bi-weekly quotations of the Hamburg prices-current, giving the value of the gold ducats of Holland in silver thalers down to 1771, and after that in fine silver bars. The nominal par of exchange during this period was 1:14.80, and the quotations show the variations of the market rate in percentage above or below this. At par 6 silver marks-banco were equivalent to 1 ducat; 68 20–47 ducats containing 1 mark (weight) of fine gold, and 27¾ silver marks-banco containing 1 mark (weight) of fine silver. Hence, 6×68 20-47÷27¾=14.80, the par ratio.
1701–1720	15.21
1721–1740	15.08
1741–1790	14.74
1791–1800	15.42
1801–1810	15.61
1811–1820	15.51
1821–1830	15.80
1831–1840	15 67
1841–1850	15.83
1851	15.46	England	London market quotations—annual averages. These give the price of a given weight of standard silver in shillings and pence. The standard gold is eleven-twelfths fine, and an ounce troy is coined into 934.5 pence, or an ounce of fine gold into 1019.45 pence. The standard silver is thirty-seven fortieths fine. Hence, as fine silver is worth 1.081 times as much as standard silver, if 1019.45 pence be divided by 1.081 times the quoted price of an ounce of standard silver the quotent is the ratio desired.
1852	15.57
1853	15 33
1854	15.33
1855	15.36
1856	15.33
1857	15.27
1858	15.36
1859	15.21
1860	15.30
1861	15.47
1862	15.36
1863	15.38
1864	15.40
1865	15.33
1866	15.44
1867	15.57
1868	15.60
1869	15.60
1870	15.60
1871	15.59
1872	15.63

A glance at this table shows that the extreme range of fluctuation for a period of over two hundred years, closing with the year 1872, was 14.74 to 15.83. Most of the quotations are close to 15½ of silver to 1 of gold. The change from the relation which existed during the medieval period is attributable chiefly to the opening of the oriental trade by the way of the Cape of Good Hope, and the settlement of the different relations between gold and silver which existed in the oriental and occidental worlds. This settlement took place during the seventeenth century; since which time the ratio has remained almost stationary and uniform throughout the world.

I have already stated that the East India trade absorbed a large proportion, estimated at two-fifths, of the whole American product of the precious metals; that is to say, about one-fifth during the seventeenth century and one-fifth during the eighteenth. This proportion consisted nearly altogether of silver. The result of these shipments of silver to the Orient was, that of the supplies of American metal absorbed in Europe, a large portion consisted of gold. With the rise in prices which followed the discovery of America the demand for supplies of gold, as against silver, in Europe, was greater than before, owing to the superior availability of gold at that period for large payments; a superiority which the subsequent growth of banks and places of deposit has now destroyed. This slightly increased demand for gold as against silver must be set off against the urgent demand for silver in the Orient.

The average ratio at Hamburg for the twenty years, 1701–1720, is given in the table at 15.21. Sir Isaac Newton, in his report on coins, dated 1717, estimated it at 14.8 to 15 throughout Europe.

*Essay on coins by Martin Folkes, London, about 1750, quoted in Harris on Coins, ii, 2.

At this period the legal relation in England was 15½ and silver was, therefore, undervalued by law. The consequence was that a large portion of the silver coin was exported to countries where it was more justly estimated. To remedy the loss of coinage involved in exportation, the weight of the gold pieces was lessened, and instead of eight hundred and ninety, there were coined out of a pound of standard gold nine hundred and thirty-four and a half sovereigns of twenty shillings, or their equivalent, eight hundred and ninety in guineas of twenty-one shillings; or, what is the same thing, the guinea, or pound of guinea gold, of twenty shillings, was ordered to pass current at twenty-one shillings.

We are told by modern apologists for the adoption of the single gold standard in England in 1816, without any support for such statement, that the single gold standard was practically the standard of England from the time of this change in the coinage by Sir Isaac Newton, (MacLeod.) But this fact, however "practical," had nothing whatever to do with the law on the subject.

It appears that some forty years after Newton's coinage reform gold fell in the markets of Europe until it would only purchase 14.74 of silver, while the law valued it at slightly under, (2 Harris, page 54, appears to make it 14.145, but this is unprecise.) Such being the case, there arose an agitation favorable to the payment in gold of the interest or principal on the public debt, which was then largely held abroad, (2 Harris, 53–106.) The argument in favor of this project was entirely sound. The debt had been incurred in "pounds." The "pound" was a money of account consisting of 20 actual shillings of silver, each 11 ounces 2 dwts. fine out of 12 ounces, and weighing 3 ounces 17 dwts. 10 grains; in other words, one pound troy weight of standard silver was coined into 62 of these shillings. By the same mint indenture a pound troy of standard gold was coined into as many guineas as there were in 890 shillings, and by subsequent indentures, previous to the period of the dispute, into as many sovereigns as there were in 934½ shillings, (MacLeod, appendix, pages 9, 10.) Why not, then, pay the debt in these gold "guineas?"

The only doubt which could arise as to the equity of this proceeding depended upon the fact as to when (under what indentures) the debt had been incurred, though, in fact, this question was of no importance. But it never seemed to have troubled the disputants, who represented that large and influential portion of the debt which was held at home. They stood upon the pound of silver; declared that that was the sole standard of value; that gold coins were mere tokens, and that the honor of the Crown was involved in the payment of the debt in silver "pounds," which, in point of fact, was only a money of account, (1 Harris, i., 61; ibid., ii., pp. 85, 97,) and had had no actual existence in silver since the days of William of Normandy, and none at all in gold.

The superior talent or persistency of these advocates of plutocracy prevailed over reason and equity, as it prevailed afterward, when they took the opposite side of the argument and showed that gold was the standard of England, and not silver, as it has prevailed in this Chamber, as it has prevailed everywhere and at all times. The books and pamphlets issued on the subject at this period were innumerable, and amid the confusion which they occasioned, the unaccustomed jargon of the mint, and the loud voices of the plutocratical orators, the latter carried the day, and silver was assented to be the sole standard of England.

Some seventy years later, while specie payments were suspended in England, and there was no currency in circulation except unrepresentative and irredeemable bank notes, silver was demonetized by law, as MacLeod says it had been in fact since the period of the measures effected by Sir Isaac Newton,* and, except for payments up to forty shillings, gold was declared the sole standard of value.

This celebrated enactment, the first one specifically making gold the single standard of value which was adopted by any country, is attributed to the same sinister influence which unhistorically and illogically maintained in 1750–'57 that silver was or ought to be the sole standard of England, because at that period gold had become slightly the cheaper metal of the two at the relation denoted by the mint indentures which had existed in Isaac Newton's time. But this inference does not appear to be supported either by the market ratio of the metals at that time or by any other facts known to the authors or supporters of the enactment. The chief of these supporters was Lord Liverpool, whose report on coins antedates by several years the great work of Humboldt on New Spain, and by many years that of Jacob on the History of the Precious Metals. The principal fact in this connection which was known at that time, and which could have influenced the adoption of the single gold standard, was that silver had been slowly falling in value since the period of the bank suspension. The average market ratio for the decade ending in 1790 was 14.74; while for the decade ending in 1800 it was 15.42, and for that ending in 1810 it was 15.61. Beyond this the supporters of the act of 1816 knew little or nothing which could have assisted them in forming a judgment with regard to the probable future course of the metals. The act of 1816 was, therefore, a mere blunder, a piece of empiricism based at most upon a recent and, as it afterward proved, a mere trifling and temporary decline of silver. When we come to trace its consequences we shall see what a deplorable blunder it was. And it is just such a blunder that we would now commit in this country if we disregard the present opportunity of restoring the double standard, if we empirically refuse to recognize silver as an essential and component part of the money of the world, simply because for the moment the ratio of silver to gold is depressed.

Having now traced the standard of England down to its latest legal change, which occurred in 1816, it need only be stated briefly in this place that no other country adopted the gold standard, except Portugal, until 1865. The standards of the various principal countries of the occidental world previous to 1865 were either of silver, as in Germany, Holland, Scandinavia, &c., or of gold and silver equally, as in France, Spain, the United States, Belgium, &c. During the interval between 1809 and 1848, when gold was falling off in supply and rising in price, England entered upon that policy of lending in silver and demanding payment in gold, which, but for the widespread bankruptcies which the failure of the gold supplies contributed to occasion in 1837, would have greatly enriched her wealthy classes. They lent capital to all the countries of the world, lent in the cheaper moneys of those countries, (as they lent us later still during our civil war in paper,) and always demanded payment in gold. Like all short-sighted policies, it was a profitable thing so long as it lasted, but its very profitableness forbade it to last.

The creditor may seek support in unjust laws, but nature is on the side of the debtor, and nature redresses the inequalities of laws. As to the effect upon her own people in demonetizing silver during the period when gold was rising in value, it need only be said that England never passed through a more gloomy period than during the half century preceding the opening of California. One has only to read Professor Thorold Rogers's Review of Agriculture and Prices in England from the thirteenth to the nineteenth centuries, and McKay's Working Classes, to be convinced of the fact that during the period, 1816–1848, the English laborer was reduced to a condition but little better than that of his predecessors during the Middle Ages, and infinitely worse than that of his predecessors a century before.

Money became scarce, and, despite the alleviation caused by the invention of banking and paper money, hard times set in. After 1809 the annual supply of the precious metals declined fully one-half, owing to the stoppage of the Mexican mines, consequent upon the war between Spain and her American colonies. The period when the precious metals were most scarce was between 1810 and 1840; and this, as every one knows, was precisely the period when national distress and political agitation were most rife among us. The masses suffered and clamored for reform; the middle classes groaned under the taxation and cried for retrenchment; and in Parliament there arose the policy of peace, to lessen the burdens of a nation which could not afford to go to war. The discovery of the Ural mines of Russia thereafter began to mitigate though not to remove the dearth. But now once more a change has taken place, and the discovery of the rich mines of California, Columbia, and Australia, &c.—Patterson's Economy of Capital, page 45.

There is another point in this connection which is well worth mentioning to those who have shown so much eagerness to lead this country into the unwise footsteps which England has trodden in respect of the standard of money. It may, perhaps, not have occurred to them that, with a system of household suffrage such as exists in England, the slightest rise in values has the effect of extending the franchise of voting. This was shown by Mr. Patterson in his Economy of Capital, page 60, et seq.:

Houses which rented at £8 in 1848 are now rented at £11, which secures the franchise for the occupiers. * * * Taking the case of England in the nineteen years before the new gold supplies came into play, we find that between 1832 and 1851 the registered electors for burghs increased one-half and those for counties more than one-third, while the total population increased less than one-third.

Here, then, is a reason, in addition to their pecuniary interest, which actuates the ruling classes of England in their monetary legislation, a reason that should teach us of America to beware what hidden pits we may fall into by blindly and subserviently following the politico-economical or legislative footsteps, be they backward or forward, of a foreign country.

We need no foreign advice in the great concerns of state. When that greatest of all political events, the American Revolution, which not only gave freedom to this people, but for the first time in the history of the world divorced church and state, denied the "divine right" of kings, the privileges of class, and the claims of feudalism, and thus gave to all men at once the principles of government and a land in which those principles could be carried into practice—when the American Revolution was organized, did our forefathers send to ask the opinion of the ruling classes of Europe? No. They knew that if they did so, the answer that they would get would be unfavorable to the accomplishment of their ends. These ends were the freedom and happiness of all men. These are what they had fought for and determined upon, and they needed no advice as to how they should secure them in that organization of a state which had been committed to their charge.

We now come to the effects of the gold discoveries in California, which effects, preceded as those discoveries had been by the minor ones of Ural and Siberia, were felt soon after the events that gave rise to them. At this period, about the year 1850, England still had the single gold standard, the United States the double standard at 16, France the double standard at 15½, Spain, Holland, and Belgium, (Chevalier, pages 6, 157, 159, and 163,) the double standard, and Germany, Naples, (ibid., page 169,) and other countries the single silver standard. In a word, the silver unit (dollar, thaler, franc, real, or ruble) was a legal tender to an unlimited extent in all these countries except England.

* The authorities on this subject, namely, Harris, 1757, Chevalier, 1857, MacLeod, Patterson, and Seyd, disagree as to the legal position of the standard of England from 1717 to 1816. The truth appears to be that the standard was the double one.

When gold began to pour in from the shores of the Pacific, the first and very proper act of the United States and France was to coin gold pieces and use them instead of silver ones for legal tender. The United States, still holding on to her double standard, stopped coining the silver dollar, and by the act of 1853 coined a gold one, because it was the cheaper one. France also held on to her double standard, (of 15½,) notwithstanding the eloquence of Chevalier, who, like Harris in England, precisely a century before, tried to convince France that the law of 7 Germinal, an XI, (year 1803,) meant a single silver standard instead of a double one. The first care of these two great republics was the interests of their people, and these interests they consulted when they held on to a system which looks to and utilizes the whole supply of the precious metals for the basis of commercial transactions.

Holland and Belgium pursued a different course. These countries, like England, were governed by kings, surrounded by a powerful plutocracy. Like her they were lenders of money, the creditors of other nations, and like her they feared the fall of gold. But unlike England, they had had no single gold standard before; no gold standard while gold was becoming scarce, as during the period 1816–1840; therefore no distress, no agitations, no chartist riots, no reform bills, no clamor for popular representation, no demand for ministerial responsibility. Hence, unlike the British plutocrats, those of Holland and Belgium had no fears to restrain them from adopting a single silver standard when silver became dear. Belgium retired her gold coins in 1854,* and adopted a silver standard. Holland did the same thing in 1858. (McCulloch Dic., Art. "Precious Metals," says 1847 and 1849.)

The success of the ruling classes in Holland and Belgium in demonetizing gold during this period of its downfall was greatly envied by their brethren in England. Between 1850 and 1857 gold fell from 15.83 to 15.27 of silver, the extremest range, as it has since proved, during more than eighty years, to wit, from 1790 to 1872. The creditor classes of England viewed this depression of their favored metal with great alarm, and fancied that it would go on—as with the same short-sightedness they now fancy that the present temporary depression of silver will go on—forever. Forgetting that they had profited while gold rose, they now demanded that they should not lose because gold was falling. They looked with envy upon the plutocratical legislation of Holland and Belgium, and asked why England should not also demonetize gold and adopt silver as her sole standard of value.

Unfortunately for them, their own short-sighted and blundering legislation of 1816 stood in the way, and nature was reaping its revenge. What was to be done? What had England's plutocratical politico-economists to advise at this period?

Mr. Richard Cobden, while disclaiming any right on the part of the government to interfere with contracts already made, saw no reason why it should be excluded from such interference with the future as might be necessary to facilitate voluntary contracts. (Chevalier, page 6.)

Mr. James Maclaren recommended the establishment of life-insurance companies on the basis of a silver standard. (Ibid.)

Mr. Cobden, quoting this suggestion with approbation, proposed to adapt it to all contracts extending over a long period of time, and even thought of evading the consequences of the depreciation of gold by resorting to the primitive practice of paying in kind, as by granting farm leases upon a rent to be regulated by the price of produce!† O, sophistry, sophistry, how desperate are thy convolutions!

In short, England was fairly caught in her own toils, and but for the retention of the double standard in the United States, France, and other countries, which enabled these countries to absorb the new supplies of gold by replacing with them their silver coins, which they exported to Asia, wherewith to pay for goods, the relations of commodities and services in England—and this involved her entire political structure—would have been revolutionized. As it was, her government barely escaped overthrow, and the agency that saved her was that very double standard which the selfishness and folly of 1816 had overthrown in England, but which, fortunately for England, other nations had retained.

The consequences of these various measures, during the fall of gold from 1848 to 1865, were, that England prospered in spite of her foiled plutocracy, France prospered, and the United States prospered, and an era of industrial activity was opened in these three great countries the like of which had never been seen before. This was the distinctive era of labor-saving machines, international expositions, railways, life-insurance, clearing-houses, and great commercial reforms.

* After having cut off her own tail, Belgium, through the agency of her distinguished plutocratical politico-economist, M. Gustave de Molinari, endeavored to induce France to do the same thing. This effort was made through the medium of the pages of the Économiste Belge of 10th February, 1857, in which M. Molinari recommended France to demonetize gold by reducing her gold coins to tokens, and adopt the single silver standard after Belgium.

† In Jevon's latest work Messrs. Scrope & Lewis are quoted as in favor of adopting the average of one hundred articles of produce as the measure of value.

THE RECENT PERIOD.

Table showing the ratio of gold and silver, chiefly in the London market, during the recent period, or since the demonetization of silver effected by the act of February* 12, 1873. Range, 15.9 to 17.82.

Year.	Ratio.	Country.	Authorities.
1873	15.90	England	Annual average, calculated as above.
1874	16.15	England	Annual average, calculated as above.
1875	16.45	England	January
1875	16.41	England	February ... } Average, 16.45.
1875	16.50	England	March
1875	16.47	England	April
1875	16.55	England	May ... } Average, 16.63.
1875	16.88	England	June
1875	16.97	England	July
1875	16.92	England	August ... } Average, 16.88.
1875	16.74	England	September ..
1875	16.74	England	October
1875	16.75	England	November .. } Average, 16.79.
1875	16.89	England	December ..
1876	17.08	England	January
1876	17.46	England	February ... } Average, 17.45.
1876	17.82	England	March
1876	17.69	England	To April 12. Average, 17.69.

* The table from which the quotations for 1875 and 1876 are obtained is "deduced from quotations on the London and New York markets."

We now come to the next important change in the history of money and the standard—the era of the silver-bearing mines of the Comstock lode, of the demonetization of silver in several important countries of continental Europe, and its demonetization in the United States through the agency of the act of 1873.

This era opened in 1862 with the exportation of the entire stock of silver as well as other coin of the United States, consequent upon the adoption of an unrepresentative paper currency by the act of February 25 of that year. In the same year also occurred the discovery of the great silver-bearing mines of Washoe.

The ratio of silver to gold in the markets of the world was thus threatened with depression from two causes acting simultaneously: First, the demonetization of a large stock of coin by an important country; second, the discovery of new and very productive silver mines. It was not forgotten by financiers that, together with our silver, we demonetized a much more valuable stock of gold, nor that Washoe was still in its incipiency. Therefore, it was not until 1863 or 1864 that the bearing of the events of 1862 upon the probable future ratio of silver and gold began to be discussed in Europe. Their bearing, however, was not wholly dismissed from consideration, and as the Washoe mines gave more and more promise of great production, discussion in Europe with regard to the tendency of the ratio became more and more common.

In England the anticipated decline of silver was regarded with great complacency. It was a veritable windfall for her plutocracy; a parachute to retard the previously threatening decline in the purchasing power of gold; a governor to that engine of their own construction, which they had built in 1816 and regretted since 1848.

As the great mines of Washoe became further developed the continental plutocracy also began to prick up its ears. It was at this period organized and formidable, which is more than can be said of it in 1848, when the red flag flaunted in its face from every corner of Europe. France was now an empire; Italy a united kingdom; Greece a newly fledged monarchy. The plutocrats of these countries could have their own way now.

Nature, steam, and the Comstock lode labored for mankind; the silver treasures of the Sierra Nevada began to make themselves felt in the coinages; the gold product fell off, and gold went up to nearly sixteen of silver. It was therefore in the interests of the plutocracies to demonetize silver and adopt gold as the sole standard of value, and they endeavored to convince society that gold alone was the true standard.

The reading world was flooded with pamphlets and magazine articles on the subject, penned by the highest order of talent, which, too often neglected by the people, is forced to ally itself with power; conventions, with cut-and-dried programmes, were called to discuss the matter; advocates were employed and charlatans retained to drown with the clamor of numbers the modest voices of science, equity, and reason. Another motive urged the plutocracies to their course. So long as silver was harbored as a legal tender in Europe, the United States, by being the principal producer of that metal, might become the money center of the world—a matter of no little concern to London, Paris, and Berlin.

An international monetary convention was held in Paris in 1865, and a treaty concluded between France, Belgium, Italy, and Switzerland, in which Greece and Roumania subsequently joined, by virtue of which these countries so limited the mintage of their legal-tender silver coins as to prepare to make gold their sole standard of value, and partially demonetize silver. Taught by previous experience, they did not actually demonetize silver, but left the law in such a condition that by a concerted change in the coinage regulations either gold or silver, if need be, could be made the sole legal tender, and by adopting whatever happened to be for the time the dearer metal, a see-saw between silver and gold could be kept up for the benefit of plutocracy at every change of market relation.

There can be no see-saw unless the legal relation between the metals is permanently fixed and unalterable. When this relation is altered from time to time, as it should be, (once in ten or twenty years would practically be often enough,) to accord with the slow fluctuations of the markets, neither the creditor, who would demand the dearer metal, nor the debtor, who would proffer the cheaper metal, could profit by having his choice. But when the relation is unalterably fixed or difficult to alter, as is the case in France, then the creditor who always demands the metal that abroad commands a premium, or the debtor, who would pay in the one that can be purchased abroad at a discount in the one which is the legal tender, derives an advantage.

This treaty of 1865 was to last until 1880, and with certain modifications is still in force. England did not enter into it. Gold was now to become dearer, and in her present political condition, when popular interests have the power to be heard, her plutocrats feared to open a question which might overthrow the advantages they already possessed. England had a single and peremptory gold standard. Why should she enter into a treaty which would make her a party to only a permissive gold standard, a standard which, practically, when the treaty expired, and before gold fell in price again, might be changed by a concerted coinage regulation?

But although British plutocracy saw nothing to be gained by entering into the monetary treaty of 1865, it saw something to be gained by attending the congress which preceded the treaty and the subsequent convention which was held in 1867 with the view to extend the operation of the treaty. That something was to draw the United States into the treaty, the United States which were, as yet, not bound to a gold standard at all, either permissive or obligatory.

Accordingly England sent her delegates to both conventions. They were instructed to say nothing which would bind England, but to carefully watch and report the proceedings until, I presume, the hands of the United States were fairly into the fire and the chestnuts safely landed for the benefit of the ruling classes of England. These instructions were carried out with great skill. The Frenchmen arranged the programme, the Germans did the arguing and philosophizing, the Englishmen listened, and the American delegate, overcome by the plutocratcial atmosphere that surrounded him, walked straight into the trap that had been set for him. The convention was called for the nominal purpose of unitizing the weights of the coins of various nations. Its real object, which it fully accomplished, was to commit the United States to the adoption of the gold standard while gold was growing dearer, so that the interest and principal of her public, corporate, and mercantile indebtedness, held mainly in Europe, which was then under our laws payable in the silver dollar of 371¼ grains pure, should be made payable in the temporarily more valuable gold dollar of 23.22 grains pure. Of course the United States was not bound by this vote of its delegate in the international monetary convention, but the vote had its influence. It tended to sway the judgment of the Congress of the United States when the question came up; that is to say, tended to sway it so far as it was called into exercise at all.

DEBATE ON THE AMERICAN DEMONETIZATION ACT OF 1873.

But the manner in which this legislation was effected leaves but little reason to infer that any deliberate judgment was exercised on this important subject of the standard, or that the question was ever so presented to the American people as to elicit the indorsement or the approval of any single congressional constituency. The bill by which it was effected originated, as I understand it, in another bill which was introduced into the House of Representatives February 9, 1872. It was discussed for a few moments on April 9, 1872. Then the discussion was cut short, and a substitute, the present law, reported by title on May 27, and passed without a reading, under a suspension of the rules, May 29, 1872. From the House it went to the Senate, where, without any discussion at all upon the all-important section 14, it passed; and, after concurrence by the House, again without a discussion, became a law.

I am aware that it has been stated that the bill was passed after very full discussion on this subject; but I am unable to find a corroboration of this statement in the official report of the proceedings. If any such full discussion appears in the Congressional Globe, I shall be glad to have it pointed out in order that I may correct the impression now on my mind in respect of this matter.

This bill was originally reported to the House of Representatives February 9, 1872, from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures by its chairman, Mr. Hooper, of Massachusetts. It was discussed for the first time April 9, 1872, when Mr. Hooper informed the House that Mr. Ernest Seyd, of London, a distinguished writer on coins, had examined the first draught of the bill and "furnished many valuable suggestions which have been incorporated in the bill." Curiously enough, Mr. Seyd is an uncompromising advocate of the double standard, and it is to be regretted that having received Mr. Seyd's advice the committee only saw fit to follow it wherein it was entirely unessential and to disregard it in its most important feature. Mr. Hooper then assured the House with regard to section 14, where the standard was changed by implication from the double to a single gold one, that the reason for this change was that the silver dollar was worth $1.03, a mere accidental and temporary fact which afforded no sound reason for abandoning the double standard. Subsequent events have proved that the option which we then enjoyed of paying in silver or gold dollars at pleasure was of the highest importance to the American people, and should not have been surrendered. Even if the fact as to the premium on the silver dollar were permanent and assured, the simple remedy would have been to change the legal relation between gold and silver.

Mr. Hooper also stated that the single gold standard had been adopted in Great Britain and most of the European countries, which latter statement was certainly not correct. (Congressional Globe, second session Forty-second Congress, part 3, page 2305.)

Mr. Stoughton, who followed Mr. Hooper, repeated the statement that the silver dollar was worth, he said, 3½ per cent. premium. (Page 2309.)

Mr. KELLEY, who followed Mr. Stoughton, said it was worth 3½ per cent. (Pages 2311 and 2316.)

Mr. Potter, of New York, appeared to be the only member, beside the movers, who suspected the real character of the bill. He said, (page 2310:)

> I confess that the introduction of the bill at such a period (during a suspension of specie payments) excited my suspicion. I was and am at a loss to gather from anything I know or can learn that there is any necessity for the adoption of this measure now.

Among the objections he had to the bill was that—

> It provides for the making of changes in the legal-tender coin of the country, and for substituting as legal tender coin of only one metal, instead as heretofore of two. (Page 2310.)

Finally, he stigmatized the bill as a cover, and that it was "gotten up to be a cover," among other things, for the coinage of nickel pieces in order to enhance the market value of nickel and benefit the monopolizers of nickel mines and processes. (Page 2312.)

And the impartial observer at the present time finds it difficult to account for the introduction of such a bill when specie payments were suspended and unprovided for, unless upon some such ground as Mr. Potter suggested, to wit, either the interest of the owners of nickel mines at home or that of creditors at home or abroad.

But of what avail was argument or objection? The discussion was cut short by a motion to adjourn, and the discussion was never renewed. The next we hear of the bill is that it was pushed through on the 27th May, under a suspension of the rules, without even a reading, and that it went to the Senate. (Page 3883.) There it was reported by title on the 28th May, referred by title to the Finance Committee on the 29th May, and passed at the following session, without, so far as can be ascertained from the Congressional Globe, having ever been fully considered.

CAUSES OF THE RELATION OF 15½.

Turning away from these details to the general history of the relative value of the precious metals, the principal, and by far the most important fact to be observed, is the remarkable steadiness which this relation has shown for over two hundred years.

The question now arises concerning this constancy in the relation in value of gold and silver since the early part of the seventeenth century: to what is it due? We have seen that this relation has been almost constantly and with slight variation 15½. Why has the pivotal point of this relation been just 15½? Why not 13, as in the days of Herodotus? Why not 12, as in the feudal ages? Why did it not fall to 20 when Potosi poured its silver treasures upon the world? In short, why did it center at 15½ and remain there? A satisfactory answer to this question cannot fail to be important, because it will afford a guide which will enable us to compute the probable variation of the relation between silver and gold in the future.

Since the opening of the East Indies and China trade in the early part of the seventeenth century the relation of gold and silver in the Occident and gold and silver in the Orient became equalized. At the same era, also, the Spanish-American silver mines were opened, and the use of quicksilver in amalgamating ores discovered. These three events changed the pre-existing relations in the whole world. The first raised the value of silver; the second and third lowered it; the three together placed it at 15½, kept it there, and equalized it all over the world. The oriental trade continues, the American silver mines are still productive, the process of amalgamation is still employed. Therefore the conditions of production and consumption are essentially the same as they have been for over two hundred years. When we consult those conditions with the view of determining the cause of the relation between gold and silver, we find that the same quantity of capital, superintendence, labor, or of those commodities necessary to support capitalists, superintendents, and laborers, as food, clothing, shelter, &c., and of materials, such as quicksilver, tools, machines, &c., as are, on the average, employed to extract fifteen and a half pounds of silver from the earth will only produce one pound of gold. This is the average of all countries and of over two hundred years of trial. It comes to this at last. This is the boiling down of the whole subject.

It will, of course, be understood that the several rewards of capitalists, superintendents, and laborers, in other words, their share of production, differs in various countries, and has differed at various periods ever since the opening of India and America. So, also, has the effectiveness of laborers. Hence the reward of each of these classes of persons has differed enormously. But, as under the same difficulties of production—and these have not changed as between the metals during the past two centuries, and are not likely to change in the future—the sum total of their contributions to the work has been the same, it follows that, as before stated, it is the total outlay of capital and labor, applied respectively to gold and silver, that has determined the relation of value between them.

When, at any given time or in any given country, the same outlay of capital, labor, materials, &c., that is sufficient to result in the production of one pound of gold, if removed from gold and applied to silver mining, will produce more than fifteen and one-half pounds of silver, the labor, materials, &c., will be removed from the production of gold to that of silver. When, at another time or in another place, the outlay sufficient to result in the production of fifteen and one-half pounds of silver if devoted instead to gold, will produce a fraction more than one pound of gold, it will, as a matter of course, be devoted to gold. The same laborers and the same capital, plant, tools, materials, &c., are not always removed from one industry to the other. One industry ceases in one place; the other may spring up in another place. It amounts to the same thing either way. These changes do not occur on the instant; they come about in time. When mines cease to be profitable at the long-established relation in value of silver and gold—a relation that finds its reflection in the prices of the services and commodities necessary to carry on the works—they are not abandoned at once, but continued in the hope of improvement. If no such improvement occurs they must eventually stop, for men will not and cannot go on forever losing money at mining.

This, then, is the basic reason for the long-time relation in value of silver and gold. The average result of over two hundred years of experiment in all parts of the world assures us that fifteen and a half pounds of silver and one pound of gold are equivalents, and this assurance is as solidly supported in respect of the future as we find it in respect of the past. Now that the most remote parts of the world are connected by commerce, nothing can weaken it, unless it were possible that some very great and peculiar improvement in mining or the recovery of ores could take place in respect of one metal and not of the other. For example, suppose an improved method of extracting or recovering gold was devised which was inapplicable to silver, then gold would be produced more cheaply than now and silver would rise in value, or vice versa, in case the improvement could be applied to silver and not to gold.

But this is impossible: first, because the nature and qualities of the two metals are so nearly alike that any improvement applicable to the extraction or recovery of one must apply also to the other; and, second, because the geological distribution of the two metals is such that, in many of the large deposits of the world, they lie together in the same matrix. They must therefore be taken out together, and the quartz which contains them both, must be crushed, amalgamated, separated, and refined by one and the same process. The quartz matrices of the mines of the Sierra Nevadas generally contain about 1,000 troy grains of gold to every 24,000 grains of silver, or about 40 per cent. in value of gold to 60 per cent. in value of silver, and the proportion in other great silver mines of the world varies from 20 to 50 per cent. in value of gold to that of the two metals combined.

Here, then, we have an unalterable reason why all improvements in the art of mining the precious metals must apply equally to both of them, and also why, indeed, so long as one metal is produced, so must be the other. Coupled with that of the relative cost of producing them, as ascertained from an experience of several centuries, this fact assures us not only that 15½ has been the average relation between the metals in the past, but also that it will remain the average relation throughout the future.

The relation being thus fixed, there are powerful influences to keep it there and prevent it from yielding to any temporary vicissitudes, however prolonged, in the supply of the two several metals, such, for example, as the accidental finding of large alluvial deposits or placers of gold, as in the early history of California and Australia. These influences are: First, the vast stock of the precious metals already in existence in the world; and, second, the steadying action of the double standard in the countries where it prevails.

I will discuss these two questions in the order named. First, of—

THE WORLD'S STOCK OF THE PRECIOUS METALS.

Estimated stock of the precious metals in coin, plate, &c., in the world at or about the various periods 1803, 1848–1853, and 1872.

Period.	Gold.	Silver.	Total.
1803	$1,800,000,000	$3,200,000,000	$5,000,000,000
1848–1853	2,800,000,000	4,000,000,000	6,800,000,000
1872	5,800,000,000	5,600,000,000	11,400,000,000

Estimated stock of the precious metals in coin in the occidental or commercial world at or about the various periods 1803, 1829–1839, 1848–1853, and 1872.

Period.	Gold.	Silver.	Total.
1803	$900,000,000	$900,000,000	$1,800,000,000
1829–1839	800,000,000	1,000,000,000	1,800,000,000
1848–1853	1,200,000,000	1,300,000,000	2,500,000,000
1872	2,600,000,000	1,000,000,000	3,600,000,000

Estimated stock of the precious metals, chiefly silver, in coin in the oriental or transcommercial world at or about the various periods 1803, 1829–'39, 1848–'53, and 1872.

Period.	Stock of coin, chiefly silver.
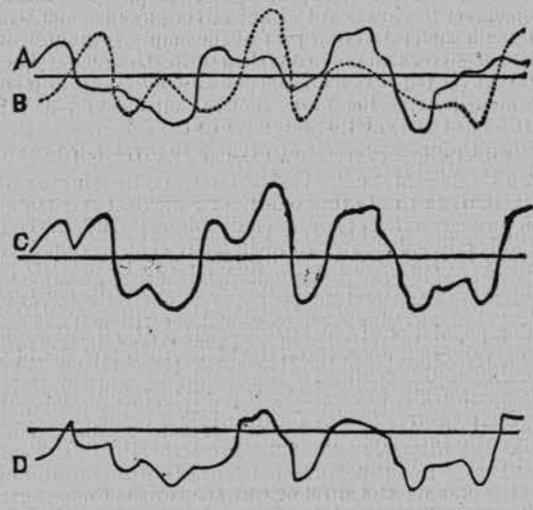
1803	$700,000,000
1829–'39	800,000,000
1848–'53	900,000,000
1872	2,100,000,000

The above data are derived from a comparison of Ernest Seyd, Wolowski, Jacob, Newmarch, Chevalier, and McCulloch.



INFLUENCE OF THE STOCK OF THE PRECIOUS METALS.

The influence of this stock of the precious metals is perhaps the most important feature of this whole subject, and yet, so far as I am aware, it has either wholly escaped notice or been referred to with but slight appreciation of its consequence.

STEADYING ACTION OF THE DOUBLE STANDARD.

The second great influence which tends to keep steady that relation of 15½ to 1 which the commercial brotherhood of the world and the conditions of the productions of the precious metals have primarily occasioned, is the steady action of the double standard. I can best and most briefly exemplify this action by quoting from Professor Jevons:

> The prices of commodities do not follow the extreme fluctuations of value of both metals as many writers have inconsistently declared. Prices only depend upon the course of the metal which happens to have sunk in value below the legal rates of 15½ to 1, (or whatever else it may be.) Now, if in the accompanying figure we represent by the line A the variation of the value of gold as estimated in terms of some third commodity, say copper, and by the line B the corresponding variations of the value of silver, then superposing these curves, the line C would be the curve expressing the extreme fluctuations of both metals. Now, the standard of value always follows the metal which falls in value, hence the curve D really shows the course of variation of the standard of value. This line undergoes more frequent undulations than either of the curves of gold or silver, but the fluctuations do not proceed to so great an extent, a point of much greater importance. (W. Stanley Jevons on "Money and the Mechanism of Exchange," New York. Appleton, 1875, page 138.)

The effect of employing the two metals together is to modify the action of each. Such dual employment prevents one from rising and the other from falling, so that the fluctuations in either "do not proceed to so great an extent" as they otherwise would.

GOLD BY ITSELF NOT A CORRECT MEASURE OF VALUE.

Money is a measure, as the bushel, the rule, and the scale are measures. The bushel measures capacity, the rule extension, the scale gravity, while money measures value. All of these measures are expensive; expensive to produce, expensive to maintain, expensive to preserve. Nor is money by any means the most expensive, it being deemed quite susceptible of demonstration that, compared with the services it performs, it costs even less than the others. Yet, expensive as they are, their use must nevertheless be a source of economy to mankind or they would certainly not be employed. This employment and the economy to which it is due ceases the moment the measures fail of uniformity, definiteness, precision, exactness, and steadiness, for it is in their excellence in these respects that their whole utility resides.

The discordance of moneys, weights, and measures has probably been in all ages one of the first and greatest obstacles which the world's commerce had to overcome, and even the progress of local commerce has had to wait upon uniformity in this respect. Indefinite and unprecise measures are an intolerable evil which men avoid even at the expense of much that is desirable.

What, then, shall be said of measures that are not only discordant and unprecise, but fluctuating also? What would be said of a bushel that alternately contracted and expanded, and contracted more than it expanded; of a rule of elastic rubber, or a pair of scales with a shifting fulcrum? And what shall be said of a fluctuating measure of value?

Yet this is what money is, if gold be regarded to the exclusion of silver.

To be convinced of this it is only necessary to consider the statistics of the precious metals which have just been adduced.

From these tables it will be observed that since nearly the beginning of the present century the stock of coin in the commercial world has exactly doubled; that is to say, it has increased from $1,800,000,000 to $3,600,000,000, an increase that very closely corresponds with population—the population of the occidental world having been 180,000,000 in 1810 and 360,000,000 in 1875. (Essay in New York Independent, March 11, 1875.) Taking both of the precious metals together, the stock of coin has been as nearly as possible $10 per capita of population at each of the four dates mentioned since the beginning of the present century.

At these periods at least, and we have the data for no others, the measure in the commercial world has been apparently unvarying, and this appearance has deceived many writers on the subject; but it is by no means true.

The effective measure of value is not the whole stock of coin, but that portion of it which the law permits to be tendered for the payment of debts. To this should be added the paper substitutes which are from time to time temporarily employed and accepted for the purpose of large payments, and which fluctuate in volume with the vicissitudes of credit and the adoption, transitory operation, and eventual failure of legislative expedients.* The balance of coin or credit no more form a part of the measure of value than do the precious metals when locked up in the form of a plate. Now, how much the legal-tender coin and substitutes of the commercial world amounted to at the various dates given is difficult to estimate. An effort in this direction will, however, be made.

ESTIMATE OF THE EFFECTIVE MEASURE OF VALUE IN 1803.

In 1803, either the single silver or the double standard prevailed in all the occidental countries and, except in England, where gold was erroneously overvalued and silver degraded, it was fixed in those countries at such a relation and the coinage of the pieces so arranged (I do not remember having heard of any silver piece heavier than that of two German thalers) as to permit of the employment of nearly the whole mass of silver and gold coin then in the Occident. There was some legal-tender paper or bank paper afloat, notably in England and Russia, which brought the whole amount up to, say $2,000,000,000, with a ratio of activity, let us assume, of 1.

ESTIMATE OF THE EFFECTIVE MEASURE OF VALUE IN 1872.

In 1872 a single gold standard existed in Great Britain; a restricted double standard in the Latin countries; a single silver standard in other European countries; a disused double standard in the United States, and legal-tender paper notes in many of these countries. The sum of all these currencies might amount to $4,000,000,000, with a ratio of activity of, say 2, making $8,000,000,000 in 1872, with a population of 360,000,000, or $22 per capita, as against $2,000,000,000 in 1803, with a population of 180,000,000, or $11 per capita. The effective measure of value in the occidental world has, therefore, doubled since the beginning of this century.

As it is worth while to ascertain, if possible, how we may obtain a least varying measure of value for the world it becomes necessary for this purpose to turn from the statistics of the occidental world to those of the whole world.

THE WORLD'S STOCK OF COIN AND POPULATION.

Assuming that without royal, seigniorial, or legislative interference, the relation of the mass of private credit current for money, to the mass of money, would be constant, let us confine our observation to the stock of metal money in the world. In 1803, with a population of, say 900,000,000, it was $2,500,000,000; in 1829, with a population of, say 1,000,000,000, it was $2,600,000,000; in 1848–'53, with a population of, say 1,100,000,000, it was $3,400,000,000; and in 1872, with a population of, say 1,200,000,000,† it was $5,700,000,000.

SWELLING OF THE MEASURE OF VALUE SINCE 1803.

These figures give an average of coin per capita throughout the world amounting to $2.83, $2.60, $3.09, and $4.75, at the respective periods named. If the assumptions of population here employed are admitted to be even approximately correct, then, even without reckoning greater activity of money now than formerly, it would follow that there has been no more fixedness in the relation of the world's coin and population than there has been in that of the effective measure of value and population of the Occident. They have both doubled, or about doubled, since the beginning of the century—doubled per capita of population. The coin of the world per capita and the effective measure of value of the Occident per capita (i.e., the coin and circulating credit of the Occident combined) have both doubled.

What has caused this doubling, this unsteadiness of the measure of value? Has it been due to diminution in the population of the world? No. We know that the population of the occidental world has more than doubled since the beginning of the century, while the figures assumed for the oriental world exhibit a very small increase. (Japan increases very slightly. As to India and China, they are probably stationary.)

Has it been due to superabundance in the stock of silver? No. That stock was $1,600,000,000 in 1803; $1,800,000,000 in 1829; $2,200,000,000 in 1848, and $3,100,000,000 in 1872. Its ratio to population has been, as the ratio of money to population always should be, a slightly increasing one; but the relation has been substantially constant.

THE MEASURE OF VALUE SWOLLEN BY GOLD.

The swelling of the measure of value has been due to an enormous increase in the stock of gold. This amounted to $1,800,000,000 in 1803, and twenty-six years afterward it had not increased. During the next nineteen years it increased 50 per cent., and during the following twenty-four years it increased 116 per cent. over the previous increase. In 1848 it was $1,200,000,000, in 1872 it was $2,600,000,000; by the end of the present century it will probably have fallen again to $2,200,000,000, perhaps to $2,000,000,000. So much for a metal which depends upon placer mining for its chief supplies.

This is the steady and unvarying measure of value to which the advocates of the single gold standard would commit us!

So far as steadiness is concerned, and irrespective of all other considerations, gold does not deserve to be used as money at all, and the old nations of Asia, who tried this metal more than thirty centuries ago, appear to have long since come to this conclusion; but the gradual increase of the mass of silver and the weight of the coins, together with the fact that gold frequently occurs with silver in the same matrix, give a place to gold which the unsteadiness of its supply would otherwise deny to it.

ANNUAL PRODUCTION OF GOLD AND SILVER SEPARATELY.

The validity of the statistics which have been quoted rests upon authorities—Wolowski, Seyd, Chevalier, McCulloch, and Jacob—whom the reading world has thus far been satisfied to accept as safe guides. The important and conclusive deductions drawn from them are, however, not without an amplitude of other support. They are to be drawn also from the statistics of the annual production of the precious metals, the validity of which will admit of but little question.

Estimated annual production of the precious metals throughout the entire world (exclusive of India, China, and Japan) at various periods during the nineteenth century. Sums in millions of dollars and tenths.*

Period.	Gold.	Silver.	Total.	Authority.
1800†	.....	36.3	49.3	Phillips.
1801	13.0	.....		Birkmyre.
1829	5 0	20.0	25.0	Estimate based on McCulloch.‡
1846§	29.2	35.5	61.7	McCulloch's Dic. of Commerce.
1848	67.5	.....	.....	Westminster Review, January, 1876.
1850‖	93.2	43.9	137.1	McCulloch.
1851	120.0	.....	.....	Westminster Review, January, 1876.
1852	182.5	40.5	223 0	Journal des Economistes, March, 1876.
1852	193.7	.....	.....	Westminster Review, January, 1876.
1853	155.0	40.5	195.5	Journal des Economistes.
1853	.....	.....	160 0	Blake.
1854	.....	47.4	.....	Whitney, by countries, App. Cycl., XV, 53, new edition.
1854	127.0	40.5	167.5	Journal des Economistes.
1855	135.0	40.5	175.5	Ibid.
1856	147.5	40.5	188.0	Ibid.
1857	133.0	40.5	173.5	Ibid.
1857	.....	.....	195.0	McCulloch.
1858	124.5	40.5	165.0	Journal des Economistes.
1859	124.5	40.5	165.0	Ibid.
1860	119.0	40.5	159.5	Ibid.
1861	114.0	42.5	156.5	Ibid.
1861	.....	56.0	.....	Soetbeer.
1862	107.5	45.0	152 5	Journal des Economistes.
1863	107.0	49.0	156.0	Ibid.
1864	113.0	51.5	164.5	Ibid.
1865	120.0	52.0	172.0	Ibid.
1865	130.7	62.3	193.0	Blake for gold, 1867; Phillips for silver, 1867
1866	121.0	50.5	171.5	Journal des Economistes.
1867	.....	53.08	.....	Blake, by countries, App. Cycl., XV, 53, new edition.
1867	116.0	54.0	170.0	Journal des Economistes.
1868	120.0	50.0	170.0	Ibid.
1869	121.0	47.5	168.5	Ibid.

* If legislation were wholly removed from the subject of money except to announce and fix the relation of the metals from time to time, and generally as to police functions, we would have both the metals in circulation plus an amount of free bank paper which would bear an almost constant relation to the sum of the metals. The measure of value in such case would be easy to ascertain; as it is, nothing is more difficult.

† Behm and Wagner sum up the population of the world for 1872 at 1,391,000,000, but in this they include China at 446,000,000. There is no authority for this extravagant figure besides that of the Chinese mandarin's communication to Lord Macartney in 1795. It was therein stated at 333,000,000, which was probably excessive by more than one-half. Consult the numerous and much more reliable estimates in Malte-Brun's Geography.

Estimated annual production, &c.—Continued.

Period.	Gold.	Silver.	Total.	Authority.
1870	116.0	51.5	167.5	Ibid.
1871	116.5	61.0	177.5	Ibid.
1872	101.5	65.0	166.5	Ibid.
1873	103.5	70.0	173.5	Ibid.
1873	103.5	76.3	179.8	Ibid. for gold, App. Cycl. for silver.
1874	90.5	71.5	162.0	Journal des Economistes.
1875	97.5	62.0	159.5	Ibid.
1875	118.0	72.0	190.0	Estimate.¶

* No mines in India. (McCulloch in Encyc. Brit., Ed. 1858, page 470.) Gold mines in China, but not worked (472) for the reason, according to Sir R. Murchison, that it would conflict with Chinese theory relative to maintaining "balance of the circulating medium." Otreschoff estimated total yield of precious metals in China, India, Japan, &c., in 1854, at $30,000,000 a year, but this is evidently too high. Whitney estimates the gold product of all Southern Asia at $600,000 a year. Perhaps, in view of Newmarch's statement, (Tooke, vi, 724,) that the specie (coin, trinkets, &c.) in India amounts to £400,000,000, of which say one-half is in coin, and allowing same for China and Japan, total coin in Southern Asia $2,000,000,000—the annual product of Southern Asia may be approximately as follows: Silver 29, gold 1, total 30. Allowing 1½ per cent. per annum for wear and loss of coin, it would require at least this amount to keep up the stock, while European and American supplies would be needed for the arts and to make provision for increasing population. Adding these sums to the above estimate for 1874 we have the following grand total annual production for the entire world—sums in millions of dollars:

1874.	Gold.	Silver.	Total.
The world exclusive of Southern Asia	90.5	71.5	162.0
Southern Asia	1.0	29.0	30.0
	91.5	100.5	192.0

† Estimated by Raymond (Report of 1875) 15 gold and 40 silver; but this estimate, though not very wide of the mark, is without authority. Phillips gives details by countries.

‡ McCulloch states (and in this he agrees with all other authors) that the lowest point of production was reached in 1829. He states that Mexico and South America together only produced of both metals $20,000,000, chiefly silver, and that very little was elsewhere produced. Allowing $5,000,000 for what was elsewhere produced, crediting that $5,000,000 to silver, and allowing one-fourth of the American product to have been in gold, (which exceeds the proportion estimated by Jacob for the same period,) I accord to silver $20,000,000 and to gold $5,000,000.

§ Estimated by Raymond at 43 gold and 39 silver; but wide of the mark and without authority. Birkmyre gives details by countries for 31.5 silver.

‖ For about this date DeBow, ii, 558, gives $131,500,000, gold and silver, as follows:

California	£14,500,000
Brazil	7,000,000
Russia	3,350,000
Great Britain, (silver)	50,000
Asia	1,400,000
$131,500,000	26,300,000

Phillips gives details for 43.8 silver. (App. Cyc., xv, 53.)

¶ The French estimate is considered to be at least $10,000,000 too low for silver. Silver in the United States for 1875 was $25,000,000 more than in 1868. The French estimate is also believed to be too low for gold.

Taking silver by itself, we find that the annual production of the occidental world has but little more than kept pace with population. It was $35,000,000 a year at about the beginning of the century; it was $72,000,000 a year in 1875. The statistics of its annual production are characterized by the same steadiness that distinguishes its place in the circulation. If gentlemen want details, they can have them country by country. There is no guess-work here; we are standing upon solid rock.

Turning to gold, we find that the annual production has varied enormously. It was $13,000,000 a year in 1801; fell to perhaps not over $5,000,000 in 1829; rose to $182,500,000 in 1852; fell to $107,000,000 in 1863; rose to $130,000,000 in 1865, and fell to $97,500,000 in 1875, and with a downward tendency.

And yet this wildly fluctuating, ruinously unsteady metal is what the fledgelings of political economy, the charlatans of monetary conventions, and the numerous other dupes of Lombard street would divorce from its natural complement, silver, and have for a sole standard of value. As well have the rack for a measure. It has often served that purpose, only the thing that it measured was not value, but human endurance, and that seems to be about all that gold by itself is capable of measuring. Thirteen million dollars a year in 1801; $5,000,000 in 1829; $182,000,000 in 1852; $97,500,000 in 1875. A wonderful measure of value indeed!

Let us suppose for a moment that silver had been demonetized by the entire commercial world at the same time that England demonetized it, to wit, in 1816, and the commerce, the business, and the vested interests, the daily labor and the time contracts of society left to adjust themselves in the course of twenty-six years (from 1803 to 1829) from a measure of $1,800,000,000 of gold and silver coin to one of, say, $700,000,000 or $800,000,000 of gold coin. Recollect that even as it was, the whole of that period was one of bankruptcies and convulsions. Now, let me ask what it would have been had the evil been aggravated by the adoption of such a gigantic blunder as England set up in 1816 for the imitation of mankind?

We are upon the eve of another era of the same character. The annual supply of gold has reached its culmination. The supplies of gold are falling off. The river-beds of California and Australia have been washed; the surface gold has been secured; the quartz mines have measurably used up the paying ore; the water-line has been touched, and below it are only those sulphurets which as yet have not been successfully treated. Beware foreign influence! Beware the example of England! Beware England's fatal blunder of 1816! Beware the ruinous effects that followed close upon its heels! The causes of the bankruptcies of 1873, 1874, 1875, and 1876 may lie in deeper waters than the shallow stream which commenced to flow in October, 1873. They may lie in the shrinkage of gold—that gold which the ill-considered act of 1873 made the sole measure of values and the sole arbiter of fortunes in the United States.

For the purpose of testing by comparison the efficiency of gold as a measure of values, let us suppose again that gold was the sole legal-tender money of the commercial world in 1848. Will gentlemen attempt to deny that the stock of this metal in the coins of the commercial world more than doubled between that date and 1867? If this fact be admitted, must it not be perceived that, with gold as the sole standard of value, prices would have more than doubled during the course of these nineteen years, and that with such a great and sudden enhancement of prices the worth of all vested interests, the relations of all contracts, the entire distribution of wealth, would have been seriously affected? The widow and the orphan, left with a comfortable competence in 1848, might have had to eke out a scanty living in 1867; the lessor of 1848 might have been glad to abandon his property rather than pay the taxes and charges of 1867; the rich would have become undeservedly poor, and the poor undeservedly rich—a very equitable arrangement, according to some minds, and I confess I am not wholly unbiased that way myself; but I do not forget that I am now addressing the official successors of the authors of the act of 1873.

Observe, too, the effect which the enormous folly of demonetizing silver in certain states of Europe and in the United States has had upon the currency of Asia. If these statistics have even approximate worth, and there is no reason to subject them to the slightest suspicion of incorrectness, for they rest upon numerous authorities who derived their data from widely different sources, it will be seen that the currency of Asia has more than doubled since 1848, and probably chiefly since 1862. This currency is estimated to have amounted to $700,000,000 in 1803, $900,000,000 in 1848, and $2,100,000,000 in 1872, chiefly in silver. So far as we know and are led to believe, from the character and institutions of the peoples of these countries, there was little or no increase at all in their numbers up to 1862, if, indeed, there has been any since that date. The increase of their circulating medium has, therefore, been almost absolute, and it must have had the effect of enhancing the present level of prices in those countries three times more than that of 1803.

No wonder that Mr. Secretary Bristow advises Congress that the abolition of our import duty upon tea has failed to cheapen the price of that article. Why we should have contributed, as we did contribute, by the suspension act of 1862 and the demonetization act of 1873, to triple the specie prices of everything we have had and shall have to buy from China, Japan, and the East Indies wholly surpasses the understanding. To men of plain minds it seems to have been the most stupendous folly.

APOLOGIES FOR SUBSIDIARY COINAGE.

To these grave charges about tripling prices in Asia there has been a weak and ill-considered reply, to the effect that while England and her subservient imitators on the continent of Europe and in this country have demonetized silver as a legal tender for the payment of debts, that metal has nevertheless been allowed to remain in the form of base coin for fractional currency or small change. It seems to have been forgotten that base or token money can only circulate to a small amount. For example, if gold and silver were now equally legal tender in Great Britain, as they were previous to 1717, a large proportion, perhaps one-half, of the whole amount of money now in the kingdom, which is estimated at $575,000,000, (plus $5,000,000 of copper,) would be of silver, which at the present moment is the cheaper metal at the relation of 15½. In France, in 1860, where the double standard prevailed, and when gold was the cheaper metal at the legal relation of 15½, a large portion of the entire metallic currency was of gold, (Seyd.) But instead of the currency of England being entirely of silver, at the present time there are in that country $500,000,000 of gold and only $75,000,000 of silver (tokens) in circulation, (Jevons.) This result is due to the demonetization of silver, and from this cause some $200,000,000 of silver, which would otherwise hold place in the money of that country, have either been melted up or exported; reduced either to plate or shipped to Asia. In the one case, lost almost irretrievably to civilization, so far as its agency in measuring values and stimulating industry is concerned; in the other, gone to help add to the strength and commercial resources of a semi-barbarous world.

But far more important than this is the consideration that the substance of which coins are made and the substance of which the standard is composed are altogether different matters. The coins of a country may be made of gold or silver; yet if wheat were made the standard of value, that is to say, if the coins were payable on demand in wheat, the prices of other commodities would fluctuate, not with the vicissitudes of coinage, nor even of the stock and production of the precious metals, but with those of the stock and production of wheat. Coins of this character would merely be tokens, promises to pay (wheat) stamped on gold or silver; of this character are the silver coins of England, and the silver half-dollars, quarters, and dimes of the United States. They are mere tokens, and, except at times when they rose in value (in the standard) so as to be worth melting or exporting, the metal of which they were composed would practically be demonetized.

SUBSIDIARY COINAGE NOT WHAT IS WANTED.

It is not merely urged by the advocates of the double standard that silver should have that subordinate place in the currency which is the utmost that can be filled by a token coinage, and which could be filled to a certain extent as well by any baser metal, or even, perhaps, by paper; it is not merely asked that silver shall be granted the same sort of recognition that is vouchsafed in social life to a menial. It is demanded that it shall be accorded the same rank in which gold has been maintained; the rank to which the great place of silver in the coins of the world, its universal distribution and appreciation, its ample and steady supply, its twin-birth, its utility and adaptability, and its worth as a measure of value, entitle it. With a double standard wisely fixed, all the moderately large payments would be made in gold and all the smaller ones in silver, just as for moderately large quantities of liquids the oaken hogshead is employed and for smaller ones the tin gallon. By forcibly interdicting oak, you might compel hogsheads to be measured by the tin gallon, just as by interdicting tin you might force gallons to be measured by the oaken hogshead. What is demanded for silver is that it shall be left free to assume its own rank in the currency, so that whenever it temporarily becomes the cheaper metal at the average relation to gold, it may for the time possess that same influence in modifying the measure of value that has been always so zealously accorded to it when it became the dearer.

THE FLUCTUATIONS IN GOLD DUE CHIEFLY TO PLACER MINING.

It will not do to rejoin to this that the probabilities of gold again becoming the metal in more plentiful supply are remote. Even if true, this reply would confess the very selfishness of the champions of the gold standard which they have been so solicitous to conceal in the solemnity of their monetary conventions and the surreptitious character of their measures of legislation. But it is not true. Although at the present time the annual supplies of gold are falling off, it is impossible to predict how long this movement may last. While silver is essentially the product of industry and enterprise, gold is largely that of adventure and chance. This results from the physical fact that the last-named metal is nearly always found in alluvial deposits or placers, and it is from these sources that the bulk of the world's stock of gold has been obtained; this is never the case with silver.

GOLD AT PRESENT CHIEFLY A BRITISH PRODUCT.

These facts bring under our consideration another important matter in connection with the history of the precious metals separately. It is this: that at the present time and for the main part the supplies of gold to the world are chiefly from British countries or countries subject to British domination. The following table will illustrate this very significant statement:

Estimated annual gold product of the world at latest dates for which the statistics are attainable in the various official reports.

The United States, 1875		$26,000,000
Australia, &c., 1872	$58,000,000
British Columbia	2,000,000
Canada and Nova Scotia	500,000
Other British possessions and British isles	1,500,000
Total British possessions		62,000,000
Balance of the world		30,000,000
Total of the world		118,000,000
Proportion of the world's production from British possessions, (per cent.)		52½

From this table it will be observed that of the $118,000,000 which represent the annual gold product of the world 52½ per cent. was obtained in countries over which the British flag waved or which were subject to British domination.

Is this, then, the secret of British plutocratical solicitude for the single gold standard? Is it not only that the people of Great Britain shall have the rewards of their labor measured by this diminishing measure, which is to be held tightly grasped in the monopolizing and cruel hands of their plutocratic lords, but that the labor of the entire civilized world shall be measured by it also? For one, I reply to this, never! And when this subject shall be fully understood by the American people, the reply that I now make should echo and reverberate throughout the whole length and breadth of this great land. Never ought we, never will we, submit to have our labor and enterprise measured by a standard subject to the manipulation and pleasure of a foreign nation, and of a class hostile to the genius of our institutions.

THE DOUBLE STANDARD FOR THE UNITED STATES.

Hitherto the double standard has been alluded to with reference to its great superiority as a measure of value for the exchanges of the world. I now propose to treat it solely or chiefly with reference to the affairs of the United States.

Many of the considerations adverted to in connection with its superiority as a measure of value for all nations apply with equal, and sometimes more than equal, force to this nation. Briefly recapitulated they are mainly as follows:

The convenience of employing gold for moderately large payments and of silver for smaller ones induces both metals to be employed as money, whether one or the other, or both or neither, are made the standard of value. The violent aberrations in the annual supplies of gold, the steadiness of silver, the often deficient and sometimes excessive supplies of the one, and the always ample supplies of the other, forbid us to rely upon one as a standard of value to the exclusion of the other, and particularly when that one is gold. And this objection to gold as the sole standard of value obtains additional force at a time like the present, when its annual supply is diminishing every year, its distribution throughout the world is narrowing, and its production is at the mercy of the arms and legislation of a single powerful nation, and a class hostile to the growth and prosperity of republican communities.

Another basic consideration is the stock of precious metals in possession of the world, the product of many centuries of toil, abstinence, contention, suffering, and sacrifice. It is this stock which measures prices. Nearly one-half of it consists of silver. To demonetize this half will reduce all prices one-half and convulse every country in the world, except those which may refuse to take dart in such demonetization.

Beyond these considerations, however, there are others which apply with peculiar force to the present time and to our own country. These will be treated in their proper order.

EFFECTS UPON THE DEBTOR AND CREDITOR CLASSES.

First, with regard to the effect of the standard on the debtor and creditor classes.

At the outset let it be premised, to the great honor and glory of our country, that in the sense in which the term is used in England we have no debtor and creditor classes. Notwithstanding the tendency of the national debt and of the other financial scars which the recent great civil conflict has left upon the war-worn features of the nation, we have no permanent debtors and creditors. The man who is a debtor to-day becomes a creditor to-morrow, and the creditor of to-morrow becomes the debtor of next day after to-morrow. We are all in the same boat in this country; all struggling, toiling, risking, winning, or losing. There are no hereditary privileges, no entailed estates, no permanently vested interests. Misadventure, death, unexpected legislation, in a word, a thousand agencies are continually at work to redistribute wealth and redistribute poverty; while a free soil, boundless natural resources, thoroughly diffused and abundant education, and a universal spirit of enterprise, contribute to increase our stock of wealth; so that while the gifts of fortune are being continually redistributed, those of intelligence and industry, which are always fairly distributed at the outset, are being added to them—an equalizing reservoir with a primarily equalized and always-rising level.

Therefore, the remarks which will now be devoted to the consideration of the respective equities of the debtor and creditor classes will apply with far less cogency to the affairs of this country than to those of any other.

It was not complained by the debtor class, when the act of 1873 was passed, that it would tend to favor the interests of the creditor class, as it undoubtedly did. Why was no complaint made? Because the act was so drawn that it apparently related only to the technical regulation of the mints; and gave no notice, either from its title or its text, that that far graver measure, a change of the standard of value, was proposed. There is no mention of the term "standard of value" in the act; there is not even mention made of the silver legal-tender dollar which the act abolished. None but those fully conversant with the history of our legislation upon the subject of money, none but those who were familiar with the details and principles of the long-forgotten act of 1792 and subsequent legislation, could have understood the full purport of the important changes of legislation which the passage of the act of 1873 involved.

Moreover, specie payments had been suspended for eleven years, nor for more than two years afterward was there any provision made for resumption; and resumption appeared so far off in 1872—that is to say, at the time the demonetization act was introduced into Congress—that the effects of demonetization, coupled with those of resumption, were not realized or anticipated. The silver dollar had not been coined at our mints for many years, and during the fall of gold subsequent to 1848 had gone out of circulation, except for the payment of ground-rents in Philadelphia and elsewhere, and for the purposes of the Asiatic trade. The demonetization of the silver dollar at such a period was, like a stab in the dark, unexpected, unseen, and not to be felt until too late to be averted.

There was, therefore, no notice to the debtor class, who are always the poorer class, and therefore the more numerous and widespread, the least organized, the least protected by the law, the least courted by ambition or favored by power.

In the absence of such complaint from the debtors in 1873, in the absence of any notice which was practically accessible to them of the supernal importance of the change proposed, what right would now the creditor class possess to object to the rehabilitation and restoration of the double standard? Clearly none whatever.

I do not speak now of the creditors of the Government, whose status in respect of the coin in which their claims are to be paid is not proposed to be discussed; I speak of creditors generally. In view of the concealed effects of the demonetization act of 1873, in view of the fact that resumption was not provided for until 1875, in view of the utter absence of complaint from the debtor class when the demonetization act was passed, what right, or even shadow of right, has any class of creditors now to object to the monetization of the silver dollar? The demonetization act was not passed at their solicitation any more than it was passed with the knowledge or concurrence of the debtors. It was not a contract between the Government and the people. It was a mere caprice of legislation, which could be undone, which in deference to public policy and justice should be undone, and which, under our organic law as I hope presently to show, which raises the double standard far above the province of legislation, must be undone.

But putting all this aside and looking at the question purely as an economical and political one, and without reference either to its merits or its history, both of which so emphatically decide in favor of the double standard, let us see which class it is that, when benefits or advantages are to be dispensed, a wise and particularly a republican Government should favor.

Is it the creditor class, who consist to some extent of capitalists whose estates were hereditary, and of others whose estates were the result of chance, unexpected death, unlooked-for legislation, or extraordinary and unforeseeable events? Is it the creditor class, whose garnered capital represents the results of past labor, perhaps of that of the serf, the slave, the overworked, browbeaten, fagged, and famished victim of toil? Is it the creditor class, who are always allied to an effete conservatism, out of which spring caste and aristocracy and feudal privileges and every other odious form of power, to whom legislative favors shall be granted? Is it the creditor class, who least stand in need of such favors or advantages?

To whom shall legislation dispense what small favors it may have to bestow in a country so free and republican as this? Shall it be to the class whose tendencies I have depicted or to the debtor class, to the poor, the needy, the temporarily depressed, the cast-down, the struggling, the toiling, the enterprising, the active, the aspiring, the ever hopeful?

Shall the favors of legislation be granted to those who ask for them and fawn and intrigue for them, or to those who never ask, nor fawn, nor intrigue?

Shall they be granted to those whom we here in Congress do not represent, or to those whom we do?

Shall they be awarded to the many whose servants we are, or to the few whose servants we are not? For remember that this is a Government based upon numbers and not upon wealth, and that the States and Commonwealths which are represented in this Chamber are also based upon the principle of numbers, of the greatest good to the greatest number.

If there are favors to be accorded, let the people have them. It is upon their prosperity and welfare that this country, nay the entire world, essentially depends for its advancement; not upon the patronage of a class.

NO ADVANTAGES TO BE GAINED BY EITHER CLASS.

But I deny that there are any favors or advantages to be granted by a return to the double standard. A single standard confers advantages, advantages to the few, while a double standard divides and distributes advantages. This is fully illustrated by Professor Jevon's diagram. The double standard both gives and takes. It strikes a medium between the metals, although but one of them may chiefly be employed in the currency and that the one of temporarily the lesser purchasing power. There is no practical difference between its effects and those which would flow from the adoption of a single metal which is adhered to as the standard forever, a metal which is always in as sufficient supply and as widely distributed and largely held as now are both the metals combined, provided such a metal could be found. And whatever infinitessimally small difference there is, whatever poor crumb of advantage the restoration of the double standard would afford to the debtor class, it bears no comparison at all with the full ration, the stuffed loaf of advantage, which the continuation of the single gold standard is destined to confer upon the creditor class while the annual supplies of gold are diminishing in quantity. Whatever advantage there was in the double standard, if it was worth the planning of one class to destroy it, it is due to the interests of the other and the welfare of the nation to restore it.

Moreover, and from a higher point of view, it is in the long run really to the interest of the creditor class, as well as of that larger class who are neither creditors nor debtors, for us to restore the double standard. It is to the interest of honor, of virtue, of religion, of goodwill to all men and peace upon earth. It will tend to save the debtor from despair and the resources which despair invites; from dishonest bankruptcy, from flight, from the sequestration of property, from its malicious and revengeful destruction, from popular agitation, agrarian disturbances, and revolution, and from recourse to "interchangeable bonds" or other covert forms of repudiation.

I have said that the practical effects of the double standard would be like that of a single metal which is adhered to forever. I meant by this that a single metal adhered to forever would have its ups as well as downs, as England has had with gold since 1816. It was down with the people of that country until about the year 1832 or 1837, then slowly up until 1848, then rapidly up until 1865, and since that year slowly down. With a double standard England would have had fewer of these vicissitudes; with the restoration of our double standard we shall have fewer of them than otherwise. These vicissitudes are clearly traceable to those disturbances of the double standard which commenced in 1816. They are still unsettled. With their settlement, with the return of nations to that dual employment of gold and silver which was never interrupted until England saw fit to interrupt it, will doubtless return that era of monetary ease and serenity which characterized the last century, during which the Bank-of-England rate scarcely varied one-half of 1 per cent. Bank panics and financial revulsions will disappear, and possibly also the thousand and one mad schemes of irredeemable paper which necessity and despair have driven men to entertain.

But a single standard adhered to forever is something that even were a steady enough and otherwise suitable metal obtainable for the purpose, which is absolutely denied, is not to be looked for. It is true that England adhered to gold all through that period so trying to her plutocratical rulers from 1848 to 1865, but it was not without having often been on the point of abolishing it and resorting to some substance for money the supplies of which did not increase so rapidly. The propositions of Cobden and some of the other writers I have quoted in favor of adopting wheat, &c., as standards of value sufficiently attest the alarm of the ruling classes. But fortunately for the people of England the popular sufferings of the previous period from 1816 to 1830, when gold was yearly diminishing in supply, had gone far enough to produce the reaction which the short-sighted and selfish adoption of the gold standard so richly merited. A stern remembrance of these sufferings was abroad in the land, and forbade any further tampering with the standard. The people said in effect, said it in the chartist and the anti-corn law and the reform contentions, "It was your turn a while since; it is ours now. Stand back, and let's have fair play!" The yeomanry of England had arisen from its pauper grave, and the voice of power trembled and was hushed in its presence.

While these circumstances forbade the desertion of that standard which the plutocracy of 1816 had set up for itself, there is no assurance that they would not again be evoked to prevent a change of the standard from gold to silver should the latter once more become the dearer metal. The plutocracy of England found strong enough arguments to change the standard from the double to the single and from silver to gold. The plutocracies of the continental countries have changed from one metal to the other whenever it suited, or they fancied it suited, their present interest most. Neither, with the increasing advantages and power which the retention of the gold standard would confer upon our rising and promising regiments of plutocrats, would this class fail to make similar attempts in this country, and particularly if the easy success they met with in 1873 is suffered to stand unrebuked. In effect, the standard would be changed whenever there occurred a marked change in the value of the metals.

We should have a double standard, indeed; only, instead of standing upon two supports, it would rest upon one. Instead of having its center of gravity always midway between its supports, it would have one that rocked to and fro, and at every oscillation tore away a portion of those foundations of equity upon which alone republican institutions and republican government may permanently rest.

RESORT TO A GOLD STANDARD INEVITABLY INVITES PAPER INFLATIONS.

An extremely important consideration has been adverted to and demands some elaboration. It is this: that any attempt by force of law to substitute gold for silver in the money of a country, at a time when gold is becoming scarcer, either absolutely or relatively as to silver, must surely result in producing paper inflations. Paper notes, either representative or unrepresentative, are sure to be issued as substitutes for gold as it becomes scarce. Any attempt to artificially enhance the purchasing power of gold, either by demonetizing or partly demonetizing silver—and the act of 1873 is of this natue—is certain to invite or prolong the issuance of paper notes. By artificially enhancing the purchasing power of gold the profits arising from the issuance of paper notes are enhanced, and the pressure on the part of banks and individuals to obtain authority to issue them, if indeed the decline of prices and consequent stagnation of industry do not induce the Govermnent itself to issue them, will become too great to be successfully resisted. This authority once obtained, or this power once exercised, it always proceeds to extremes. Neither reason nor prudence sets a limit to the emission of paper notes; the emission usually continues until it ends in general bankruptcy.

This, then, is what the purblind, short-sighted advocates of a single metal, when both metals together are barely more than sufficient to prevent the world's stock of coin from falling behind the increase of population—this is what they would invite. They would press the blade down to the point at which it is bound to spring up; spring up in defective and excessive credit, in speculation, in madness, in bankruptcy, and in crime. They would twist the thumb-screw down until the debtor was reduced to poverty and despair, forgetting that they themselves more than any class of persons were interested in keeping him solvent and prosperous.

The lesson is the same in all artificial or forced systems of currency. Money came into existence freely, and it has never yet yielded up its birthright. Legislation should not, legislation cannot, enthrall it. Beyond the scope of temporarily fixing the relation, which should be the mean natural or market relation, between two metals, both of which are indispensable for the purposes of exchange; beyond manufacturing and unitizing coins and punishing counterfeiters; in short, beyond the exercise of that surveillance which may fitly be termed the police of money, legislation has neither rightful function nor power. All it can do beyond this is to confuse, to deceive, to injure, to disturb, and to invite loss, discontent, turbulence, violence, and anarchy.

Gentlemen may fancy that they are playing upon a very simple instrument when they undertake to meddle with money. But they are mistaken. The apparently simple instrument is an organism of the most complex character, the result of thirty centuries of growth and development, and, like all highly-developed organisms, impatient of control or restraint. It recoils from the first touch of an unaccustomed hand; it gives forth alarming sounds; and if further meddled with, it revenges itself upon its disturber with overwhelming ruin.

DANGER OF ABANDONING THE DOUBLE STANDARD.

It is impossible to resume specie payments in gold alone. Let us try to grasp the full significance of this proposition, if even it be only in one respect—that of the capacity of the mines of the world to supply it with gold enough to measure its exchanges without the co-ordinate employment of silver. Given bills of exchange, given certificates of deposit, given bank bills, given Government legal-tender notes, given railways, telegraphs; in short, any form of representative or non-representative money or of agencies for increasing the rapidity of its circulation; given all these, and the world now employs them all whenever and wheresoever they can be employed with safety or advantage, and often when neither one nor the other is secured—given all these, and yet a certain quantity of the precious metals is needed at bottom, as the foundation upon which the entire basis of credit, safe and unsafe, must rest. Now, how much does this indispensable quantity of the precious metals amount to at the present time

There is no difficulty in answering this question. The world's stock of coin is $5,700,000,000, of which nearly one-half is of silver. Of this sum, Europe, America, and the rest of the occidental world employ about $3,600,000,000. Previous to the late partial demonetizations of silver in the Latin Union, and in Germany and the United States, these $3,600,000,000 consisted of, let us say, $2,000,000,000 of gold and $1,600,000,000 of silver. They now consist of, say, about $2,400,000,000 gold and $1,200,000,000 silver. By continuing to exclude silver from equal participation with gold in the currency of the United States, and attempting to resume specie payments, we occasion a demand for, say, $350,000,000 of gold wherewith to pay off the greenbacks and furnish bank reserves, and $50,000,000 of silver in lieu of the fractional notes. If we could obtain these $400,000,000 of metal without drawing it from other countries in Europe or America, they would add so much to the stock of coin in the occidental world, which would then be $2,750,000,000 of gold and $1,250,000,000 of silver. This is the answer to the question so far as the occidental world is concerned. The quantity of the precious metals needed for money and the basis of credit in the occidental world—that is to say, the quantity needed to maintain prices at their present level—is at least $4,000,000,000. Of this sum the United States, if it succeeds in resuming specie payments, will hold about $400,000,000.

Now, let me ask, in the first place, where these $400,000,000 are expected to come from? Gentlemen may dispute the premise and contend that no such sum as $400,000,000 is necessary. They may point to the fact that just previous to the time of the suspension in 1862 the entire stock of coin in this country was estimated at not over $300,000,000, (Finance Report, 1861, pp. 25 and 62,) of which probably not over three-fourths or $225,000,000 were in gold. Granted that this was the fact, and I have no doubt it was, it must not be forgotten that since 1862 the population of this country has increased 50 per cent., and its exchanges fully 100 per cent. What is the proof of this? Simply that in 1861 our whole circulating media consisted of $300,000,000 in coin and $200,000,000 of bank-notes, which circulated within limited areas at or nearly par; whereas now it consists of not more than $140,000,000 of coin and some $750,000,000 of Government and bank paper, the latter circulating (throughout nearly the whole country) at about 87½ cents to the dollar; say total circulation at par equal to $800,000,000. This is 70 per cent. more than the par circulation of 1861; an incontestable proof that exchanges have increased in volume at least 70 per cent. Taking into consideration the superior activity of the legal tender and national-bank notes over the old State-bank notes, and the improvement and development of railways, telegraphs, clearing houses, and other mechanisms of exchange, since 1861, it cannot be doubted that the bulk of to-day's exchanges in this country is at least double that of a corresponding day in 1862. Suppose, however, we put it at only 70 per cent. higher; then, in order to resume specie payment upon at least as firm a footing as specie payments stood in 1861—and the universal suspension of the banks toward the end of that year proves that it was not so firm a footing as could have been wished—we shall require at least 70 per cent. more specie than we employed in 1861. Add 70 per cent. to $300,000,000, and you have $510,000,000. Allow $140,000,000 for specie already in the country, in the banks, in private hands, and in the vaults of the Treasury, and you will need $370,000,000 in order to resume. Of this $370,000,000 the Government will need, perhaps, about $350,000,000, and the banks the remainder. But the apportionment is of no consequence in this connection. The substantial fact is that in order to resume specie payments we shall need $370,000,000—say, for round figures, $400,000,000—of specie, of which, under the operation of the act of 1873, about $350,000,000 must be in gold.

I now ask where are these $350,000,000 expected to come from? Again, do I fancy I hear interpellation. I shall perhaps be told that a proposition is even now before Congress, a proposition from careful and able sources, and boasting the indorsement of high financial authority, a proposition which assumes that $100,000,000 in gold will be sufficient wherewith to enable the country to return to specie payments.

I refer to a speech which has been made in the Senate. But I warn gentlemen to beware of making a mistake in respect of this matter, for a mistake will set us back many years. The British government tried to resume in 1817, after a suspension of twenty years, but it failed, and resumption was deferred for seven other years, until 1824. If we try to resume in 1879 with $100,000,000 and fail, we may be set back a quarter of a century. Moreover, if we fail, somebody—most probably some clique of stock-gamblers—will make 15 or 20 per cent. out of the operation. How? Easy enough! Knowing that $100,000,000 was the limit of the Government's ability to pay, they could easily make arrangements with the banks and depositories throughout the country to withdraw $100,000,000 of greenbacks on the eve of the day of resumption, and present them for payment at the Treasury. After having drawn the last dollar of specie out of the latter they could, by presenting an additional note, compel it to suspend again. Then gold would go up once more, perhaps to the full extent of the figure from which it would have fallen, and the clique could sell their specie in the market and realize their profit.

This is not only a possible occurrence; it is a probable one—a highly probable one, almost a certainty. There is nothing in the world to prevent it, except two things: First the inability of a clique to raise $100,000,000; second, the possibility that the Treasury, in offering to redeem its issues, may arbitrarily and unexpectedly prefer notes of particular numbers or dates of issue. But these objections are frivolous. Experience has demonstrated that there is no difficulty whatever on the part of stock-jobbing cliques to raise $100,000,000, while, with regard to making preferred credits of certain notes, the Treasury has no authority to do so, and if it had, the exercise of such authority would be almost certain to be defeated through treachery. Secrets so weighty as this one would be, are impossible to keep. Even if it did not leak out, the clique would be certain to monopolize the Treasury doors to the exclusion of all comers. In short, wealth, power, organization, experience, and special-training would be ranged on the one side, against a scattered and indifferent population on the other; and who can doubt which would win?

Finally, even if carried out successfully, the exercise of such authority would be unlawful and unjust.

We cannot resume with $100,000,000, nor with $200,000,000. Why, gentlemen, we have have had $140,000,000 in specie in the Treasury on several occasions during the past ten years. If it is practicable to resume now with $100,000,000, why was it not practicable on those occasions with $140,000,000? It was certainly not for lack of desire on the part of the Secretary of the Treasury, but simply because both the Secretary and Congress plainly saw that the thing could not be done.

It is better to be on the safe side of an operation of this magnitude and importance. It is better to have a dollar more than is necessary for the purpose of resuming, than a dollar less than is necessary. We cannot expect to resume upon false pretenses. We cannot, and if we can, we ought not, hoodwink the people, or run the risk of failing, and, therefore, of unsettling values for an indefinite period in the future. In order to resume we must pay dollar for "dollar," and dollar for dollar, as the law now stands, means at least $350,000,000 in gold.

And now for the third time I ask, where are these $350,000,000 to come from? Gentlemen may differ with me as to the sum needed for resumption. Some may believe $200,000,000 are enough, others may even consider $100,000,000. I have briefly discussed these opinions, and do not believe that less than $350,000,000 will suffice. With only $129,500,000 of Bank of England and $144,000,000 of provincial bank-notes afloat in 1815, total $273,500,000 in paper, England required over $270,000,000 in coin before she was enabled to resume. After you shall have resumed, less coin may be required in the country; but in order to resume, you will require a dollar in coin for every dollar of Government paper afloat, and, in my opinion, and, as shown by the experience of England, you will also have to give the national banks time to acquire an equal fund of specie before they can resume; otherwise, you may bankrupt every one of them.

Confining myself to the strict requirement of the Government, I again ask where is the requisite specie to come from if we are to depend upon gold alone?

The annual gold product of the world is given at $97,500,000, of which let us say the whole amount can be retained in the Occident, which all will admit is a violent stretch of probability. It is estimated that considerably more than one-half of this supply is needed for the arts, for gilding, plating, watch-case making, jewelry, and the like. (Seyd.) Let us limit this demand to one-half. This would leave a supply of say $49,000,000 of gold per annum available for the maintenance and increase of money. The maintenance of money costs about 1½ per cent. per annum in abrasion and loss. One and a half per cent. on the present occidental stock of $2,600,000,000 gold amounts to $39,000,000. This is the quantity of gold needed every year to maintain the existing stock of gold coin in the Occident. Deduct this from $49,000,000, the total annual supply available for money, and there would remain a surplus of $10,000,000 a year. It is out of this surplus that our $350,000,000 must come, unless it comes out of the existing stock in other countries, a point which will be considered further on.

Upon the most favorable hypotheses, after according every debatable point in favor of the feasibility of the proposition, we should have to wait nearly thirty-five years to accomplish it in practice; for if we managed to obtain every ounce of gold which can be spared from the supplies of the world for the next thirty-five years, we shall barely have secured enough.

There are considerations, however, which render some of these hypotheses untenable.

The entire population of the occidental world is increasing at the rate of 1 per cent. per annum. (Essay on Population of the Earth in New York Independent.) Even if its exchanges or their bases increased no faster than its population, this fact would require an annual addition of 1 per cent. to the stock of coin. At the present time this would absorb nearly $3,000,000 per annum.

The demand for gold in the arts will undoubtedly increase at, at least, an equal rate. The probability is that it will increase, because it has increased at a greater ratio. Limiting it to this ratio, it will amount to nearly another $3,000,000 per annum.

The annual product of gold throughout the world is diminishing. It was $182,000 000 in 1852; it is given at only $97,500,000 in 1875. This is a decrement of over $3,500,000 per annum.

On account of these considerations we must subtract about $9,500,000 per annum from the world's available annual surplus of $10,000,000, leaving but $500,000 per annum to spare. At the rate of $500,000 per annum we shall need seven hundred years in which to garner up $350,000,000, the amount necessary wherewith to resume payment in gold.

The possibility of performing even this feat rests upon the assumption that Austria, which has a forced paper currency; and Italy, which has a forced paper currency; and Russia, which has a forced paper currency; and several other countries which have forced paper currencies—countries which in the aggregate contain one-half of the entire European population of the globe—will be content to wait until the United States gets its quantum of gold wherewith to resume, before they will make any move to effect a similar reform in their own currencies. It rests, also, upon the assumption that the people of the United States will wait during these years for the consummation of resumption; wait without complaint, without further legislation, without getting tired, or yielding to the clamors of interest, or prejudice, or ignorance.

RESUMPTION ON A GOLD BASIS IMPOSSIBLE.

I tell you, gentlemen, the thing cannot be done! Resumption in gold is out of the question. It is not practical financially; it is not practical metallurgically; it is not practical internationally; it is not practical politically; in short, it is not practical at all.

I can no longer wonder that the interchangeable theory or any other form of paper lunacy has obtained a footing in the land. So long as intelligent and educated men will persist in attempting to do that which the most unintelligent and uneducated plainly perceive to be impossible, so long will demagogery and roguery have a footing. "My plan," they will say, "is at least as good as theirs;" meaning that of the gold resumptionists. And I must confess that I assent to their proposition. One plan is quite as good as the other, and not a whit better. They are both utterly impracticable, and no attempt to carry out either one of them can have any other than one ending: failure, violent fluctuations, and unsettlement of values, distress, commotion, and the grave dangers that lurk beneath all violent upheavals of the body-politic.

There are two forms of reply that I anticipate to the assertion that it is impossible in less than a great number of years to obtain the requisite supply of metal wherewith to resume specie payments in gold. One is if money is merely a measure of values, why will not $100,000,000 or even $50,000,000 measure values as well as $350,000,000 or any other sum? The puerility involved in this reply needs little further response than what has already been accorded to it in a previous portion of this speech. If there was no accumulated stock of coin in the world upon which values throughout the world already rested; if there were existing no contracts, rents, leases, bonds, mortgages, and the like, executed in the past and maturing now, or executed now and to mature in the future; in a word, if the world was born to-day, $50,000,000 would in theory answer quite as well for the entire money of this country, ay, even of the whole world, as any other sum. But the world was not born to-day, nor yesterday, nor the day before. The stock of coin which forms the substratum of the world's prices is the accumulation of fifty centuries, and bargains are being made every day—for example, Government and corporative debts—which cover long periods of time. To disturb these prices and contracts by forcing the exchanges of the country to be measured by a sum of specie so vastly less than its usual measure, as $100,000,000 or even $200,000,000 would be, would be tantamount to the violent destruction of vast interests and a wrenching of all the relations of industrial and social life. Imagine workingmen's wages at twelve and a half cents a day in this county, while they stood at $2 in France or England. Imagine our railway corporations forced to pay their rents on long leases and the interest on long bonds in daily appreciating gold. Would not this be quite as unjust as, on the other hand, by issuing a daily depreciating interchangeable token to gratuitously save them from that disaster?

The other reply that I anticipate to the objection that we cannot obtain gold enough wherewith to resume is this: "We can obtain the gold from Europe." Can we? Let us examine this point.

CAN WE GET GOLD ENOUGH FROM EUROPE WHEREWITH TO RESUME SPECIE PAYMENTS?

When a merchant proposes to buy a large quantity of a given article, his first thought is to compute how much his demand will raise the price of the article during the progress of the purchase. The first element in this calculation is the stock on hand, the next is the current supply and demand. It is the same with the stock-operator, in short, with dealers in all commodities. Why should it not be the same with Government, when it goes into the market for $350,000,000 of gold?

The current demand and supply of this article has been discussed. There is no stock of it on hand in the same sense that there is a stock or accumulation of merchandise. The stock of merchandise is the unused portion—the surplus. There is no unused stock of gold coin in the world, no surplus. It is all in use to support prices;* withdraw it, and the whole fabric of prices and credits falls to the dust. The stock of gold in Europe and the countries settled by Europeans amounts to about $2,600,000,000. On every one of these dollars stands a vast and almost toppling superstructure of credits in every conceivable form. You now propose to purchase one-eighth, almost one-seventh, of this entire basis of the rest of the occidental world's exchanges and credits. Do you believe you can do it? Do you believe you can offer your bonds or your merchandise in the markets of Europe low enough to purchase with them $350,000,000 of gold? Do you suppose that United States 5 per cent. bonds at par, or 90, or 80, or even 70, will accomplish it? Or, to put it another way, suppose you determine not to sell your bonds under par; do you suppose that you can place them at any rate of interest to which the self-respect of this country would submit, or which its resources would justify? Do you suppose that when you commenced to draw gold from Europe, the Bank of England and other like institutions would not raise their rate of interest to 7, 8, 10, or even 12 per cent.? You know that this is always done when specie is observed to be flowing out. You know that it must be done. And do you suppose that when it is done you can place your bonds at any lower rate of interest than the bank rate? Do you imagine that American produce or manufactures offered to Europe at three-fourths of their present market prices will do it?

Well, then, I do not. To induce Europe and the European world to part with one-seventh of its measure of exchanges and basis of credit within the time fixed for the resumption of specie payment in this country you would have to sell all your movables—for remember that lands, which constitute more than one-half of our wealth, cannot be exported—at prices which would bankrupt every industry in this country. You might get $10,000,000 or $20,000,000, or perhaps even $50,000,000 in gold. By dint of hammering the bond market (and you would have to authorize the Treasury to sell below par, at any price the bonds would fetch) during the two years and a half now remaining you might even get $100,000,000 of metal; but when you shall have taken $100,000,000 away from Europe you will have produced a commotion and a fall in prices on the other side that, if it did not lead to the closure of the European stock markets to American bonds, would certainly precipitate a tremendous financial convulsion.† As for this side, the effects would be no less alarming.

Recollect, gentlemen, that the problem is that of taking $350,000,000 in gold out of a fully occupied and heavily over-topped basis of only $2,600,000,000 in the occidental world. It is not the whole stock of metal, both silver and gold, that we can now call upon, as in former days. Silver has been demonetized in several countries of Europe; it has been demonetized here. We have thoughtlessly so worded our laws that, until we alter them, we can only pay in gold. The Latin Union, Germany, and Scandinavia, together with England and Portugal, &c., have so worded their laws, whether thoughtlessly or not you can decide for yourselves, that gold alone is the legal tender in

* The legal-tender portion at a full ratio of activity; the subsidiary coins at a lesser rate.

† When the negotiations were going on in London for the sale of the largest amount of United States bonds that has ever been sold there at one time, it was foreseen by the Bank of England that a quantity of coin would accumulate as the proceeds of these bonds to the credit of the Government of the United States. As a matter of fact there was an accumulation of about $21,000,000. The Bank of England, foreseeing that there would be an accumulation of coin to the credit of the United States, which might be taken away bodily in specie, gave notice to the officers of the Treasury Department of the United States that the power of that institution would be arrayed against the whole proceeding unless we gave a pledge that the coin should not be removed, and that we would re-invest it in the bonds of the United States as they were offered in the markets of London. We were compelled to comply. (Speech of Senator BOUTWELL, formerly Secretary of the Treasury. Congressional Record, Forty-third Congress, first session, volume 2, part 6, page 23 of Appendix.)

those countries for the payment of large sums, and its value is the standard of all payments, large or small. We would demand of them one-seventh of their entire stock, which now, unlike the period from 1848 to 1865, is not increasing; which, in fact, has a strong tendency to decrease. Who, under these circumstances, will have the hardihood to assert that this problem is a practical one? And who will venture to deny that, if it is solved at all, it can only be solved at a sacrifice more overwhelming than any which has presented itself to the consideration of financiers since the study of money, its functions and its vicissitudes, first became a science?

OUR INTEREST CHARGE ANOTHER OBSTACLE TO RESUMPTION IN GOLD.

On top of the many insuperable difficulties which lie in the way of resumption in gold lies another one which is as great as any of them, and which you would augment by attempting to resume in gold. I allude to the interest on the public debt, which debt is very largely held abroad. This interest now amounts to nearly $100,000,000 per annum. By selling bonds to the extent of $350,000,000, say, at 10 per cent.—for it is perhaps hopeless to expect to do it at a lesser sacrifice—you will add $35,000,000 a year to your gold interest debt, and those $35,000,000 to the portion held abroad. Where are these $35,000,000 to come from? Where are the whole $135,000,000 to come from? Your annual interest charge will alone amount to more than the whole world's product of gold. So far as the portion of it which is paid to bondholders in this country is concerned, it may stay here and be thrown upon the market and purchased by the Government, and so used over and over again, as is the case now. But not so with the portion that goes abroad. You cannot hope to get any of that back without selling the merchandise of the country at lower rates than Europeans will be willing to take for similar merchandise of their own production; and after you shall have drained Europe of one-fifth of its specie, (one-seventh of the whole occidental world's, or one-fifth of Europe's,) prices will fall to a very low point there, and you would have to sell very low to compete. Are your farmers ready to deliver their wheat in Europe at the rate of forty or fifty cents a bushel? Are your manufacturers prepared to sell their cotton prints at two cents a yard?

I warn you, gentlemen, that the attempt will be futile; that the thought is absurd; that the whole theory of endeavoring to destroy one-half of the world's accumulation of the precious metals or of taking part in the attempt, as you would do by attempting to resume in gold alone, is sheer madness.

COMPARATIVE EASE OF RESUMING IN THE DOUBLE STANDARD.

Now let us contrast with this impracticable scheme the ease of resuming specie payments in both the metals, or on the basis of that double standard which the world has used for thirty centuries, and after an endless variety of experiments, without being able to dispense with it or even venturing to trifle with it until Change Alley found that money was to be gained by inducing these experiments to be made in England and on the Continent.

If we resolve to resume in gold and silver, instead of having to draw upon a fund of $2,600,000,000 and an annual supply of $97,500,000, as in the case of gold alone, we would have a fund of $5,700,000,000 and an annual supply of $170,000,000 to draw upon. Not only is the fund more than twice as great, and the supply nearly twice as great, but both the fund and the supply are more widely distributed. Instead of having to draw upon the Occident alone, we would have the whole world to draw upon. Three hundred and fifty millions in gold form one-seventh of the entire stock of that metal; the same sum in both the metals forms less than one-sixteenth of the entire stock. If a draught of one-seventh would occasion a fall in prices of 15 per cent., a draught of less than one-sixteenth would occasion a decline of less than 6 per cent.; and while 15 per cent., during two and a half years—equal to 6 per cent. per annum—would sweep away all and more than all the profits of industry, which, on the whole, do not net over 3 or 4 per cent. per anuum; 6 per cent. in two and a half years, equal to 2⅖ per cent. per annum, would enable us to get back to a sound measure of values without the loss of more than a very small portion of our current industrial profits.

It has been objected to the monetization of silver by the United States that the Comstock lode was vomiting forth a vast surplus of that metal. It is only to be regretted that this is not the fact; for if gentlemen will consult the statistics of the precious metals, they will perceive that since 1852, when the product of gold and silver was $223,000,000, the annual supply has fallen off so that in 1875 it was but $170,000,000, and in 1876 will probably not be more. There is therefore great danger of a dearth of metal, and it would be fortunate if the yield of the Comstock lode were more prolific than it is.

My fear is that this polificity, such as it is, will have reached its maximum within the present year. It is the candid opinion of a man who has devoted nearly thirty years of his life to the practical working and management of gold and silver mines that, so far as the Comstock lode is concerned, and he is entirely familiar with this great silver deposit, we have arrived at the beginning of the end. We now know the probable dimensions and bearings of the ore-producing chimneys, and can very plainly foresee their early exhaustion. Whatever the fact may be with regard to the Comstock lode, and at best it is but matter of opinion, we know that for the present, and so far as we can see ahead, the combined annual product of the two metals throughout the world, as compared with late years, is decreasing.

If now the question be asked, Where will you get your $350,000,000 from upon which to resume? the best answer we can make is: From the world at large; from a stock of $5,700,000,000 in gold and silver coin; from an annual supply of $170,000,000; from Europe, from Mexico and South America, from Asia, and, readiest and best of all, from our own mines.

In buying metal from the rest of the world, as we should have to do had we no great mines of our own, we should have to buy it with the accumulated charges of transport and coinage upon it. In buying it from our own mines we can buy it at its worth upon the spot of production, without transportation, or coinage, or interest, charges upon it.

RESTORATION OF THE DOUBLE STANDARD AND OUR MINING INTERESTS.

And here let me say that the mining interests of this country are represented not, as some persons absurdly suppose, by a few millionaires, but for the most part by a vast number of persons, with no other resources than their intelligent minds and willing hands, who work in the mines for daily bread, and by a scarcely less numerous class of small proprietors, themselves also workingmen, who hold each a few shares in the mines in which they are employed.

The miners of the West are among the most stalwart and spirited yeomen in the world. They are inured to danger and toil, and are brave, strong, intelligent, and self-reliant. In weary processions across alkaline deserts, under equatorial and blistering suns, across mountain and valley, desert and plain, amid the attacks of savages and the fevers of tropical swamps, they marked the path and blazed the trail of western empire. They overcame every hostile condition and builded, on foundations of liberty and justice, three great States in your western border. They conquered the Genius of Sterility in its stronghold, built cities 10,000 feet above the level of the sea and hewed out thrifty workshops twenty-five hundred feet below the surface of the earth. They have organized mining with the exactness and thoroughness of science, and in this respect placed this country in the vanguard of the nations. They have neither avoided your tax-gatherers, sought your subsidies, nor demanded your protective legislation. Nor do they do so now. They only ask that you shall legislate in respect of this great question in view of the history of the world, the Constitution of the country, and the facts that surround you.

While the miners of this country have the highest right both by reason of their birth, their indomitable love of freedom, and the perilous nature of their industry to demand both favor and advantage from the Government, they do not ask for either. But they demand that the Constitution shall be respected and the laws enforced under which they established the great industry which they represent. They know full well that the world's accumulated stock of silver is too vast and the annual dimunition from abrasion and loss too great, to fear any permanent or continued fall in the price of that metal. They know that silver must continue to remain the money of a main part of the world for centuries to come, and that it cannot be dispensed with in any part of the world. They understand too well the fluctuating character of the supplies of gold to fear that this metal will permanently usurp the place of silver in the money of the world or in the money of any considerable part of the world. They perfectly well comprehend the fact that the present slight fall of silver is due to the mad attempt to demonetize it wholly or partly in the countries of the Latin Union and Germany, and are not at all alarmed, either as to the success of this attempt or the future price of silver. They believe as Jefferson said in discussing this very same subject nearly a century ago, that the world's long and constantly-tried experience of silver is a kind of precedent which it is tolerably safe to trust to.

Our miners understand that silver is of constant, steady, and moderate supply; keeping pace with the world's expanding industry and no more. They understand that gold is of inconstant, fluctuating, and either superabundant or inadequate supply; and they have no fears as to the marketability of their silver product.

The question before us is therefore not one of favor or advantage to any industry, even though that industry be largely American and of a nature and importance that should command for it every advantage which legislation could confer.

RESTORATION OF THE DOUBLE STANDARD A NATIONAL AFFAIR.

The question is one of advantage to the nation, to society, to the world at large. It has to deal not only with the industrial interests of to-day, but of all time. It is the question of the measure which shall be applied not only to the labor of the present time, but to the labor of all time past, the labor of all time to come. It proposes to gauge this labor by the measure which has gauged it forever, by the gauge that can measure it most fairly and equitably; by the only gauge that can truly measure it at all; to wit, the double standard of gold and silver. It is opposed to the impracticable project of measuring it by a new and smaller measure; by an inconstant, a fluctuating, a monopolized measure. This is the nature and magnitude of the question before us; a question to the elucidation of which the most intellectual men of all nations and in all times have largely devoted their attention; a question which lies down at the very basis of property, of industry, and of progress; a question which not only affects the wealth of nations, the rank of nations, the welfare of nations, but the very conditions of social existence itself.

It is too large, it is too grand a question to be belittled by any such vulgar and familiar approaches as have, I regret to say, been made toward it by one or two gentlemen who have alluded to the subject in the House of Representatives. Fifty centuries of the world's accumulated wealth are before us to be answered in our deliberations upon this question; fifty centuries of mute, but colossal interrogatories; fifty centuries of trial, of suffering, of toil, of conflict, of ever-perishing and ever-renewing human life, every element of which has contributed, one way or another, to mold the ponderous scale of the precious metals in which the work of the world is measured, and which some madmen would raise their vandal hands to destroy.

These men are chiefly the plutocrats of England and Germany. They want the debts which the nations of the earth owe to them, and which were made in Manchester cottons and Birmingham wares, to be paid not in the base currencies in which they were nominally or really engendered—not even in good money, in gold and silver, which is the money of the world, and has been so for all time—but in that particular metal which they have observed is for the time diminishing in supply and daily becoming more difficult and expensive to purchase. To accomplish this object they are ready to revolutionize the currency of the world; to help demonetize and advise others to help demonetize a stock of over $2,000,000,000 of silver, the precious moiety of the world's standard of values, stored up from the ages, and in its place to set up their own moon-calf of gold, recking not how much suffering the inadequate substitution will occasion.

LET ENGLAND AND GERMANY ADHERE TO THE GOLD STANDARD IF THEY WILL.

The worst punishment which can befall this reckless trifling with the interests of society is that which it itself invites, and which must befall it if the rest of the world refuses to take part in such trifling. By leaving England and Germany to the enjoyment of their self-erected standard of gold, it would result in the end that gold would become cheaper in those countries than elsewhere and prices would rise therein. The co-ordinate use of silver with gold in the rest of the world would tend to drive gold into England and Germany, where it would accumulate and become cheap. Gold would inevitably flow into the countries where it was most in demand, viz, England and Germany, just as now silver flows into Asia. And as silver has accumulated in Asia and enhanced the prices of commodities and services in that portion of the world, so would gold accumulate in England and Germany and enhance the prices of commodities and services there. When this happened, and the plutocart perceived that his fund or his income of gold would purchase less of other men's labor than before, his punishment will have arrived, and richly will he have deserved it.

What will then be his resource, his only resource from the loss of purchasing power? The same resource to which his narrow selfishness has always instinctively led him: that of endeavoring to change the standard to the dearer metal, which will then be silver. He will then have to purchase his silver from us, as he now asks that we shall purchase his gold from him, and we shall be able to fix as high a price upon silver as he would now fix upon gold.

TO ADHERE TO THE GOLD STANDARD IN THE UNITED STATES IS TO GRATUITOUSLY ENHANCE THE MORTGAGES UPON THE NATION.

The true meaning of the sinister advice which we receive from this class is that by adopting the gold standard we should gratuitously and needlessly enhance the value of the mortgages which, in the shape of Government bonds, they hold upon the industries of this country. We are not ashamed of these mortgages. Though they were given for inadequate consideration, yet they were given in a time of peril and uncertainty. We have not the slightest intention to repudiate them. We have already paid upon them in interest vastly more than their entire face, and shall continue to pay this interest promptly and as fast as it comes due. But, while it is neither to our taste (for we are a proud nation and disdain to submit our honor to the scant measure of a doubtful law) nor to our interest to repudiate our obligations, we do not propose to go beyond the limit which our organic laws have set to the standard in which debts shall be paid. We do not propose by resuming specie payments in gold to increase the demand for and purchasing power of gold, and thus enhance the value of the mortgages upon our industry. The law of this country made our standard the bi-metallic one of gold and silver. This is not only the law of the United States; it is the law of nations; the law of ages; the law of the world. We refuse to be led up and down hill, first into one standard and then into the other, at the beck of a short-sighted and selfish class of men, to whom the world owes no debt of gratitude. We refuse to pull up and destroy our ancient moorings. We refuse to part with the ages and with the rest of the world, to which both our present and our future interests unite us; to the rest of Europe, to South America, to Africa, and to Asia. We propose to stand where we have always stood, where the nations stand, where stands the world; we propose to stand on the double standard, the standard of the populations, the standard which the natural fitness and general distribution of the precious metals has indicated to be the only safe one.

GOLD AND SILVER MINING UNPROFITABLE, AND TO INTERRUPT IS TO DESTROY IT.

There is great danger, I might even without exaggeration say, appalling danger, in abandoning the double standard. This arises from the fact that the mining of the precious metals is, on the average, always conducted upon the verge of loss. Therefore the moment you demonetize one metal you temporarily cheapen it, and help to throw it out of production. To stop production is the work of an instant, to re-instate it again is the work of years; and when, as is bound to be the case, the discarded metal is once more in demand, it is the work of long time to obtain sufficient supplies of it again. We know that in the case of the Siberian gold mines over three thousand years elapsed between the time of their abandonment (by the Persians) and re-occupation, (by the Russians;) in the case of the Spanish silver mines fifteen hundred years; in the case of the Mexican silver mines, during the first half of this century, some twenty or thirty years. It matters not what the cause of these several abandonments was; whether it was wars, or the insufficiency of known mechanical resources, or trifling with the standard. It is sufficient if we know that no matter what cause put an end to the production of the metals, the most urgent after demand for the abandoned metal was inadequate for a long period to stimulate its reproduction.

When mines are abandoned water flows into them and fills them up; earth, stones, and other débris clog and choke them, and frequently bury them up out of sight and even remembrance; the supporting timbers of galleries rot away, the galleries themselves fall in; and these circumstances often render it practically impossible to reopen the mines. And you cannot find silver and gold mines at pleasure, as you can wheat fields or suitable sites for mills or manufactories. The whole surface of Central America and California and the Sierra Nevadas has been ripped and torn up in the search for the precious metals. The valleys have been explored, the streams turned from their natural courses, the hills washed away with artificial hydraulic power, the mountains honey-combed with shafts and tunnels. Not a district has been left undisturbed. The Pacific coast of America has been ransacked in modern days even more thoroughly than were Northern Africa and the Spanish Peninsula in ancient days; for this ransacking has been done by the hardiest among the foremost races of the world.

But in the exploration of natural resources man has no pity for nature or posterity. He exploits the land in the pursuit of agriculture as our Virginian forefathers did the noble valleys of the Atlantic coast in the cultivation of tobacco; as the planters of the cotton States did the table lands of Georgia and Alabama and the bottom lands of Mississippi in the cultivation of cotton; as the western men are now doing the richly-wooded lands of their country, for the sake of the timber which stands upon them. In a similar way have the Pacific States been exploited for mines.

There are probably but few of even measuredly rich deposits left to discover. The most that we can henceforth do is to exhaust what have been found. There are no more great bonanzas in the Sierra Nevadas; probably there are not elsewhere in the world deposits of ore of such magnitude. I do not mean deposits found; I mean found or unfound.*

Already many of the less profitable silver mines of the world have ceased to be worked. The slight and temporary fall in silver, occasioned by the partial demonetization of the metal in Europe, its prospective practical demonetization in this country, and the hitherto abundant yield of the bonanza mines, have been sufficient to throw many of the poorer paying silver mines of the world out of production.†

By resuming specie payments in this country upon the basis of the fatally erroneous law of 1873 we would render practical and immediate that demonetization of silver which, as yet, while paper notes form nearly the entire circulating media of the country, is but prospective, and therefore not practical. More than this: the example of so great a country as the United States would be apt to lead other countries into the same erroneous way, and silver would soon become entirely demonetized in the occidental world.

Did gold promise to continue in very abundant supply the ruinous consequences of this error might to some extent be mitigated; though under no circumstances could they be entirely mitigated, owing to the always fluctuating nature of gold supplies. But even this degree of mitigation is not to be expected. Gold is so far from being produced throughout the world in great abundance, that the present annual product is dangerously insufficient, and even this supply is declining. We are invited to abandon a good ship and enter a sinking one; to desert solid ground and stand upon a quagmire; to renounce a system which has stood the test of centuries, and adopt one which has been tried but by a single nation, England, and that only since

* It must always be borne in mind that the order of progress in mining is from the poor to the richer mines, just as the venerable and celebrated Henry C. Carey has shown it to be in agriculture. This order of progress in mining results from the fact that men always seek first the most easily accessible sources of production. When the outcroppings of a great mine are discovered it is rare that exploration proceeds farther than a few hundred feet beneath the surface where the ore lies in widespread lenticular masses. Then comes the "barren zone," which is seldom explored at first. The richer but fewer deposits of ore below—the great bonanzas—concentrate in perpendicular veins far apart, and are never reached except at great outlay and expense and as the result of organized and scientific mining. Whoever is fortunate enough to strike one of these bonanzas makes great profit from it, while others sustain loss, and on the whole the product of metal is diminished.

†This fact is not only deducible from the statistics of the world's annual yield of silver given above, but it has come under my own observation that many of the low-grade ore deposits, even of the Comstock lode, have either been abandoned or soon will be abandoned. These low-grade mines, though fully provided with shafts, adits, railways, engines, mills, &c., which were profitably employed while silver bore a higher price in market, are being abandoned, the improvements put upon them are lost, and great numbers of miners have been thrown out of employment.

1816, or rather from 1824 to 1848, and at the expense of retarding and crushing the prosperity of her industrial classes during the period of such trial.

I have said that the mining of the precious metals is always conducted, on the average, upon the verge of loss. This statement is supported by all writers upon the subject.

The ready marketability of the precious metals, a fact which renders the product of the miner's labor available on the instant, forms a strong inducement to their production, and the competition is so great as to push the production to the verge of loss, perhaps even beyond it. The moment you destroy or impair this marketability of the precious metals, as you do by demonetizing silver, you diminish the production. You could not do the same with wheat or other commodities. Upon these the laws confer no privilege of marketability; they are not legal tender for the payment of debts. Their production therefore never ventures beyond the area of profit—I mean, of course, profit on the average. Present and future demand alone regulate their supply. It is not the same with the precious metals. Their supply has reference to the past as well as the present and future. There is a stock of these metals in the world which has come down to us from the earliest ages of history, and every additional ounce produced affects this stock. There is no similar stock of any other commodities. Even arable lands and stone edifices fail to escape the ravages of time. With metal produced to-day you can discharge obligations for commodities and services sold or rendered years ago. You cannot do the same with wheat or any other commodities. Why? Because the laws make the precious metals legal tenders for the payment of debt. You cannot force a creditor to receive payment in wheat or lands, but you can force him to accept payment in money. Hence the superior marketability of the precious metals—a marketability which is due, in the first place, to their intrinsic qualities of superior homogeneity, divisibility, re-unitability, portability, &c., and in the second place to the law.

If you impair this marketability by demonetizing one of the metals, you reduce it to the same rank as any other commodity, to the rank of commodities which are produced only when such production is profitable. You will not destroy the production of the demonetized metal. Far from it. The precious metals are too valuable for a great variety of industrial purposes. They will still continue to be produced, only the quantity produced will be less; and after the stock of demonetized coin shall be absorbed irretrievably into the arts, the price will be higher. Why? Because the production of the metal will only be continued where it proves profitable. The supply will become regulated by the future and present demand. Rather than push the production of the metal to the verge of loss, men will prefer to engage in some other occupation. The price will not only rise on account of diminished production, but also, and chiefly, because the producer will demand in it a profit. Now he does not; he cannot. The competition is too keen to admit of profit. The production of the precious metals is, perhaps, even on the whole, a constant source of loss. Still, men will engage in it, not only on account of the occasional fortunate and unexpected prizes which it yields, and which is the same in diamond-washing and pearl-fishing, but also because of the superior, the instant, marketability of the product. This instant marketability is due in part to the law. It enables the gold or silver miner to realize the product of his labor at once. It induces him to make the most of that labor; it leads him to overwork; and eventually it destroys him. The valleys of El Dorado are strewn with the wrecks of human lives, wrecks which lie bleaching in the sun to warn away the newcomer. But they warn in vain; and the production of the precious metals continues in spite of loss, and sickness, and premature death. Conducted at this great sacrifice, conducted thus always upon the verge of loss, and perhaps beyond it, the moment the production of the precious metals, or either of them, is discouraged by demonetization, from that moment it sinks to the rank of all other commodities and demands a profit in its price. Suppose you demonetize silver, and thus limit its production to the extent of the demand for it in the arts; and when the stock of silver coin becomes melted up and absorbed, as it soon would be, you discover, as you will be sure to discover, that you have made a mistake: at what price is it imagined can this silver be repurchased? At 15 for 1 of gold? At 12 for 1, 10 for 1, 8 for 1? I fancy not. Gold was demonetized in Japan, and not more than twenty-five years ago it could be purchased in that country at four times the price of silver. Later on they remonetized gold in that country, and were obliged to purchase it at the rate of 1 for 15½ of silver.

Had Japan not been a country at that period very backward in civilization, divided into great feudatories, whose tributes and rents were payable in grain, the difficulty of again monetizing the discarded metal would have been insuperable. Even as it was, the measure was accompanied by a violent social revolution and the entire destruction of the existing system of government.

Are you prepared to hazard an experiment of this character? For the sake of pursuing the idle, mischievous theory called monometalism, urged by an interested, selfish, and short-sighted class of men in England and Germany, and indorsed by certain flippant and conceited writers on political economy, are you ready to invoke the tremendous risk of banishing a metal which constitutes one-half of the world's stock of money, and which, if once banished, can never be recalled without the propitiating sacrifice of all vested interests, of all existing relations of property, of all the institutions of society? The great institution of Japan was the feudal system, and the moment she opened herself to the influence upon prices and relations which was exercised by the precious metal which she had previously forbidden to compose part of her standard, that great institution was shivered to atoms. The great institution of the United States is popular suffrage. Are we prepared, by abandoning the olden way, the double standard, and exposing ourselves to the social revolution which, after abandoning that standard, would inevitably accompany its re-establishment—are we prepared to see our great institution shivered to atoms, too?

It cannot be doubted that resumption in specie and limitation to the single gold standard would, in time, produce these alarming results. But we are not a people who would open the door to such consequences. We would endeavor to obviate them. And the only way to obviate them would be to go on with irredeemable paper, with violent aberrations of prices, with bankruptcies, and with the pandemonium of the stock exchange.

THE DOUBLE STANDARD WILL HAVE TO BE RESTORED.

There are, perhaps, those who do not perceive any reason which would compel a nation to return to the double standard after having abandoned it. These reasons have already been given, and I regard them as unanswerable. They are:

1. The insufficient stock of gold in the world to effect its exchanges without a great, rapid, and overwhelming fall in prices to one-half of present prices in specie.

2. The insufficient annual supplies of gold; there not being more than enough produced to supply the arts and maintain the stock of coin.

3. The fluctuating nature of gold production, which would give rise to violent aberrations of prices from time to time.

4. The monopolization of the supply of gold, which now is chiefly from countries covered by the British flag.

And many other reasons, which these few will serve, perhaps, to recall.

When the tremendous decline and violent fluctuations in prices which must accompany a single gold standard have worked as much ruin and destruction of existing relations as the nation will bear, the revulsion in favor of again monetizing silver will be too great to resist; yet remonetization may have to be effected in the face of difficulties and dangers quite as great as those from which escape is sought to be made. It would be Charybdis on one side; Scylla on the other; mischief, danger, ruin, on both.

At the bottom of this dangerous effort to abolish the double standard of this country lie nothing but selfishness and injustice—the selfishness of a class who desire to receive payment for debts and obligations in a metal which, for the moment, and at the mean natural relation, is a few per cent. dearer than the other.

SOCIETY CAN ONLY BE RULED WITH EQUITY—THE GOLD STANDARD INEQUITABLE.

Opposed to the consummation of this injustice, not only does all nature array herself, but so also do the unconscious instincts of humanity, the occult working of social institutions. Consummate it if you can, and you will have poverty, distress, commotion, and perhaps revolution. Having consummated it, try then to undo it, and you will find the task beset with great difficulties.

Neglected dislocations of the human frame are difficult to remedy; because the wrenched member finds for itself a new socket. The dislocation of the social fabric which threatens to result from the effects of the act of 1873 may yet be averted by the timely measure of restoring the double standard before we attempt to resume specie payments.

You cannot expect to take a nation by the throat, hold it down, squeeze the last drop of substance out of it, no matter in what sacred name, whether of honor or justice, without running the risk of being taken by the throat yourselves. No matter how cunning the injustice is, it is sure to be found out when it comes to work, and sure to be avenged when it is found out. All the interests of society, even the safety and permanence of vested interests, demand the exercise of equity in the affairs of government; and I tell those who represent such interests that, in the long run, they will best consult their advantage in being just at the outset. They got the people of this country by the throat in the ambiguously worded act of February 25, 1862. They pinned the people down by the coin-paying act of March 18, 1869, and now they would squeeze the last drop of substance out of them by the single gold standard act of February, 1873, which they propose to carry into effect by the resumption act (a very proper act of itself) of 1875. And now my advice to them is, to stop and undo the worst part of their work, by repealing so much of the act of 1873 as prevents the silver dollar from being tendered for the payment of debts. The people have paid their full ransom to Brennus; let him not attempt to overload the scale with the weight of his sword, or they may take it up and use it.

OUR COMMERCE WITH ASIA DEPENDS UPON THE DOUBLE STANDARD.

Turning from these considerations of danger in abolishing the double standard to those of profit and advantage in retaining it, permit me to call your attention to the influence which this subject is destined to exercise upon our commerce.

It has been the interest in all ages of certain classes to deny that commerce is beneficial, and that agriculture and manufactures or mining are alone entitled to political consideration; but such a position is utterly untenable. Production cannot advance beyond the rudest limits without commerce, whose essential function it is to exchange that which is not needed for that which is, or to remove commodities from places where they are not wanted to places where they are. In fact, commerce is inseparably bound up with production; there is no actual dividing line between them. The carriage of seeds to be planted, of textiles to be woven, of ores to be smelted, and the removal of the results to places of deposit or consumption, are all commercial functions. Foreign commerce is in like manner inseparable from production, and forms part of it. The implements, materials, agencies, and even remoter sources of national productive industries, depend upon foreign commerce, and would perish without it. Commerce has exercised a potent influence in propagating and extending religion. In its train have ever followed opulence, national strength, political liberty, letters, arts, and sciences. Its advance has always been marked by a general progress in the condition of men; its retardation by a corresponding retrogradation; and its discouragement or decline by poverty, national dissolution, tyranny, slavery, ignorance, and crime. It has destroyed the barriers of distance, alienage, race, religion, and caste. It has equalized the conditions of life in various parts of the earth, and tended to promote that homogeneousness of the human race which the profoundest thinkers have maintained is an indispensable preliminary to its highest development.

Asia Major, with the products of its varied climes and its teeming populations of Tartary, Persia, India, China, and Japan, has in all ages been the objective point of commerce, and the nations who found the best route to it, have in turn all held the scepter of commercial greatness. The Phœnicians opened a route (not the ancient canal of Necho) to Asia by way of Suez; the Hebrews, overland, by way of Palmyra or Tadmor. The Suez route was re-opened by the Greeks, and successively kept open by the Romans and Venetians. The Genoese penetrated to Asia by way of the Euxine; the Portuguese led the way by the Cape of Good Hope; the Hansards opened an overland route by way of Novgorod; Spain sought for a path westward and stumbled upon a new world; England discovered a route by way of Cape Horn, and America has paved with iron rails first one route by way of Panama, and afterward another via San Francisco. France has acquired both glory and profit by re-opening the long-abandoned Suez canal of the Egyptians; England has re-awakened the commercial hopes of her statesmen by purchasing a large interest in this canal; the former prosperity of Italy has been revived through her proximity to it; and Russia is exciting the jealousy of England by extending her her borders and military posts to the northwestern limits of India.

The commercial diadem of the world, the commerce with Asia, lies within easier grasp of the United States than that of any other nation of the Occident. We not only possess the two shortest or best routes to the Orient, those by way of Panama and San Francisco; we are not only in fact the next-door neighbor to Japan and China, stretching as our possessions do within sight of Kamtchatka and holding almost the entire shores of the Northeastern Pacific; we are not only at peace with Asia and regarded by her with more friendliness than any other nation, we possess that commercial object for which Asia is as anxious to seek the Occident as we are the Orient, for tea, spices, and silk. We are at the present moment the largest producers of silver in the world, and silver is the main, almost the only, object of foreign commerce to Asiatics. Even yet, although Europe has for centuries been pouring what silver she could spare into Asia; although all of Atahualpa's treasures and almost all the silver product of Mexico has found its way to Asia Major, the price of agricultural labor in that country is scarcely more than a penny a day, and the taxes levied by its monarchs are paid in rice. These facts prove the necessity and demand for silver in Asia and the comparative scarcity of it even at the present day.

I have already stated that it is estimated that Asia possessed a stock of coin, almost entirely silver, amounting at the beginning of the present century to about $700,000,000; in 1829 to about $800,000,000; in 1848 to about $900,000,000; and in 1872 to about $2,100,000,000. With a population stationary, and of, say, 700,000,000, this amounted to $1 per capita at the beginning of the century and $3 per capita at the present time. Merely to keep this stock of coin preserved from the effects of abrasion and loss, Asia requires some $30,000,000 in silver every year. To increase it, she requires more.

Suppose we persist in demonetizing our silver, suppose we lessen the demand for its use in the Occident, and help to throw upon the markets of the world a stock of silver which we must replace with a stock of gold, is it not patent to the humblest understanding that we would lower its value and be obliged to sell it to Asia, who, having then no competitor for its possession, would be likely to obtain it at a very low price in her commodities? Is it not plain that under such circumstances and for a long series of years to come, our annual product of silver would follow the way of our rejected stock, and fall into the hands of the Orient at a degraded price? Should we not have to pay more, much more, than now, for the teas, spices, silk, rice, textiles, and other raw materials which we obtain from that quarter of the world? And were we obliged eventually, as I believe we should be, to buy back this thoughtlessly demonetized and abandoned stock of silver, should we not have to purchase it at a very high price, seeing that meanwhile all prices in Asia would have become greatly enhanced?

Hence, if we let slip the present favorable opportunity to purchase silver for the purposes of resumption, we may find it very difficult to do so in future. When occidental silver once gets to the Orient it rarely returns, and it never will return in any considerable quantity until the scale of prices in the two great divisions of the globe become more nearly equalized than they are at present. This may be centuries hence.

Nature has furnished us with such advantages for seeking the commerce of Asia—advantages of route, of amicable relations, of an ample supply of silver—that if we do not senselessly throw them away, we are almost certain to monopolize the Asiatic trade and the vast profits that accrue from its pursuit. Asia stands in urgent need of silver; that silver we possess, and she must now come to us for it and purchase it from us; and as we can afford to sell it to her cheaper than Europe can, by the difference of carriage, insurance, interest, commissions, &c., we are almost certain to secure the monopoly of her trade, and with it a market not only for our silver, but also for our coal and iron, our wheat and Indian corn, our manufactures, our literary and our art products. And, moreover, we shall inevitably become what England is now, the occidental world's emporium for Japanese, Chinese, and East India products. Instead of being obliged to go to Europe for these products as now, Europe will be obliged to come to us for them.

Was it mere forgetfulness or a perversion of correct views which induced some of our public men to entertain even for an instant the notion of abolishing the double standard and degrading our silver product, or was it the sinister advice of nations whose far-seeing commercial policies detected the advantages which we possessed over them in the future rivalry for the rich trade of the Orient?

Already has the partial demonetization of silver in Europe had the effect of helping to triple the stock of silver which Asia possessed at the opening of this century, and yet so small is the stock of coin among Asiatic nations that, if silver is not entirely demonetized in the Occident, there is not the slightest chance that the surplus silver of the world for centuries to come will suffice for the wants of Asia. Even with a partial demonetization of silver in the Occident, Asia will be able to absorb such portion of the surplus current supplies of the world as can be spared, as well as a large portion of the stock, without being saturated with silver.

SILVER CANNOT BECOME CHEAPER THAN IT IS AT PRESENT.

To those who indulge the insane fear that the late rise of gold or decline of silver caused by the European demonetization, will continue, it is only necessary to say that the thing is impossible. This decline cannot continue after the discarded stock of silver is worked off, and when the cost of its production again becomes the principal factor of its price. And should this country wisely conclude at this favorable juncture of affairs to remonetize silver, the time necessary for it to advance to its former relation with gold would be comparatively short.

Specie is too scarce in China and India, prices are too low, and the mere maintenance of their present stock of coin demands a supply of many millions a year. I have seen the Humboldt, Truckee, and other rivers which flow between the eastern slope of the Sierra Nevadas and the western walls of the Wahsatch, and which, near their sources in the mountains flow in great volume, sink all at once into the sands of the desert and disappear from view forever. An attempt to saturate Asia with silver would, to my mind, be as successful as one to saturate the Great American Desert with the waters of these rivers.

But let us suppose, for the sake of argument, that Asia cannot take the surplus of silver of the Occidental world and demands gold instead for the balance of her foreign trade. Would this not make gold so scarce as to force us of the Occident to keep our own stock of silver which we now would banish? And if it would force us to keep it then, why should we not keep it now? Why change and disturb prices only to come to the same result at last? Why place ourselves in a dilemma, either horn of which is dangerous? Why attempt to banish silver to Asia or force her to send it back to us, which she would do in case the above supposition is well founded; a supposition not borne out either by philosophy or fact.

Banish silver from the western world, and you will help to banish progress with it; you will unwittingly and powerfully assist the growth and development of China and India at the expense of our own progress, and precipitate a monetary revolution, whose overwhelming and widespread effects no man can fully estimate or foresee.

THE MEXICAN AND CENTRAL AND SOUTH AMERICAN TRADES.

Similar considerations, scarcely less important, demand that our double standard shall be restored in respect of our commercial and other relations with Mexico and Central and South America. All these countries except Brazil and Chili have either the single silver standard or the double standard of gold and silver. Omitting Brazil and Chili, these countries contain an aggregate population of more than 25,000,000 souls. This vast population is at the present time entering upon an unprecedented era of activity and progress. Their trade with the manufacturing states of the world belongs naturally and by reason of proximity to the United States. Shall we run the risk of losing it by unnecessarily depressing the quotations of South American products in our market, as we should do if we limited ourselves to a single gold standard? Shall we offer to them for their productions a stinted measure of the metal which they do not want, instead of a fair measure of the metal which they do want? Shall we force them to manufacture for themselves, rather than purchase the fabrics they need from us in exchange for their valuable raw materials?

THE CRESCENDO AND DIMINUENDO THEORY OF THE ACTION OF MONEY.

I now come to those considerations in reference to this subject which have ever commanded the most serious attention of statesmen and publicists. I allude to the effects of increasing or diminishing money upon the social, moral, and religious welfare of peoples.

I have already shown how profoundly the diminution of coin in the occidental world, from the period of the Roman empire to that of the discovery or re-introduction of bills of exchange, affected the welfare of Europe. But as, perhaps, it may be disputed that the Dark Ages, and the awful social wretchedness which characterized them, are attributable wholly, or even in great part, to the diminution of money which occurred during that period, I have deemed it best to bring into view more recent and familiar eras of similar character, eras which pertain, not like the Dark Ages, to a remote period and an entire continent, but to later times and particular countries, wherein the relation of the mutations of the currency to the welfare of the people is so close as to admit of little doubt concerning the influence and action of one upon the other.

I have already stated that, from the nature and functions of money, it made no difference to the welfare or convenience of society whether the total sum of money was large or small, provided that it was neither so large nor so small that the substance of which it was made, the precious metals, could practically be coined into pieces of convenient size for transportation or handling and for the transactions of the ordinary business of life.

While this is quite true, it nevertheless does make a most important difference whether the sum of money be increasing or diminishing. This difference, and the social phenomena connected with it, has been very fitly termed by the author of the essay on currency in the original edition of Johnson's Cyclopedia, the crescendo and diminuendo theory, a phrase derived from the terminology of music, an art whose terms are essentially expressive of movement in time.

SOCIAL EFFECTS OF INCREASING AND DIMINISHING MONEY.

Crescendo or increasing, and diminuendo or diminishing, are terms which have been deemed convenient for the expression of the movement of the stock of money in time. While this stock is increasing, prices rise; exchange or commerce is stimulated; new enterprises are set afoot; the products of agriculture, manufactures, and mining are increased; the commercial and industrial classes find abundant employment and earn remunerative profits and wages; bankruptcies and suicides rarely happen; marriages are promoted; the newly born survive in greater numbers; population increases in quicker ratio; letters, the fine arts, and the sciences make most rapid strides; education, intelligence, morality, and the observance of religion are promoted; and the general happiness of mankind becomes greatly enhanced.

What is the cause of all this industrial activity and social progress? What action or influence of the increasing stock of money lies at the bottom of it? Simply this: that an increasing stock of money tends to distribute wealth, and it is the distribution of wealth which effects these wonderful results. "O! it is agrarianism or communism that you propose. You would go on increasing artificially and by legislation (for it is only artificially that it can be done) the sum of the currency forever, in order that wealth may be continually distributed, industrial activity stimulated, and social progress promoted."

I propose nothing of the sort. I have depicted the consequences of an increasing stock of money, not in order to advocate an artificially increasing currency, but as preliminary to depicting the consequences of an artificially diminishing currency, and with the view of warning the country against submitting to any such diminution. I do not propose to rob the capitalist; but neither do I propose to permit the capitalist to rob society.

While the stock of money is diminishing prices fall; commerce is depressed; enterprises are abandoned or neglected; industry is paralyzed; its products are diminished; its supporters defeated in their just expectations or thrown out of employment; bankruptcies and forced sales are increased; marriages are discouraged; suicides become common; the newly born perish; the increase of population is retarded; the cultivation of letters is abandoned; the arts and sciences fall into decay; education, intelligence, morality, and religion are neglected; crime increases; and general misery prevails.

What is the connection between the stock of money and these appalling social phenomena? Simply this: that a diminishing stock of money tends to concentrate wealth, and the concentration of wealth is a cause sufficient to promote all of these evils. "Would you, then, legislate with the view of preventing the stock of money from being decreased? Would you repeat those measures of medieval coercion which distinguished the reign of Henry V, who forbade gold or silver to be used in the arts in order to prevent the stock of money from being diminished?"

I would do nothing of the sort. I propose neither to increase the currency by artificial means nor to diminish it by coercion. I propose to follow and advocate that policy which little minds never perceive the advantage of pursuing, but which the great men of the world have recognized to be the only safe one in commercial affairs. I propose to let things alone. Laissez faire in money is as important to the well being of the world as laissez faire in corn.

Is it not time, Mr. President, that we republicans, we the exemplars of civil freedom to the world, should abandon and renounce this mischievous policy of meddling with the affairs of commerce; this policy which has been handed down to us by the tyrants and marplots of the world—the men with bloody hands and the men with ruthless purposes? Is it not time that we practiced freedom as well as preached it?

For five thousand years has the world been amassing a stock of gold and silver money wherewith to conduct its commerce, and yet in one instant and by a single blow, would our irreverent and mischievous hands annihilate one-half of this stock. The act of 1873 essentially impaired the character of silver as money in this country—a character which it did not owe to legislation, but to fitness and immemorial usage. Could the act have affected other countries as it did this one alone, it would have demonetized silver throughout the world.

What is the principal effect of demonetizing silver? It reduces the entire stock of money by one-half. This effect may be mitigated by permitting a small sum of debased silver coins, as tokens, to pass current for petty payments in each country, but even then its chief harm remains. The money of the world commences to diminish, prices fall, wealth becomes centralized and concentrated in a few hands, property is sacrificed to pay debts incurred before the diminution, bankruptcies ensue, industry is petrified, want and wretchedness stare the commercial classes in the face, and to escape from these disasters they take refuge in dishonesty and immorality, and in the end wind up with crime and destruction.

The evidence of these deplorable consequences of arbitrarily diminishing the stock of money is to be found in the social statistics of all countries. It is only for the sake of brevity that I content myself with adducing a portion of those only of this country. And here let me remark to the possible objection that the statistics of the currency of the United States include paper promises, that the principle is the same, whether the currency is of money alone or money and paper combined. So long as the promises are deemeed to be good enough to pass current as money their effect upon prices is precisely the same. It does not follow from this, as some theorists erroneously maintain, that paper promises would pass current as money without a money basis. On the contrary, repeated experience proves that they will not. Nor does it follow that, because a diminishing stock of money or mixed currency produces the evils alluded to that these evils can be avoided by recourse to a forced currency of paper. They can only be avoided by letting the currency alone, and the sooner we learn and appreciate the importance of this great truth the better will it be for our country and the world at large.

[For the tables alluded to in the text, see Appendix.]

THE WORLD'S STOCK OF THE PRECIOUS METALS THE GREAT CONSERVATOR OF ITS CIVILIZATION.

It will perhaps be remarked that no statistical evidence has been offered to support the assertion made with regard to the effect of the movement of the currency upon letters, the arts, &c. The reason for this is that, while statistics have made such progress that they now fully cover certain features of civilization, and concerning these features afford most thorough and convincing testimony, they do not yet fully cover certain other features, such as those omitted from the illustrations adduced. Within the boundaries to which thus far its conquests have been confined the use of statistics is of the highest importance to the student, the publicist, and the legislator. Beyond that, such use is almost valueless, and want of discrimination as to where to stop in the employment of statistical evidence can have but the single result of bringing statistics into undeserved disrepute.

We know a priori that the gradual diffusion of wealth means also the gradual diffusion of the work of life, wherein no feudal tyrant or merciless plutocrat can lord it over the masses of a community bound to exacting toil or helpless slavery. It is only during this tendency (mark, I say tendency) toward a distribution of rewards according to effort that letters and the arts can flourish. At all other periods, if they make any progress at all, it is confined to a few favored persons, and soon perishes; for the acquisition of letters must be the result of leisure and exemption from toil, and the community that is bound to continual labor can never hope to enjoy the fruits of this divine art.

Therefore such an increment of the stock of money as would work out a gradual diffusion of wealth, and with it the more equitable distribution of work and leisure than would result from a stock of money which was decreasing or stationary while population advanced, could not fail, and it has never yet failed, to promote the progress of letters, the arts and sciences, morality and religion. Nor could any greater increment occur than one which would be sufficient to induce a gradual diffusion of wealth; that is, so long as the world retained its present vast stock of the precious metals. Estimating this stock at $5,700,000,000, it requires $85,500,000 a year to keep it from waste by abrasion and loss, and the annual supply of the precious metals or so much of them as is available for coin has rarely been so much in excess of this sum as to be sufficient to produce more than a very inconsiderable and gradual diffusion of wealth. If the increase by population be considered, the process would be extremely slow.

Viewed from this point, it will be seen that the world's stock of the precious metals has really been the great conservator of civilization. It is this stock and its slow increment since the sixteenth century which has kept prices, on the whole, steady and slowly rising; just as it was the decrement of this stock which threatened the extinction of civilization during the Middle Ages. It was the little of it that survived throughout that memorable era which prevented the total subversion of society, and with it letters and the arts, in a word, civilization, and it was in the country that preserved the greatest stock of it during that period that civilization held aloft its highest torch.*

THE RESERVOIR OF THE PRECIOUS METALS.

Lest this phrase, "the great conservator of civilization," sounds too grand, let it be supposed that at the present time no reservoir of the precious metals existed, or that the entire stock of money was destroyed in an instant. Setting aside the incalculably calamitous consequences of such a catastrophe, is it not plain that the annual supply of the metals, now amounting to about one hundred millions, would assume a new importance in the distribution of wealth and each individual's share of production? Assuming that the precious metals would continue to be used for money, because no other materials would answer the purpose so well, would not these supplies as fast as they came forward affect the prices of commodities and services so enormously and suddenly as virtually to place society at the mercy of the few persons who might be able to control or anticipate such supplies?

In the immensity of the world's stock of the precious metals, which forms a measure of value of such vast proportions that no vicissitudes of production can sensibly affect it, society therefore possesses a guarantee for the conservation of all those institutions upon which civilization depends; upon diffusion of wealth, adequate reward for effort, due proportion of production, liberty, leisure, letters, the arts, morality, and religion. And yet it is one-half of this precious stock that madmen would now destroy or degrade to the level of gewgaws and bangles.

In the face of the significant facts which we have found to correspond with the movement of the currency, whether in the same is counted only the real money in circulation, or the real money combined with the credits based upon it, (if due allowance be made for their differing ratios of activity,) I ask you, are you prepared to confirm and ratify the thoughtless act of 1873, which demonetized silver as a legal tender in the United States, or will you restore that metal to its rightful position in the money of the country?

Have the industrial, the commercial, the active, the progressive, the working classes of the country no rights that legislation is bound to respect? What authority has this Chamber to shorten or curtail the standard by which their labor is to be measured? What justice, what wisdom, what safety is there in assisting to destroy the efficiency of one-half of the world's stock of specie, one-half of that measure of value which has come down to us sanctified by fifty centuries of toil, of usage, of experiment, of universal approval? Can you look on with unconcern and permit the entire relations of society to be disturbed in the fancied interests of that small class of persons who in every country are wealthy enough to monopolize the possession of its measure of value—which, at best, is limited, and barely sufficient to keep pace with the increase of population and commerce?

Such is the pressing scarcity of money, both of gold and silver, throughout the world, that every conceivable form of substitute for it, both safe and unsafe, is in use to eke it out. Every country of the world is using credit in some form as a temporary substitute for money; yet you would arbitrarily demonetize one-half the stock of money, under the erroneous impression, either that one metal is a measure of value less fluctuating than two, or the equally erroneous one that the option of two metals to pay with is derogatory to the rights of creditors which accrued while that option was open.†

CONSTITUTIONAL AND LEGAL ASPECTS OF THE CASE.

I shall now endeavor to show that under our Constitution both the precious metals are made legal tender for the payment of debts.

I hold—

First. That the word "money," as used in article 1, section 8, of the "Constitution of the United States," means both the precious metals, silver and gold, and, by reason of the context, cannot mean either paper promises or one of the metals only.

Second. That the power to "regulate the value thereof" was necessary in order to render this meaning effective, and that, had "money" meant one metal instead of two the power to regulate value would have been supererogatory, abortive, and absurd.

Third. That no other construction of the phrase "to regulate the value thereof" is admissible, because even in theory law cannot regulate values, unless the things whose values are to be regulated are specified, and practically, unless also the law-power or Government possesses control of the supply or demand of the things to be valued. As all things cannot be specified, and as Government only has control of the supply of gold and silver coins, it follows that the value of these commodities, one to the other, is all that can be "regulated" under the Constitution, and that this regulation constitutes both silver and gold as money and legal tender.

I. Article 1, section 8, of the Constitution for the United States provides that—

> The Congress shall have power * * * to coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin, and fix the standards of weights and measures.

What is money? Gold and silver coined. This was the only meaning attached to "money" when the Constitution was framed, and it is the only proper meaning. In late days the word money has been used to mean any circulating media, whether gold or silver coined, or promises to pay. That such is not the meaning of the term as employed in the Constitution is evident from the phrase "to coin," which prefixes the word "money." Promises to pay cannot be coined, nor were any other metals than gold and silver used as money in this country or any other at the period of the Constitution: therefore, money, as mentioned in that instrument, meant gold and silver coined, and could not have meant anything else.

Nor could it have meant either one of these metals separately, because of the affix, "and regulate the value thereof."

What is value? The relation between two services or commodities exchanged, or, to be more precise, the quantitative relation in services or commodities between two services or commodities exchanged. I have already explained the meaning of this term. (See page 14, ante.) It must not be compared with worth, utility, or desirability, which are intrinsic qualities or characteristics without quantity; whilst value is an extrinsic and a quantitative characteristic which is only determinable in exchange. Worth, utility, and desirability may reside in an object without reference to exchange. Value without exchange is impossible. Law cannot regulate the worth, utility, or desirability of a commodity. Why? Because these are intrinsic and incommensurable characteristics, and are therefore not susceptible of regulation. Law can regulate value, because value is an extrinsic characteristic, determinable by exchange. But law cannot regulate the value of a commodity generally, and as to all things, unless it specifies separately the quantity of all things which shall be interchangeable. This is not only palpably impracticable, but, even were it practicable, is clearly inadmissible as a construction of the constitutional phraseology. An attempt to regulate the value of money as to all things would produce the utmost injustice and confusion in industrial affairs, and entirely subvert the Constitution and the objects for which it was established. The power to regulate the value of money was therefore confined to gold and silver only. It could not have been with reference to other things.

II. Even with reference to gold and silver, the power to regulate the value of money would have been supererogatory unless money meant both gold and silver, and value the relation between them; for value in respect to an isolated thing is inconceivable and impossible, value being a relation and not an intrinsic quality. If "money," according to the Constitution, meant both gold and silver, the power to regulate the value thereof was a necessary incident to that of coinage, and this view affords the only explanation of the employment of the phrase "to regulate the value thereof" in the Constitution. Otherwise the phrase was powerless, meaningless, and absurd. To coin money and regulate the value thereof are, therefore, inseparable powers, and although Congress is not required to exercise them, but is merely permitted to do so, yet, if exercised, they can only be exercised together, and the exercise of one power without the other is unconstitutional. Therefore, so long as any coins of the United States are in existence the suppression of the silver dollar by the act of 1873 is void.*

III. Practically, the Government has control of only two commodities among all those known to the world: these two are gold and silver coins. The Constitution gives to the Government exclusively the power to coin money, and this power gives it practical control over the supply of gold and silver coins. It may be held, indeed, that the same power gives it also control over any substances which it may choose to employ as money; for example, copper, tobacco, musket-balls, wampum-peag, paper promises, &c. But the impracticability of regulating the value of substances of such heterogeneous composition and limitless supply merely serves to show the absurdity of attempting to extend the meaning of the phrase "money" beyond that which was clearly attached to it at the time of the Constitution, namely, gold and silver coins. These various substances, and many others, had all been employed in this country as substitutes for money, or as tokens, previous to the Constitution, and some of them were in wide use at the time of that instrument. But it is quite clear that none of them were referred to in the phrase "money," and that gold and silver alone were meant.

* Professor John W. Draper, in his recent work entitled The Conflict between Science and Religion, states that Almansor, the Moorish King of Granada, then the foremost country of Europe in civilization, population, and wealth, left at his death a treasure of gold and silver amounting in value to $150,000,000. How much of this sum consisted of coin is not stated.

† The main argument used in favor of the gold valuation is this: "If a creditor, having stipulated for a fixed payment, may be paid by the debtor in either gold or silver, the latter chooses the material which comes cheapest to him, and the creditor suffers an injustice." Without inquiring whether the creditor on entering upon the contract also exercised his option in furnishing the debtor with either material, and therefore cannot claim another treatment—without inquiring whether, as he can also part with the material received on the same terms, and must do so, I can show you that the dogma is one untrue, both in practice and in theory. * * * The large business of exchanging contracts, as well as all such dealings in capital and commodities, in which the "creditor" stands in the position assumed above, is carried on by accounts, checks, and clearing systems without the use of any currency, and so the great system depends upon the exchange of equivalents of value alone. * * * There can be no question of any difference or disproportionate "cheapness" between them, (the metals.) The debtor, in order to obtain either gold or silver coin, must render up the same equivalent for either. (Ernest Seyd, Journal of the Royal Society of Arts, March 10, 1876, p. 340.)

* The word dollar was first defined in the coinage act of April, 1792. Therefore, the powers of coining and regulating value were first exercised together. There was no regulation of value before coining; therefore no regulation of the value of the foreign coins which circulated in the United States previous to 1792.

Having control of the two commodities, gold and silver coins, and of these two only, it was not and is not practicable for the Government of the United States to regulate the value as between any other commodities than gold and silver coins.*

Having made this regulation, Congress went as far as it had power to go. In the regulation that "the proportional value of gold to siver in all coins which shall by law be current as money within the United States shall be as 15 to 1, according to quantity in weight of pure gold or pure silver," (act of April 2, 1792, section 11,) Congress exercised all the kind of power which was conferred upon it by the Constitution regarding the regulation of values.

VIEWS OF THE LAST GENERATION ON THE CONSTITUTIONAL QUESTION.

The view herein taken is that which has hitherto been taken by all who have carefully considered this subject. In a report to this Chamber by one of its members, Mr. Sanford, the chairman of a "select committee to consider the state of the currency," appointed by the Twenty-first Congress, (see Executive Document, second session Twenty-first Congress, December 15, 1830,) he held the following language:

The Constitution of the United States evidently contemplates in the power conferred upon this Government to coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coins, and the restriction imposed on the States to make nothing but gold and silver coins a tender in payment of debts, that the money of this country shall be gold and silver. Our system of money established in the year 1792 fully adopts the principle that it is expedient to coin and use both metals as money, and such has always been the opinion of the people of the United States.

At this period (1830) there was not a dollar of gold in the country. England nearly depleted us of what little we had, previous to 1817, in order to prepare for the resumption of specie payments, which had been suspended in England since 1797, and which resumption the ruling classes of England had unwisely or selfishly planned upon the basis of a single metal. This depletion went on from 1817 until after 1820, perhaps until 1821 or 1822. Then it stopped, so far as we were concerned, from sheer exhaustion on our part. We had no more gold to sell. At that period we had nearly $70,000,000 of bank paper afloat. What condition this country would have been left in had our statesmen been as indifferent then as they appear to have been in 1873, in regard to the constitutional requirement to make both gold and silver legal-tender money, I leave to the imagination. Our population was then 10,000,000. We had but lately emerged from a war with England, at the close of which gold had stood, in our excessive paper issues, at 117, and an attempt to resume in 1817 was met by a revulsion in 1819 and a secondary revulsion in 1821.

Imagine 10,000,000 of people, exhausted by war and the sores of a double revulsion, depleted of every dollar of gold, and divested of the power to resume in silver or use that metal in the payment of debts. Do you suppose, if the statesmen of 1822 had been as forgetful of the interests of their country and as oblivious of constitutional law as seem to have been those of 1873, that any respect would have been paid to their legislation, and that if it had been respected, the country could have been saved from revulsion and repudiation? I fancy not.

And this episode of our history conveys more than one warning, more than the warning that monometalism, if persisted in, may bring the country to great social and political disturbances. Some people are so filled with the sense of security that a warning of repudiation seems to them a mere bugaboo. Simple failure in an attempt to resume specie payments is to them an event of far greater likelihood, if not of importance. Very well, then; the episode before us contains the warning of such a failure, of two such failures. We tried to resume in 1817; we tried again in 1821; and on both occasions distress followed. What was the cause? Lack of specie. We tried to redeem sixty or seventy millions of paper with twenty or twenty-five millions of coin. What was the cause of the lack of specie? England had drained us of our gold, which she virtually overvalued in order to prepare for her own resumption.

But for silver, the use of which as legal tender had been preserved for us by the Constitution, we should not have resumed at all, at least not for forty years after, when California opened. The case is similar now. England again has drained us of our gold. We have $300,000,000 of paper afloat and less than $50,000,000 of specie wherewith to redeem it. Yet Congress orders resumption to take place, and forbids the employment of silver wherewith to resume. Is it not plain that resumption is quite impracticable; that a sum of gold sufficient for the purpose cannot be purchased throughout the world at any prices for bonds or exports at which we would be willing to sell, and that any attempt to resume, unless the constitutional requirements as to the monetization of silver are obeyed, will plunge the country into all the disasters of monetary revulsion?

VESTED INTERESTS UNDER THE CONSTITUTION.

Ever since Mr. Webster's time it has been an oft-quoted doctrine that under the Constitution the destruction or impairment of a vested interest by act of Government is in the nature of a breach of contract. Without giving adhesion to this doctrine it ought to be remarked that, as a rule of law it appears to work too many ways to be practicable, because legislation is impossible without disturbance of social relations, and therefore of existing interests. However this may be, the rule has been held to apply with peculiar force, though I know not why, to the vested interests of the public creditor, and prejudice has been arrayed against the return to the double standard because it is held that payments in silver might affect the interests of the public creditor. To this I have already adverted and I do not propose to raise that question now. But while on the subject of vested interests and breach of contract there is something more to be said. That something relates to the mining interests of this country; interests which, I think it will be admitted, are quite as important to the welfare of the country as those of the public creditor.

The mining interests of this country came into existence under clauses of the Constitution which it was well understood made both gold and silver money legal tender for the payment of debts. During the first three-quarters of the period of our national existence silver chiefly and for the most time only was employed as money; during the last quarter of the period gold was chiefly so employed. But not until 1873 (and that merely by implication) was either metal demonetized. It was therefore while both metals were money that the entire gold and silver mining interests of this country were created and built up, at first upon alluvial findings and washings, and afterward with the profit from those upon the more difficult and expensive ores in veins and lodes. These interests, once so few, now so numerous that they yearly throw into the lap of the country $100,000,000 of the precious metals—more than one-half of the product of the entire world, and sufficient if rightly managed to render our country the clearing-house of the world—were literally built up with the naked fingers, with the rude pick and cradle. This single foundation was that clause of the Constitution which makes the precious metals money, but for which they would have had no existence, and upon the continued and faithful observance of which they depend even to-day for maintenance, because, though of gigantic dimensions in the aggregate, their average profit is so small that it vanishes with the slightest disturbance in the value of the precious metals. Yet there are those who hold in respect of these permanent, important, and well-deserving interests vested in mining that the interests of a pack of clamorous money-lenders in London, Berlin, and Frankfort are of vastly more account than theirs. The recent project of a Boston correspondent to pay the interest on the public debt in silver dollars they sneered at as "a nice down-east joke," and bullied about the rights of vested interests under the Constitution.

The Constitution! Sir, when I come to pronounce that word I do so with a respect that is akin to reverence; for under the shadow of that instrument, so wisely and so wondrously drawn as to have lasted a century of the world's busiest times, there has grown up from thirteen feeble and jealous colonies, containing 3,000,000 people of varied origin and conflicting interests, a nation of thirty-eight proud States, containing 45,000,000 people, free, homogeneous, prosperous, strong, and progressive. When and where else in the world's history has such a growth been seen? The constitution of the Roman republic, though nominally it lasted longer, really did not last so long, for it was frequently and essentially altered and modified. It had to deal with a far lesser number of states, interests, or people, and the progress under it was nothing as compared with our progress. Take the most important of modern states, England, France, or Germany. In which of them will you find the same freedom, the same equality, the same ingenuity and adaptability, the same energy, the same elasticity, the same rapidity of growth, either in numbers or wealth? Since the date of our Constitution England has scarcely tripled her population. France has not yet doubled hers, while ours has increased fifteen times. Our national life has not been without its vicissitudes, but who can deny that it has been grand, noble, and progressive, and that it is due, all of it, to that sacred instrument which we rightly term the Constitution for the United States?

In pronouncing the name of this instrument I do so with the respect due to the mighty agency which it has had in building up a great nation and promoting the progress of man in all countries.

In this remembrance I should almost regard it as sacrilege to invoke its support of a false doctrine, to twist it, distort it, or seek to turn it aside from its plain meaning. And I regard it as sacrilege when I see it used as a cover to protect the sharp-toothed greed of plutocracy.

That gold and silver are both the money of the Constitution is so obviously the meaning of that instrument that the question, so far as I am aware, was never fully raised until lately and after the passage of the act of 1873. That the Constitution either directly or by the remotest implication throws any mantle of protection over the public creditor, which does not at the same time as amply cover the third greatest industrial interest of the whole country—this I deny.

Between an interest which has become "vested" by dint of hasty and ill-considered legislation, and one which has become "vested" through bold adventure, the peril of life, the miasma of death-inclosing valleys, the snows of lofty mountains, the arid and burning plains, through incessant labor, and far away from "home" and familiar faces, between these classes of vested interests there is a wide difference. One of these classes demands the maintenance of the act of 1873, because it fears that the overthrow of that act may have some possible bearing upon the advantages which it has secured; the other asks for its immediate abolition because it is unconstitutional, it is unwise, it is sapping the foundation of an industry of vital importance to the country. Let the Senate decide between them, and choose whether it will intrust the welfare of the nation rather to the money-dealers of Lombard street and the Continent than to the hardy mountaineers of the Sierra Nevadas, whose occupations are environed with danger and whose unceasing watch-word is Liberty!

*Not even between gold and silver bullion.

WHAT THE HAND OF THE DESTROYER HATH SPARED.

Some of the greatest nations of the earth have been destroyed, and it has been asserted that nothing remains to attest their existence except the languages they employed. Such is the case with the ancient Arabians, the Phœnicians, and the Carthagenians, who were all of the same race. Such, also, was the case with the ancient Malays, Egyptians, and Toltecs. Of the Lake Dwellers of Switzerland or the Mound Builders of America, it is said that not even language remains. And yet all of these nations and many other prehistoric ones, as the Pelasgians, the Etruscans, &c., have left a legacy to mankind. That legacy is the precious metals which they employed for money. Much of it must still be in existence in some form or other of usefulness. The hand of the destroyer, Time, hath spared this, even while he hath not spared language. And yet there are impious men to-day who, for the sake of a temporary personal advantage, would strike down this last and precious vestige of nations who fought and labored scores of centuries ago that we might now live in peace and plenty.

WORSE THAN DESTROYING THE MINES.

The demonetization of silver would not merely have the same result as the stoppage of all the silver mines of the world; the result would be far worse; it would be as though one-half of all the labor of past ages, except what doubtful legacy has remained in the shape of land improvements, were blotted out of existence. This would be worse than destroying the mines, for they might be re-opened, whereas the demonetized metal would be irretrievably lost in the arts and otherwise.

"LET THINGS STAND AS THEY ARE."

"Let things stand as they are" is the false and treacherous maxim of those who have wrongfully obtained an advantage over others. Laissez faire does not mean "let things stand as they are," but "let alone" altogether. The existing state of affairs may be the result of a good deal of meddlesomeness. To let them remain as they are would be to let ruin work its own way. The single standard foisted upon this nation by the act of 1873 was a mischievous interference with trade, and things cannot be let alone until this act is repealed. The suppression of the double standard cannot be compared with the usury laws. It is ten thousand times, nay, infinitely worse; for in the rate of interest for money there is competion between money-lenders, whereas concerning the kind of metal in which they will demand to be paid there will be no competition whatever. Herein the interests of all money-lenders are identical. The only way to meet their rapacity is by restoring the double standard, to give the debtor the same option in paying that the creditor had in lending.

ANTIQUITY OF MONEY—PREHISTORIC NATIONS—EXPERIMENTS IN MONEY—GOLD STANDARD—PLATINUM COINS.

Hitherto, in alluding to the antiquity of gold and silver money, I have sometimes used the expression thirty or fifty centuries, the former referring to the oldest coins now extant, the latter to the earliest period for which we have indisputable evidence concerning the use of these metals for money. But if there is any credence to be reposed in the numerous authorities quoted in Baldwin's Prehistoric Nations, both gold and silver were employed as money by the ancient Arabians or Cushites from sixty to a hundred centuries ago. The precise antiquity of money is, however, of little consequence in this connection. It is sufficient if we know that it is of very great antiquity, and of this there is no doubt whatever.

During all this time every conceivable sort of experiment was made with money. It was tried in ingots, in "dust," in wire coils, and in coins; round, square, oblong, punctured, buttoned, milled, and unmilled coins; coins with and without alloy; pure coins, composite coins, base coins, plated coins, coins of brass, tin, iron, nickel, and platinum.

The history of platinum coins exemplifies the results of all these experiments. These coins were adopted in Russia in 1826, during the notable decline in the product of the precious metals, which occurred from 1810 to 1840, and before the Ural and Siberian mines were opened. No substance was intrinsically more suitable to answer the purposes of money than platinum. It was only inferior to the precious metals in one respect, but that respect proved fatal to its continuance. There was no great stock of platinum in the world to modify the vicissitudes of its current production as there is of the precious metals; no reservoir of antiquity, no heirloom of the centuries. Consequently, every time the annual production of platinum greatly increased, prices in platinum coins were suddenly and violently advanced, and every time the production of platinum fell off, prices fell. These violent aberrations proved fatal to the continued use of this metal for coins, and it was discontinued. The same thing had previously occurred with coins of brass, iron, tin, &c., and if our nickel coins were anything more than tokens, mere promises to pay stamped on base metal, the same thing would happen with them.

Substitutes for money form another class of experiments which have ended disastrously in bank panics, in commercial crises, in stay laws, and in repudiation. The trouble is the same with bank credits as with coins of any other substances than the precious metals. There is no stock on hand to modify the influence of great supplies.

The adoption of the single gold standard is another experiment in money of similar character, and subject in a measure to the same fatal objection. In this case the stock on hand is very great; but it is only one-half as much as that of the two precious metals combined; and this important fact must settle the fate of the experiment.

COMPARATIVE FACILITY AND COST OF TRANSPORTING GOLD AND SILVER.

During the great continental wars of three-fourths of a century ago, the necessity of having large military chests in the service of armies rendered it necessary to transport large sums of specie in the field. For this purpose gold was found to be superior to silver on account of its lighter weight in proportion to value. While the fact was then so important that it may have had no little influence in reconciling the British nation with that formal adoption of the single gold standard which followed shortly after these wars, it is now of no importance whatever, even in Europe, and never has been of any importance in this country. Armies do not employ military chests nowadays. Russia, Austria, Italy, Germany, France, and even England, have fought their greatest campaigns with the aid of treasury or bank paper. In America all our wars have been fought with paper. The colonial expedition to Louisbourg, in 1745, was conducted with paper, our war of Independence was fought with paper, our rebellion was put down with paper. Whatever may be the evil effects of paper, it is hopeless to expect that it will not be issued by governments in the event of great wars. War is of itself the greatest of evils, and the lesser evil of paper merely follows in its wake, as sharks do the mutinous ship.

In times of peace the cost of transporting a given sum in gold or silver is the same, notwithstanding the lighter weight of the former. Freights upon gold and silver are rated according to value, and not according to bulk or weight. The freight upon a ton of gold from California to New York is now more than sixteen times as much as that upon a ton of silver, and this is the same upon railway, and steamship, and other transportation lines throughout the world. The curious will find the actual freights quoted in M. Cernuschi's work on Bimetalism.

The rating of freights upon gold and silver by value instead of bulk or weight is due to the important consideration of risk. The bulk or weight of a million dollars in silver is far greater than that of a million dollars in gold; but the risk of loss from accident or robbery is far greater in the case of gold than in that of silver. An ingot of gold worth $2,000 could be very easily lost, and would be very difficult to recover in case of a railway collision, a fire, the breaking of a bridge, a robbery, &c. An ingot of silver worth $2,000 would be difficult to lose and easy to recover; nor could a thief conveniently carry it off, because it would weigh over a hundred pounds. No guards are required to conduct a shipment of silver bars, because no highwaymen could lift them, whilst gold ingots of the same value could be stowed away in the pocket, and therefore would have to be guarded by armed men. The expense incurred in this and other ways fully counterbalances the saving which arises from inferior bulk or weight in transportation.

As to the alleged superiority of gold in handling sums of money suitable for the ordinary payments of commercial life, it is the merest moonshine. One would suppose, to hear this claim made, that such an institution as banking was unknown to the world, instead of being, what is the fact, of seven hundred years' growth. Only the most narrow theorist will contend that the resumption of specie payments in this country will be followed by the extinction of banks. After resumption, banks will receive specie on deposit and issue bills in its place, and these bills will be used for payments from hand to hand just as similar bills were used before suspension. The only difference will be that, thanks to the superiority of the national over the old State bank systems, the bills will be better secured—indeed, we may say absolutely secured—provided, of course, that no relaxation is made of the admirable and sound conditions and principles upon which this system was founded; and of such relaxation we need entertain no fears.

In such case, and in all cases, we always have a perfect expedient to obviate the inconvenience of handling coins, that of depositing the coins with the Government, which shall issue therefor, dollar for dollar, bills to be declared by law receivable for all payments, public and private.

This project I need not elaborate at this time or in this connection. Its suggestion merely serves to show that in any event our money, whether of gold or silver, or both, as it should be, can always be made easy enough to handle through the medium of representative paper.

It should always be borne in mind that, as M. Cernuschi remarks, a bill of exchange (or bank-note) for silver does not weigh any more than one for gold.

THE SINGLE STANDARD COMMERCIALLY UNPROFITABLE.

If we look at the question from the national and not merely the plutocratical point of view, it will appear that every nation which demonetizes one of the metals and limits itself to the use of the other only punishes itself. It would leave more money to the other nations. Prices would fall in the former countries and rise in the latter. The former would have to sell their products to the latter at low prices and purchase back in high prices; just as China sells to us now at low prices and buys from us at high ones. If instead of selling their products wherewith to pay for the products they purchased, the gold-standard nations sold their products wherewith to purchase the demonetized metal in which the prices of the other were rated, as for instance, if England purchased silver wherewith to pay for East India products, she would have to purchase such silver at the high prices of commodities which would prevail in India after the surplus stock of Europe were driven thither. In other words, the course of exchange would be against the gold-standard nations. For example, a pound sterling of exchange upon India would cost more than a pound sterling of gold in England. Arrange it as you will either, product against product, or product against exchange, the result will be the same. The nations with a limited stock of money would trade disadvantageously with nations having both the metals for their standard of value. This is the secret of the profitableness of the oriental trade. The oriental countries employ but one metal for their standard—silver. The occidental countries have hitherto employed both metals. Hence the low prices of the Orient and high prices of the Occident. As a measure between the labor of the two great divisions of the world, it has always been favorable to the Occident. This advantage it is now proposed to destroy. To call it madness would be but a mild stigma.

OUR MONEY SHOULD BE EN RAPPORT WITH THAT OF THE WORLD.

Having already shown that gold and silver was the money of the world—not gold or silver singly—it would seem hardly necessary to reply more specifically to an objection to the restoration of the double standard which some men suggest. That suggestion is, that unless we adopt the gold standard we shall not be en rapport with the standard of England, the country with which we transact the most commerce.

Those who suggest this objection do not appear to remember how foreign exchanges are conducted. Balances of trade are not paid in coin, but in bullion, and it makes no difference whether the bullion is of gold or silver or both. It goes for its value, whatever that may be at the time. Exchanges are adjusted by means of bills, which are rated in view of the standard of value in the several countries upon or through which the bills are drawn. Suppose our standard were of gold, and we had to pay for a balance of trade to China; we would not pay in gold coin, but in bullion, in gold not at its price in this country, but at its price in all countries. This would be determined by the course of exchange, which is the product of settlements between all commercial nations. So, if our standard were the double one of silver and gold, our balances with England would not be settled in gold and silver coin, but in bullion, at its price in all countries, as determined by the course of exchange. We would settle in bills of exchange, as we do now, as we always have done. So far as this objection goes, the discordance between the standards of two countries is of no consequence whatever. Discordance of standard is only material when it has the effect of locally demonetizing, for a greater or lesser duration of time, an important part of the world's stock of coin, and this can only happen when several important countries unite in demonetizing one of the metals. This is the case now. Silver is being driven to the Orient, and though, in spite of demonetization, it will find its way back in time, yet meanwhile the nations who unite in demonetizing it will needlessly produce a revolution in prices and the relations of the various classes of society, which may seriously affect the rank of such in the scale of civilization.

To render our standard of money en rapport with that of England, while it would not prove of the slightest convenience in commercial affairs, would tend to render our institutions of government en rapport with hers. If this is what gentlemen desire, they should say so openly, and not under the mask of a fancied commercial advantage. Their constituents will then be better able to appreciate their statesmanship.

GROWING INFLUENCE OF THE WORLD'S STOCK OF SPECIE.

There was a time when the world's stock of specie was so small that the slightest vicissitude in the supply of bullion from the mines was sufficient to cause violent fluctuations in prices and violent changes of fortune. The feudal system owes no little of its strength and permanence to this fact, for it was the only institution upon which the ruling classes, ecclesiastical and secular, could rely to secure to them their monopoly of wealth. When the feudal system, through many causes,* began to lose strength, the mercantile system was adopted to serve the purpose of controlling the flow of specie from one country to another. At the present time the world's stock of specie is so great, that the vicissitudes of supply can have but little influence upon prices; and as that stock becomes larger and larger, the influence of the supply will become less and less. Another century may see society safely placed beyond the influence of these mutations.

Yet now, upon the threshold of a condition of affairs which must do more to equalize the fortunes of individuals and advance the progress of society than any other, it is proposed to destroy at one blow the work of countless centuries, by demonetizing one-half of the world's stock of specie, and the United States are asked to assist in this work of superlative madness and inhumanity. Such a proposition, which could only emanate from men crazed and arrogant with good fortune, is not merely an insult to the genius and institutions of this country; it is a bold and direct attack upon progress, upon civilization, upon liberty. The men who have made it do not merely attack the prosperity of their own countries, they conspire to destroy humanity, they are traitors to society, they have urged a proposition of the most violent and revolutionary character.

*The invention of gunpowder, the introduction of bills of exchange, the discovery of America, and establishment of colonies with ample arable lands, &c.

NOBODY HURT BY RESTORING THE DOUBLE STANDARD.

I ask gentlemen to point me out one individual who can be injured by restoring the double standard, recoining the silver dollar of 371¼ grains fine, and making it a legal tender for all amounts, as it was before. Point me out one man who would suffer by it. Point me out one product of the country which would be lessened in its gold price by restoring the silver dollar. Point me out one interest imperiled, one sacrifice sustained. On the other hand, I will point you out millions of men who will be ruined if you persist in retaining the gold standard; I will name a thousand products of the country which will continue to fall in price; I will show you a myriad of interests in jeopardy, and innumerable sacrifices to be sustained.

THE STOCK OF MONEY MAKES PRICES, AND THE COURSE OF PRICES AFFECTS CIVILIZATION.

Double the world's stock of money to-day, and you will double all prices. Diminish it one-half, and prices will fall one-half. This relation of money and price is axiomatic. You will find it in all the books on political economy. No writer has ever ventured to doubt it; not even Tooke, who doubted everything, even his own opinions.

Price is the expression of the measure of value, which is money. The larger the measure, the larger the expression or price; the smaller the measure, the smaller the expression or price. Hence, with a large stock of coin in the world, prices would be high; with a small stock prices would be low. To increase the stock of coin is to enhance prices, alleviate the burdens of the debtor class, and distribute wealth; to decrease it is to lower prices, increase the claims of the creditor class, and concentrate wealth. One result leads to social progress, the other to decay. Every dollar hewn out of the rocks, no matter whom it enriches in the first instance, has an immediate effect in alleviating the general condition of mankind. Every dollar worn out, lost, or demonetized by plutocratical legislation, tends to lower prices and concentrate wealth, tends to impoverish the needy and enrich the affluent.

The proposition to resume specie payments in this country on the gold standard is tantamount to demonetizing one-tenth of the world's stock of silver or one-twentieth of its entire stock of coin. When the long period which has been required to accumulate this stock is taken into consideration, it is not too much to say that this act will set us back in the command of some of the most important factors of civilization as much as a century of constitutional freedom has set us forward.

THE STANDARD OF VALUE IN VARIOUS COUNTRIES IN 1870.

The standard of value which existed in the various principal countries of the world in 1870 was as follows:

Country.	Population.
DOUBLE STANDARD.
United States*	39,000,000
France	36,000,000
Italy*	26,000,000
Spain	17,000,000
Belgium	5,000,000
Switzerland	3,500,000
Greece*	1,500,000
Peru	4,000,000
New Granada	3,000,000
Ecuador	1,000,000
SILVER STANDARD.
India	200,000,000
China	250,000,000
Russia*	82,000,000
Germany	41,000,000
Austria*	36,000,000
Mexico	9,000,000
Sweden } Norway }	6,000,000
Denmark	2,000,000
Holland	4,000,000
Central America	2,500,000
GOLD STANDARD.
United Kingdom	31,000,000
Turkey*	36,000,000
Brazil*	10,000,000
Portugal	4,000,000
Chili	2,000,000
Australia	2,000,000

*Specie payments suspended.

AN INTERNATIONAL STANDARD CONVENTION.

It would be desirable for all nations to adopt permanently the same standard of value, and if the same were, as in my opinion it no doubt would be, the double standard, to adopt the same relation between the metals. To effect this object all that is necessary is an international standard convention, which can be called by any one of the great powers, and should be called by the United States. Provision should be made that no other projects but the standard and ratio should be determined upon, and that the nations should vote according to population or wealth, or on a mixed basis consisting of both. For such an international convention to be called by the United States there is imminent necessity. I regard this project as likely to lead to results of the highest importance. It may become the forerunner of that federation of the nations of which poets have dreamed and bards have sung. The initial point of such a federation is most fitly the standard of value, for this lies at the base of all social and governmental arrangements; it determines the institution of property.

THE PECUNIARY INTEREST OF ENGLAND AND GERMANY IN THE GOLD STANDARD.

In a paper published in the Journal of the Society of Arts for March 10, 1876, Mr. Ernest Seyd estimates the amount of foreign debt (governmental, corporative, and other) held in England, Germany, and France as follows:

England, from	$5,000,000,000	to $5,500,000,000
Germany, from	2,750,000,000	to 3,000,000,000
France, from	2,500,000,000	to 2,750,000,000

Confining our view to England and Germany only, we shall see how great a present pecuniary interest these countries have in establishing and upholding a single gold standard. According to Mr. Seyd's estimates these two countries alone hold over $8,000,000,000 of foreign debt. By limiting themselves to the single gold standard and endeavoring to influence other nations (our own among the number) to adopt it, they have already succeeded in producing a decline of about 7½ per cent. in the relation of gold and silver, this being the ratio of the difference between 15.63 and 16.69, the average relation of silver to gold in 1872 and 1875 respectively. Now, 7½ per cent. on $8,000,000,000 amounts to no less a sum than $600,000,000, which is the measure of the profit of the British and German plutocracy on the foreign debts they hold. Descending from the principal to the interest on these debts, if we estimate the average annual interest at 6 per cent. per annum, which is certainly within the mark, the difference to these plutocracies between obtaining their interest in gold and obtaining it in silver during the years 1872 and 1875 inclusive has been no less than $36,000,000 per annum. Since the introduction of the demonetization act into the American Congress these gentry have gained $108,000,000 by having their interest paid in gold instead of silver. The magnitude of this advantage, every dollar of which has been a clear and gratuitous loss to the debtor nations, is surely enough to account for the vehemence of the plutocratical objection to the double standard. With $36,000,000 a year at stake, there is little wonder that they have succeeded in marshaling to their aid so imposing an array of advocates in the legislatures and the press of the victimized countries from which this extra and gratuitous tribute was drawn.

THE RIGHT TIME TO REHABILITATE THE SILVER DOLLAR.

The right time for us to rehabilitate the silver dollar, to restore the double standard, is not when the necessities of nations shall compel them, as it will compel them all, to go into the market for silver. A simultaneous demand from Germany and the United States alone would put that metal up to 15, perhaps for the time even to 14. The right time for us is now, while silver is temporarily cheap, and no other nation of the Occident is bidding for it. Last month silver stood at 17.82, and already it is up to 17.69. Before the year has expired it may stand 15.50. It is dangerous and costly to delay. The present time is therefore the most favorable one which may present itself. Let us not postpone reform until it is too late to accomplish it. European demonstration and an exceptional mine give us a great advantage. Why should we not use it?

PRACTICAL WORKING OF THE SINGLE STANDARD IN ENGLAND.

When an outflow of specie threatens to occur in England, the occurrence is sought to be averted and its effects mitigated by raising the rate of discount at bank. This action at once clogs all financial operations by rendering them expensive and difficult of accomplishment. Raising the rate of discount at bank is like putting the brakes on a railway train; lowering it is like taking the brakes off.

The Bank of England was established in 1694. From that year to the year 1816, a period of one hundred and twenty-two years, there were only sixteen changes in the bank rate. This rate never fell below 4 per cent., and (except in two instances to 6) never rose above 5 per cent. During this period the double standard existed in England. In 1816 the double was changed to the single gold standard. From 1816 to 1847, a period of thirty-one years, there were sixteen changes in the bank rate; as many as had occurred under the double standard during a period of one hundred and twenty-two years. But these changes, numerous as they were, compared with the few that had previously taken place, were few themselves compared with the number that took place after 1847, when the gold product of California began to make itself felt in the markets of the world. From 1847 to 1874, inclusive, a period of twenty-seven years, the number of changes in the Bank of England rate was no less than two hundred and twenty-three, and the rate fluctuated violently from 2½ to 10 per cent. per annum.

These fluctuations have been ascribed by various writers to various causes, but none of these causes appear to have had so potential an effect as the mutations of the gold production of the world, for these must have operated with peculiar and great force in a country which alone among all the great countries of the world had committed itself to so unstable a measure of values as gold.

PRACTICAL WORKING OF THE DOUBLE STANDARD IN FRANCE.

While I have not been able to obtain in time for the present purposes the statistics of the changes in the rate of discount by the Bank of France, my general recollection on the subject enables me to say that these changes have been very few, and, except at certain critical financial junctures, they have been unimportant. In a word, the rate of discount charged by this great institution, which is second only to the Bank of England in the magnitude of its resources and operations, has been changed but seldom and slightly from the period of its foundation, in the year 1800, to the present day. Even at the financial junctures alluded to, I am unable to find any record of a higher rate than 6½ per cent., and this occurred during the suspension which followed the Franco-German war. This steadiness of the rate is attributable to the double standard.

THE BANK RATE REGULATES ALL COMMERCIAL OPERATIONS.

The rate of discount at bank not only regulates the outflow of specie; it also very powerfully affects all commercial transactions. It is the price at which money can be borrowed to carry domestic produce, to import and export merchandise abroad, to construct railways and other public improvements, to pay debts, meet maturing obligations, and the like. Every commercial speculation, every financial scheme, is influenced by its fluctuations. It is the merchant's inverse barometer, whose fall indicates prosperity, and whose rise points to bankruptcy and ruin; while its modifying influence acts like a breakwater to protect the country from the fierce currents of the financial ocean.

NO SUCH REGULATOR IN THE UNITED STATES.

In the United States there is no national bank par excellence, no great central institution whose operations govern those of all smaller ones and at once influence the course of trade. There has been no such institution in this country since 1837. The so-called "national banks" are private institutions, and national only to the extent that they are chartered by the Federal Government, and must conform to its regulations as to securities and circulation. They may each of them charge whatever rate of discount they please within the rate permitted by the laws of the State wherein they are situated. As the legal rate of interest differs in nearly all the States, and the banks are not combined under any single management, there is no uniformity in the rate of interest they charge, and it follows that, except so far as concerns the action of certain prominent banks in the leading financial cities of the country, there is no practical check which can be exerted to restrain or modify a threatened outflow of specie, or any other financial disaster or inconvenience.

THEREFORE THE UNITED STATES LESS ABLE THAN ENGLAND, FRANCE, OR GERMANY TO RUN THE RISKS OF A SINGLE STANDARD.

Hence for the United States to trust its commercial prosperity to the violent hazards of a single standard would be even more improvident than it has proved in the case of England. That country, in its great national bank, possesses a "governor" upon whose action it can rely to break the force of sudden and great movements of specie. Even with this "governor," we have seen, in the fluctuations of the rate of interest, how violent these movements have been. France possesses a similar "governor;" so does Germany. The former country has never run the risk of trusting to it in this matter of abandoning the double standard, while the latter, during a contemplated change from the silver to the gold standard, has halted midway at the double standard.

Yet, although quite destitute of that great financial mechanism, even with the aid of which France and Germany hesitate to encounter the great peril which England has invited them to share with her, we of the United States are asked to adopt the single gold standard, and run the risk of immediate shipwreck. This may be sound advice; but I must confess it does not appear to come from people who have evinced any solicitude for the welfare of the country.

OPPOSITE AND UNEXPECTED EFFECTS OF THE FRENCH INDEMNITY.

As a consequence of the victory of Germany over France in 1870, the last-named country was compelled to pay to the first-named an indemnity amounting to the enormous sum of $1,000,000,000. One would naturally have supposed that this indemnity would prove a heavy burden to France and a source of great prosperity to Germany; but, owing, as it seems to me, chiefly to the retention of the double standard in France and the attempt to establish the gold standard in Germany, these consequences have been reversed; the burden is upon Germany; the prosperity has fallen to the share of France. The presence of a large stock of silver coin in France enabled that country to raise the enormous indemnity fund from its own people, who offered the government five times as much as it asked for, and at a low rate of interest. This stock of silver would not have been found in the country but for the retention of the double standard of 1803. The rate at which it was loaned was so low that the country scarcely feels the burden, and its industrial activity has received no check.

Germany, on the other hand, no sooner received the indemnity than she unwisely attempted to follow the short-sighted footsteps of England, and changed her standard of silver to gold. What have been the consequences? Panic, interruption of industry, commercial stagnation, and popular distress. To this distress Germany, unlike England, cannot afford to turn a deaf ear, for the greatness of the former country depends upon its people, and not like the latter, upon its wealth. Already Germany hesitates, and she will soon be obliged to retrace her ill-advised steps. If she does not, it is quite safe to foretell that her efforts to establish the gold standard will do more to alienate from her the affections of her heterogeneous populations than the land reforms of Stein and Hardenbergh had done to win them. If such a result as a change from the silver or the double standard to the gold one is the natural result of receiving a great war indemnity, it will be the better for Germany the next time she wins a victory to pay an indemnity rather than receive one.

LEGISLATION ON THE STANDARD OF THE UNITED STATES.

Table showing the various acts of the United States Government authorizing the coinage of silver and gold dollars, or their multiples or fractions, the weight of the same in pure metal, the extent to which the same were made legal tenders for the payment of debts, and the legal relation thus established between silver and gold. Also the London market relation of the metals at the period of the passage of such acts.

Act.	Coins.	Weight of dollar. (troy grains, pure.)	Extent of legal tender.	Legal relation.	Approximate London market relation.
Apr. 2, 1792	Silver dollar	371.25	Unlimited.	15.00000 to 1	About 14.9 to 1
	Gold dollar, multiples of.*	24.75	Unlimited.
July 31, 1834	Silver dollar	371.25	Unlimited.	16.00215 to 1	About 15.8 to 1
	Gold dollar, multiples of.	23.20	Unlimited.
July 18, 1837	Silver dollar and fractions of. †	371.25	Unlimited.	15.09837 to 1	About 15.7 to 1
	Gold dollar, multiples of.	23.22	Unlimited.
Feb. 24, 1853	Silver dollar	371.25	Unlimited.	15.98837 to 1.	About 15.3 to 1
	Gold dollar and multiples of.	23.22	Unlimited.
	Silver dollar, fractions of.	345.60	Five dollars	.....	.....
Act Feb. 12, 1873, Rev. Stat.	§3516 Silver dollar	.....	Interdicted	.....	.....
	§3513 Silver dollar, fractions of.	‡347.22	Five dollars	.....	.....
	§3513 Silver "trade-dollar"	378.00	§5 dollars	16.27907 to 1	About 15.9 to 1
	§3511 Gold dollar and multiples of.	23.22	Unlimited.

* Eagles, half-eagles, and quarter-eagles.
† Half-dollars, quarters, dimes, and half-dimes.
‡ The act (February 12, 1873) prescribes the weight of the debased fractional silver coins in "grams," which another act (Revised Statutes, section 3570) defines to be 15.432 grains each.
§ The making of the trade-dollar a limited legal tender by section 3586 of the Revised Statutes is believed to have been unintentional.

THE VOICE OF AUTHORITY.

The voice of authority has ever been in favor of the double standard and opposed to the single. I have only time to quote some of the most eminent statesmen, economists, bankers, writers, and practical men on this subject.

Alexander Hamilton:

To annul the use of either of the metals as money is to abridge the quantity of circulating medium, and is liable to all the objections which arise from a comparison of the benefits of a full with the evils of a scanty circulation.. (Report to Congress, 1791.)

Thomas Jefferson:

I return you the report on the mint. I concur with you that the unit must stand on both metals. (Letter to Hamilton, February, 1792.)

In his Recherches sur l'or et sur l'argent, 1843, Leon Fauchet said:

If all the nations of Europe adopted the system of Great Britain, the price of gold would be raised beyond measure, and we should see produced in Europe a result lamentable enough. The Government cannot decree that legal tender shall be only gold, in place of silver, for that would be to decree a revolution, and the most dangerous of all, because it would be a revolution leading to unknown results, (qui marcherait vers l'inconnu.)

In a memoir read before the French Institute in 1868, M. Wolowski said:

The suppression of silver would bring on a veritable revolution. Gold would augment in value with a rapid and constant progress, which would break the faith of contracts, and aggravate the situation of all debtors, including the nation. It would add at one stroke of the pen at least three milliards to the twelve milliards of the public debt.

Though the voices and votes of this great statesman and publicist, and of those who sided with him in the debates of the monetary convention of 1865, were overpowered, yet they still reverberate throughout the world; for truth and right cannot be suppressed.

A monetary commission appointed by the French government in 1869 took the testimony of practical financiers, who were unanimous against the proposed demonetization of silver. Before this commission M. le Baron Alphonse de Rothschild said:

The actual state of things, that is to say, the simultaneous employment of the two precious metals, is satisfactory and gives rise to no complaint. What is most needed in commerce is facility in its operations, and to-day it employs, according to its needs, sometimes gold and sometimes silver, and the partial replacement of silver by gold, which has taken place in these later times, has been effected without inconvenience.

They now demand that silver should be demonetized, as fifteen years ago they demanded that gold should be. The French government wisely refused to demonetize gold then, and it will be equally wise to refuse to demonetize silver now. In fact, whether gold or silver dominates for the time being, it is always true that the two metals concur together in forming the monetary circulation of the world, and it is the general mass of the two metals combined which serves as the measure of the value of things. In countries with the double standard the principal circulation will always be established of that metal which is the most abundant. It is scarcely twenty years ago that silver was the principal element in our transactions. Since the discoveries of the California and Australian mines, it is gold which has taken its place. No person can foresee what the future has in store for us, or can predict that the proportion in which the two metals are now produced may not be changed in favor of silver.

It appears to me that there are real advantages in maintaining silver in circulation and none in its suppression, since it is now actually a part of the circulation. I should regret the demonetization of silver in its relations to our internal circulation, our commercial intercourse with other countries, and the always uncertain eventualities of the future. But I should regret it even more if our example should be followed by other nations, for that suppression of silver would amount to a veritable destruction of values without any compensation.

Without doubt the two metals are not always in the same measure at our control; there is always one more abundant than the other; but neither of them has ever completely disappeared, and we have always been able to find the one of which we had need.

This is not the voice of plutocracy; it is the utterance of a great financial power whose self-interest is grand, enlightened, and in harmony with the other great interests of the world.

M. Rouland, the governor of the Bank of France, said:

We have not to do with ideal theories. The two moneys have actually coexisted since the origin of human society, without any disadvantage, and even with actual advantage in all countries which have availed themselves of them. They co-exist because the two together are necessary, by their quantity, to meet the needs of circulation. This necessity of the two metals, has it ceased to exist? Is it established that the quantity of actual and prospective gold is such that we can now renounce the use of silver without disaster? In place of the two moneys, is it entirely sure that the whole world can be usefully served with only one?

M. Wolowski said:

To adopt one metal, gold, to the exclusion of the other, it is not merely as if they closed all existing mines of silver, but as if they suppressed in this regard the labor of all past ages. The sum total of the precious metals is reckoned at fifty milliards,* one-half gold and one-half silver. If, by a stroke of the pen, they suppress one of these metals in the monetary service, they double the demand for the other metal to the ruin of all debtors.

At the sitting of the French senate on the 28th of January, 1870, which has properly been characterized as "memorable," from the magnitude of the subject of the debate and from the dignity and gravity with which the discussion was maintained, Dumas, a senator, to whose words learning, experience, virtue, and age combined to give weight, invoked the body to pause before concluding to make a change which "would affect the whole human race." He said:

Those who approach these questions for the first time decide them at once. Those who study them with care hesitate. Those who are obliged practically to decide, doubt and stop, overwhelmed with the weight of the enormous responsibility.

The quantities of the precious metals which are now sufficient may become insufficient, and we should proceed with great prudence before we diminish that which constitutes a part of the riches of the human race. Sometimes gold takes the place of silver. Sometimes silver takes the place of gold. This keeps up the general equilibrium. Nobody can guarantee that the present vast production of gold will continue. The placers are found on the surface of the earth, and may be exhausted by the very facility of working them. Silver presents itself in the form of subterranean veins. Science may contribute to accelerate its extraction. In presence of the unknown, which dominates the future, we should practice a prudent reserve.

Henri Cernuschi, the eminent French political economist and author of La Monnaie Bimetallique, writes an article in the Paris Siecle on the depreciation of silver, urging England and America to adopt a double standard, and to fix the relative value of gold and silver at 15½ to 1, the rate generally prevalent on the Continent. Dwelling specially on Anglo-Indian interests, M. Cernuschi says:

Seduced by gold "monometalism," Europe has ceased to coin silver, but it had long coined it previously, and colossal sums are in circulation. All this silver is to be called in and melted down, the more so as it circulates as a forced currency for a value it no longer possesses. All this silver is to be sold, and it is to London it will be sent to get gold. Floods of silver going up the Thames, floods of gold descending; scarcity and increasing value of the yellow metal, which is the only English currency, glut and depreciation of the white metal, which is the only Indian currency. The two conflicting "monometalisms" are about to face each other, the one suffering from anæmia, the other from plethora; two crises instead of one—a gold crisis and a silver crisis. From Galle to the Indus what a monetary shock; what a rise of prices produced by the invasion of silver! What increasing alterations in the value of all contracts and all engagements fixed in rupees! The most terrible monetary storm ever known, breaking out in a conquered country amid a population six times as large as that of the United Kingdom! Can England fold her arms? Can she say to trembling interests "Be patient; everything will end by finding its level?" The indifferent fatalism to which somnolent ulemas may resign themselves is repugnant to the proud British Neptune. England will have resolution to eliminate the evil. To insure her welfare she will desire all that is possible, rational, and efficacious. If it is demonstrated that the international rehabilitation of silver is the real solution, England will not hesitate; she will convoke the nations to the congress of monetary peace.

R. H. Patterson, a distinguished political economist, says:

It appears evident, then, that the formidable objections which theorists make to the existence of a double standard of value in a country are unsupported by facts. They cunjure up a vision of hydras, gorgons, and chimeras dire for which we feel no apprehension. If a country has enough of gold or of silver to make its coinage entirely of that metal, good and well. But if not—as is the case in India—by all means let it employ both metals. The correctness of this opinion is abundantly shown in the case of France. In that most logical of countries the double standard has long been established, and no one there has any desire to abolish it. During the last dozen years this double standard has been subjected to the severest test that could be applied, and yet every one is satisfied with its working. Gold is pouring in, silver is pouring out—a revolution is being effected in the currency of France; yet no one complains. Evidently practical or appreciable disadvantage of any kind is quite unknown, Theoretically, as we have shown, a double standard cannot do much harm; practically, we find it does none at all. And since it works under the most trying circumstances without the least injury in France, it may safely be introduced without any apprehension and with great advantage into India. (The Economy of Capital, London, 1864, page 59.)

*M. Wolowski here refers not to coin only, but to the precious metals in coin and plate, &c.

ERNEST SEYD. This able and impartial writer has written several works on coin and bullion which evince a thorough knowledge of these difficult subjects. He says:

The rejection of silver as a standard of value would be a most unwise and dangerous proceeding. It would be a far better and safer course to establish the double gold and silver valuation. (Bullion and Foreign Exchanges, London, 1868.)

We think it can be shown that the gold valuation has been injurious to England's interests in her foreign trade as well as in her internal financial policy. (Ibid.)

Similar views are entertained in Mr. Seyd's latest essay, published in the Journal of the Society of Arts for March, 1876.

CONCLUSION.

I have done. For the patience and attention with which Senators have listened to an exposition unusually lengthy and somewhat tedious, I thank them, and can only plead the transcendent importance of the subject.

There is yet time to undo the work of 1873, to correct the grave blunder perpetrated by the mint act of that year, in interdicting the American silver dollar and substituting the single standard of gold for the money of the Constitution. The disastrous effects which, in my opinion, are bound to flow from this attenuation of the standard and the basis of prices and credit are not yet felt because of the existing suspension of specie payments; but so soon as specie payments are resumed—if indeed they can ever be resumed without the restoration and co-ordination of silver in the standard—will the bad effects of this legislation dévelop themselves and make their mark upon the affairs of the country. It may then be too late to reform.

The present is therefore the acceptable time to undo the unwitting and inconsiderate work of 1873, and to render our legislation upon the subject of money consistent with the physical facts concerning the stock and supply of the precious metals throughout the world and conformable to the Constitution of the country.

We cannot, we dare not, avoid speedy action upon this subject. Not only do reason, justice, and authority unite in urging us to retrace our steps, but the organic law commands us to do so, and the presence of peril enjoins what the law commands. By idly interfering with the standard of the country, Congress has led the nation away from the realms of prosperity and thrust it beyond the boundaries of safety. To refuse to replace it upon its former vantage ground would be to incur a responsibility and deserve a reproach greater than that which men have ever before felt themselves able to bear.

APPENDIX.

MOVEMENT OF THE CURRENCY.

TABLE A.—Showing the currency of the United States from 1775 to 1875, inclusive. Sums in millions of dollars and tenths.

Year.	Coin.	United States and national-bank notes.	State-bank notes.	Total paper.	Total currency.	Population.	Currency, per capita.	Remarks.
1775	$6.0	.....	.....	$5.0	$11.0	2.5	$4.40	Lord Sheffield (Seybert, 554) says 9½ coin.
1775–1781	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	Era of "Continental money."
1790	16.0	$2.0	$1.0	3.0	19.0	3.9	4.87	Repudiation of Continental issues.
1791	16.0	.....	.....	9.0	25.0	4.0	6.25	First Bank United States.
1792	17.0	5.0	2.0	7.0	24.0	4.1	5.85
1793	20.0	.....	.....	11.0	31.0	4.3	7.20
1794	21.5	.....	.....	11.5	33.0	4.5	7.40
1795	19.0	.....	.....	11.0	30.0	4.6	6.50
1796	16.5	.....	.....	10.5	27.0	4.8	5.60
1797	16.0	.....	.....	10.0	26.0	4.9	5.30	Suspension Bank England, flux of gold.
1798	14.0	.....	.....	9.0	23.0	5.0	4.60
1799	17.0	.....	.....	10.0	27.0	5.2	5.20	Expiration of charter of first Bank United States.
1800	17.5	.....	.....	10.5	28.0	5.3	5.30
1801	17.0	.....	.....	11.0	28.0	5.5	5.10
1802	16.5	.....	.....	10.0	26.5	5.7	4.70
1803	16.0	.....	.....	11.0	27.0	5.9	4.60
1804	17.5	.....	.....	14.0	31.5	6.1	5.30
1805	18.0	.....	.....	15.0	33.0	6.3	5.20
1806	18.5	.....	.....	17.0	35.5	6.5	5.50
1807	20.0	.....	.....	18.0	38.0	6.7	5.70	Embargo December 22 first steamboat.
1808	20.0	.....	.....	22.75	44.7	6.9	6.40
1809	20.0	.....	.....	24.0	44.0	7.0	6.10	Specie drain; Mexican disturbances; stoppage of mines; suspension of New England banks.

TABLE A.—Showing the currency of the United States, &c.—Continued.

Year.	Coin.	United States and national-bank notes.	State-bank notes.	Total paper.	Total currency.	Population.	Currency, per capita.	Remarks.
1810	19.0	.....	.....	$26.0	$45.0	7.1	$6.10	Drain of specie.
1811	18.0	.....	.....	28.0	46.0	7.3	6.10	Apprehension of war (Drain of specie.)
1812	17.0	.....	.....	35.0	52.0	7.6	6.80	War declared with England.
1813	17.0	.....	.....	52.0	69.0	7.8	8.80	War continued; bank mania.
1814	17.0	.....	.....	51.5	69.5	8.0	8.70	August and September all except New England banks suspended until January, 1817. Gold 114 to 120.
1815	20.0	.....	.....	45.5	65.5	8.2	8.00	February, peace. Gold 115 down to 102.
1816	24.5	.....	.....	50.0	74.5	8.4	8.80	Gold 116 to 117, 107; second Bank U. S.; England adopts the gold standard.
1817	*22.0	.....	.....	55.0	77.0	8.6	8.90	Partial resumption of Bank United States.
1818	*20.0	.....	.....	60.0	80.0	8.8	9.00	Height of bank mania; gold drain.
1819	*20.0	.....	.....	62.5	82.5	9.1	9.20	Revulsion.
1820	*26.5	.....	.....	58.0	86.0	9.4	9.00	Resumption of Bank of England; continued efflux of gold from United States.
1821	*23.0	.....	.....	65.0	88.0	9.7	9.10	Spring stricture. (Tucker, p. 208, says 18 to 20 coin.)
1822	*18.0	.....	.....	70.0	88.0	10.0	8.80
1823	*17.0	.....	.....	76.0	93.0	10.3	9.00
1824	*18.0	.....	.....	78.0	96.0	10.6	9.10
1825	*19.0	.....	.....	81.0	100.0	10.9	9.20
1826	*20.0	.....	.....	80.0	100.0	11.1	9.00	Temporary bank panic.
1827	*22.5	.....	.....	75.0	97.5	11.5	8.50	Winter stricture.
1828	*27.0	.....	.....	68.0	95.0	11.9	8.00	First railway in U. S.
1829	*31.0	$12.5	$50.0	62.5	83.5	12.4	7.50	Temporary bank panics; President Jackson declares against recharter-ing United States Bank.
1830	*32.0	.....	.....	61.0	93.0	12.8	7.20	Report of Cong. Com. favoring bank.
1831	35.0	.....	.....	66.0	101.0	13.2	7.65	Bill introduced to recharter bank.
1832	39.0	.....	.....	71.0	110.0	13.6	8.10
1833	42.7	.....	.....	77.0	119.7	14.0	8.50	Removal of deposits from bank.
1834	60.0	.....	.....	90.0	150.0	14.4	10.40	Veto of bank bill.
1835	80.0	.....	.....	103.0	183.0	14.8	12.40	Great fire in New York; loss, $20,000,000.
1836	65.0	.....	.....	140.0	205.0	15.3	13.30	Expiration of charter second Bank United States.
1837	73.0	.....	.....	149.0	222.0	15.8	14.00	Great suspension.
1838	87.0	.....	.....	116.0	203.0	16.2	12.50	Universal insolvency; bankers' repudiation of Morris canal-stock; general contraction; fall in prices; stay laws; bankruptcy laws; liquidation; riots.
1839	87.0	.....	.....	135.0	222.0	16.7	13.40
1840	83.0	.....	.....	107.0	190.0	17.0	11.20
1841	80.0	.....	.....	107.0	187.0	17.5	10.70
1842	60.0	.....	.....	83.7	143.7	18.0	8.00	Repudiation of the States.
1843	70.0	.....	.....	58.5	128.5	18.6	6.90	Lowest depression; resumption.
1844	100.0	.....	.....	75.0	175.0	19.2	9.10	Increase of currency.
1845	96.0	.....	.....	90.0	186.0	19.8	9.40
1846	97.0	.....	.....	105.5	202.5	20.4	9.90
1847	120.0	.....	.....	105.5	225.5	21.0	10.07
1848	112.0	.....	.....	128.5	240.5	21.6	11.10	California mines opened.
1849	120.0	.....	.....	114.7	234.7	22.4	10.50
1850	154.0	.....	.....	131.0	285.0	23.2	12.20
1851	186.0	.....	.....	155.0	341.0	24.0	14.20
1852	204.0	.....	.....	156.0	360.0	24.8	14.50
1853	236.0	.....	.....	144.0	380.0	25.6	14.80
1854	240.0	.....	.....	178.6	418.6	26.4	15.80	Australian mines.
1855	257.6	.....	.....	187.0	444.6	27.1	16.40
1856	250.2	.....	.....	196.0	446.2	27.7	16.10
1857	259.3	.....	.....	215.0	474.3	28.4	16.70	Temporary panic; suspension.
1858	251.6	.....	.....	155.0	406.6	29.1	14.00	Resumption.
1859	265.8	.....	.....	193.0	458.8	29.7	15.40
1860	257.0	.....	.....	207.0	457.0	31.5	14.50
1861	241.4	.....	.....	202.0	443.4	32.3	13.70	Civil war; demand notes issued.
1862	238.5	.....	.....	184.0	482.5	22.9	21.00	Suspension; greenbacks issued.
1863	100.0	$411.0	$161.0	572.0	672.0	24.5	27.40	Circulation of State banks supplanted by national banks.
1864	90.0	513.0	140.0	653.0	743.0	26.1	28.50	National-bank notes; highest inflation. Gold 285.
1865	85.0	604.0	65.0	669.0	754.0	30.3	24.90	Peace; gradual contraction.
1866	100.0	713.0	37.0	750.0	850.0	*36.0	23.60	Rehabilitation of the South.
1867	140.0	704.0	nom.	704.0	844.0	*37.0	22.80	Extinction of State-bank circulation.
1868	140.0	699.0	nom.	699.0	839.0	*38.0	22.80	Contraction continuos slowly.
1869	140.0	692.0	nom.	692.0	832.0	†39.1	21.20	Contraction continues slowly.
1870	152.8	704.0	nom.	704.0	856.4	38.6	22.20
1871	136.7	723.7	nom.	723.7	860.4	39.6	21.70	Great Chicago fire; loss $150,000,000.

TABLE A.—Showing the currency of the United States, &c.—Continued.

Year.	Coin.	United States and national-bank notes.	State-bank notes.	Total paper.	Total currency.	Population.	Currency, per capita.	Remarks.
1872	$128.1	$741.4	nom.	$741.4	$869.5	40.6	$21.40	Great Boston fire; loss $80,000,000.
Jan. '73	130.0	752.0	nom.	752.0	882.0	41.7	21.10	Silver demonetized; panic;
Oct. '73	140.0	762.0	$20.0	872.0	922.0	41.7	22.10	$20,000,000 State-bank clearing-house certificates and $10,000,000 Treasury reserves issued as currency; gold imported.
1874	140.0	761.1	nom.	761.1	901.1	42.9	21.00	Contraction continued.
1875	142.0	736.3	nom.	736.3	878.3	44.1	19.90	Contraction continued.

*In these years the coin was all of silver; no gold. (Report of Mr. White, H. Rep. 21st Cong., 2d sess., No. 95.) In the year 1830 coins in bank $15,000,000, silver in circulation $8,000,000, bank-notes $77,000,000; total $100,000,000. (Senate Rep., 21st Cong, 2d sess., Dec. 5, 1830, by Mr. Sanford, from Select Com. on Cur.)

*According to censuses taken in 1866, 1867, and 1868, by the Bureau of Statistics, through the Internal Revenue organization. The census of 1870 shows a smaller population than that of 1869, but the discrepancy is attributed to the different means and methods adopted to effect the enumerations. The figures subsequent to 1870 are based upon the census of that year.

†Estimates based on census of 1868.

FAILURES IN BUSINESS.

The following table (B) is from the Mercantile Agency Reports, and shows that the number of failures in business in all the States of the Union has closely followed the movement of the currency:

Years.	Movement of currency.	Failures.
1850	Increasing	3,913
1860	Increasing	3,673
1861	Decreasing	6,993
1862	Increasing	1,652
1863	Increasing	485
1868	Decreasing	2,6 8
1869	Decreasing	2,799
1870	Decreasing	3,551
1871	Decreasing	2,915
1872	Decreasing	4,060
1873	Decreasing	5,183
1874	Decreasing	5,830
1875	Decreasing	7,740

There were but few failures during the rapid increment of the curreny from 1862 to 1866. Since that period the number of failures has steadily and largely increased, until now it is 7,740 per annum, and during the first three months of 1876 it was 2,806, or at the rate of 11,224 per annum.

The failures in New York City, taken by itself, were as follows: 1871, 324; 1872, 385; 1873, 644; 1874, 645; 1875, 951; and during the first three months of 1876, 313.

TABLE C.—Fires in New York City.

Period.	No. of years in period.	Currency during the period.	Average annual No. fires.
1856–1860	5	Increasing	653
1861	1	Decreasing	827
1862–1866	5	Increasing	720
1867	1	Decreasing	1,012
1868	1	Decreasing	912
1869	1	Decreasing	914
1870	1	Decreasing	867
1871	1	Decreasing	916
1872	1	Decreasing	922
1873	1	Decreasing	1,017
1874	1	Decreasing	841
1875	1	Decreasing	1,093
Annual average, 1867 to 1875, inclusive			944

The number of these fires which were of incendiary origin are only given for the years 1855 to 1860, inclusive. They were as follows: 1855, 159; 1856, 100; 1857, 87; 1858, 90; 1859, 68; 1860, 110. The ratio of incendiary to total fires during this period was about 30 per cent. According to the New York insurance reports it is believed to be now over 50 per cent.

MARRIAGES.

The correspondence between marriages and the price of bread-corn was shown statistically some forty years ago by the illustrious Quetelet. The following table shows the correspondence between marriages and the movement of the currency. Ohio is one of the few States of the Union in which social statistics are compiled under official authority:

TABLE D.—Showing the number of marriages in Ohio.

Year.	Movement of currency.	Marriages.
1859	Increasing	22,671
1860	Perturbation	23,106
1861	Decreasing	22,251
1862	Increasing	19,540
1863	Increasing	19,300
1864	Increasing	20,881
1865	Increasing	22,198
1866	Increasing	30,479
1867	Decreasing	29,230
1868	Decreasing	28,231
1869	Decreasing	23,910
1870	Decreasing	25,459
1871	Decreasing	24,627
1872	Decreasing	26,303
1873	Decreasing	26,460
1874	Decreasing	26,678
1875	Decreasing	27,047

The population of the State of Ohio was, in 1850, 1,980,329; in 1860, 2,339,511; and in 1870, 2,665,260.

The decrease of marriages accompanying the diminution of currency which has gone on since 1866 is complemented by a corresponding increase of divorces.

DIVORCES.

TABLE E.—Showing the number of divorces in Ohio.

Year.	Currency.	Divorces.
1866–1869, (average three years)	Decreasing	1,003
1870	Decreasing	1,008
1871	Decreasing	1,077
1872	Decreasing	1,026
1873	Decreasing	1,124
1874	Decreasing	1,159
1875	Decreasing	1,299

The above evidences of "hard times" are supplemented by the statistics of desperate and criminal acts, all of which have constantly diminished while the currency of the country was increasing, and increased while the currency was decreasing.

HOMICIDES AND SUICIDES.

Table F.—Showing the number of inquests held upon homicides and suicides in Ohio.

Period.	Currency.	Homicides and suicides.
1858–1860, (average 3 years)	Increasing	144
1861	Decreasing	190
1862–1865, (average 4 years)	Increasing	162
1866–1869, (average 4 years)	Decreasing	182
1870	Decreasing	.....
1871	Decreasing	198
1872	Decreasing	211
1873	Decreasing	206
1874	Decreasing	219
1875	Decreasing	261

SUICIDES.

TABLE G.—Showing the suicides in the city of New York.

Year.	Currency.	Suicides.
1866	Decreasing	58
1867	Decreasing	76
1868	Decreasing	98
1869	Decreasing	102
1870	Decreasing	101
1871	Decreasing	114
1872	Decreasing	144
1873	Decreasing	118
1874	Decreasing	.....
1875	Decreasing	157

TABLE H.—Showing the suicides in the city of Philadelphia.

Year.	Suicides.	Average.	Currency.
1860		20	Perturbation.
1861		31	Decreasing.
1862	14		Increasing.
1863	24		Increasing.
1864	20	22	Increasing.
1865	31		Increasing.
1866	44		Decreasing.
1867	35		Decreasing.
1868	29		Decreasing.
1869	45	38	Decreasing.
1870	25		Decreasing.
1871	41		Decreasing.
1872	48		Decreasing.
1873		47	Decreasing.
1874		59	Decreasing.
1875		68	Decreasing.

PRISONERS.

TABLE I.—Showing the number of persons in prison in all the United States in June of each of the years 1850, 1860, and 1870, such being the periods at which the last three decennial censuses were taken.

Period.	Movement of currency.	Population.	Persons in prison.
1850	Increasing	23,191,876	6,737
1860	Perturbation	31,443,323	19,086
1870	Decreasing	38,558,371	32,904

Transfer of the Indian Bureau.

SPEECH OF HON. ANSEL T. WALLING,

OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

April 21, 1876,

On the bill (H. R. No. 2677) to transfer the Bureau of Indian Affairs from the Interior to the War Department.

Mr. WALLING. Mr. Speaker, I feel, sir, that I cannot let this discussion close on the bill to transfer the Indian Bureau to the War Department without giving to the House and, through its records, to the people of the district I have the honor to represent on this floor, and to the country, the reasons that are conclusive to my mind why the bill should not pass and the transfer be not made.

Living, as I do, in a city whose spires overlook the once location of three at least of the historic villages of the red man—and that within the recollection of the living—who occupied the lands of a valley that was not surpassed in fertility in all our proud domain for supplying their few and simple wants, when added to the rewards of the chase—where the river which flows through its alluvial borders ever carries in its name the remembrance of the native proprietors of the soil; where with the ever-recurring season the plow still brings to the surface the relics alike of their semi-civilization and their progress in the arts of war; almost within sight of the "Logan elm," under the shade of which Logan, the friend of the white man, the chief of the proudest tribe of his nation, his wives, children, and family, every one murdered in cold blood upon a trivial provocation by the military commander, in giving assent to a treaty which forced the remnant of the tribes under his control from the grounds of their fathers and the homes of their childhood, in his utter desolation and despair gave vent to his reproaches in the memorable language preserved by Jefferson, and which justly smote the unfeeling conscience of the age:

> I appeal to any white man to say if ever he entered Logan's cabin hungry and he gave him not meat; if ever he came cold and naked and he clothed him not. During the course of the last long and bloody war Logan remained idle in his cabin, an advocate for peace. Such was my love for the whites that my countrymen pointed as they passed and said "Logan is the friend of white men." I had even thought to have lived with you but for the injuries of one man. Colonel Cresap, the last spring, in cold blood and unprovoked, murdered all the relatives of Logan, not even sparing my women and children.

Knowing, Mr. Speaker, that the military Cresaps still exist and have come down to us of the present day under other names, as the records of the times too abundantly prove, it seemed to me my voice as well as my vote should be heard in remonstrance against the measure, though I am compelled reluctantly to disagree with the majority of the Committee on Indian Affairs, and with some other of my political friends on this floor.

To my mind the discussion of the merits of the bill naturally and necessarily divides itself into three propositions:

1. That it is in spirit, if not in letter, in contravention of the fair intendment, if not the text, of our treaty stipulations with this unfortunate and helpless, because defenseless, race.

2. That it is a violation of our duties as trustees of a self-imposed trust, created without the consent, and against the wishes of the beneficiaries of the trust.

3. That the Army, by education, organization, and example wherever exercising civil powers of government, is not well fitted for the charitable duties sought to be imposed upon it by the bill under consideration.

Notwithstanding the very considerable debate thus far, both favorable and adverse to this bill, I fear that its discussion does not awaken that general interest here that almost any other subject would excite. The race of people whose welfare is involved do not make up a great, powerful, and popular constituency directly represented on this floor. The twelfth article, however, of the earliest Indian treaty under the Constitution, concluded in 1785, stipulated, in order "that the Indians may have full confidence in the justice of the United States respecting their interests, they shall have the right to send a deputy of their choice whenever they think fit to Congress." That right was never conceded them, and their interests seem to have been guarded by "deputy," and by representative, with an eye more single to the amount of money to be made, or saved, to the Government, than to the welfare of the Indians.

In considering the propositions which I have stated adverse to the bill, it ought not to be ignored that the Indian race, at the time of our original settlements on the Atlantic coast, were the sole possessors of the soil by absolute title and occupation of the whole of the territory of the United States. Then the smoke of their wigwams and council-fires rose in every valley and upon every mountain-side from the East to the West and from either ocean to the Mississippi and the lakes. Yet to-day how small a proportion of the American people can say they have ever seen even one of this remarkable race! Everywhere at our approach they have been seen to fade and disappear like the withered leaves of the forest before the autumn gale.

We were permitted to make a first settlement, to gain a foothold, only through their friendliness and forbearance, since which time, by solemn and formal treaties—treaties so called—which have now come to be illusory paper contracts merely, tendered them by the left hand for their acceptance, while in the right hand was held the sword to exterminate them if they refused, they have been driven onward, step by step, and year by year, and alternately by means of the last resort and arbitrament of rapacious power, from the kindly shores of the East, where they once dried their nets in peace, to perish at the sterile base of the Rocky Mountains. And by the reflex wave of American civilization they are likewise driven from the Pacific coast to pitch their tents on the barren slopes of the Sierras, at last to be "cabined, cribbed, confined" in that inhospitable region between the two. And even there they find neither security nor protection. The cupidity of the dominant race has honey-combed that auriferous region for its precious metals; has "hunted, sweat, and bled for gold;" has seized upon all the arable lands by Mexican title or subsidy, and finally reaches this Hall the anxious advocate of this bill. For what? That the temptation and occasion for revenge, which may be forced on the Indian, will lead him eventually to overt acts and thus furnish a pretext for a final war of extermination against him by the Army.

No treaty, from the earliest in colonial history, has contained a provision admitting such transfer, and where stipulations are not to the contrary they, by fair intendment, are to that effect. In each treaty, from that made by the good Roger Williams, a fugitive from the religious intolerance of the Massachusetts colony, with the Indians of the Providence Plantations, in addition to the immediate consideration of the cession, was the further consideration that the Government was to protect and assist them in the arts and ways of peace, to instruct and educate them, and so far as possible extend the blessings of civil government among them. There are three hundred and seventy Indian treaties remaining in force now on the statute-books of the United States. From that of the Cherokees, in 1792, stipulating that "there shall be perpetual peace and friendship between all the citizens of the United States of America and all the individuals composing the whole Cherokee Nation of Indians," down to the last one, ratified the 24th of February, 1869, with the different tribes of the Sioux, by the peace commissioners of 1868, which stipulated "from this day forward all war between the parties to this agreement shall forever cease, and the Government of the United States desires peace, and its honor is hereby pledged to keep it," down the long line of a hundred years, the national promise of peace and protection to the Indians has been the same.

And is it to be supposed that had the various tribes with which these treaties were made not fairly understood that they were in no event to be turned over to their native antipathy and aversion, the military power, they would have consented voluntarily to relinquish their lands to become wanderers on the barren wastes they received in exchange for them?

These existing treaties are a code of laws establishing the rights and obligations between the Government and the Indians. By them numerous reservations have been set apart to individuals and tribes, with provisions as to time and manner of adjustment of title and possession, as well as provisions for money, varying in time and manner of payment; some for funding on long time, some for all time, some for holding bonds of the United States in trust, some for the bonds of States and other special securities, which have depreciated or are wholly worthless to the tribes for whom they are held. Numerous treaties provide for the payment in kind, in farm implements, cattle, grain, salt, and other commodities, perishable or to be consumed. Others are for clothing, for the education of children in limited numbers, and for stated periods; for building houses, locating agencies, and for traders, teachers, carpenters, blacksmiths, and farmers.

All of the treaties relinquish, cede, or convey, extensive and valuable lands to the United States at nominal prices, for which these obligations and promises of the Government are the only consideration. Are the soldiers the best agents to discharge these obligations? All of these treaties provide for the protection by the United States of the persons and property of the Indians from the intrusion of whites and from hostile bands and tribes. Some treaties confer a title in fee to land exchanged and sold to Indians, others with less title, and still others grant a reservation only. But in all these treaties the United States have fully recognized the power and the right of the Indians, and the validity of the contracts, by grasping their part of the proceeds—proceeds from which Territories have been created, States have been erected, continental railways have been built, thousands of millions have been paid into the Treasury, and the dominion of the United States has been extended to the farther sea.

The Government ought not to do less than continue to carry out these treaties in good faith. "For," in the language of the Supreme Court in Fletcher vs. Peck, "the Government to pronounce its own deed invalid, whatever may be assigned for its invalidity, must be considered as a mere act of power, which must find its vindication in a train of reasoning not often heard in courts of justice."

Mr. Speaker, ought we to regard the Indian as one of the opposing forces only in the pathway of modern civilization, to be swept away without regard to his rights and with a deaf ear to his demands for redress of his grievances? Ought we to advance so swiftly as to involve his final ruin and utter extermination? Is he to have no standing-place that shall impede or delay the rapid strides of western enterprise toward a complete occupation of the whole American continent? Shall civilization outrun justice, instead of waiting hand in hand upon her patient steps?

I maintain that the frame-work of the truest civilization is based upon the principles of eternal justice, the object of which is to confer the benefits and blessings of civilized life upon all within its reach. That civilization which brings peace, liberty, and enduring fame is the one which gathers up, absorbs, and cares for the untutored, the ignorant, the oppressed, and even the savage, and which brings to all the poor and lowly classes the charms of a Christian life.

I believe this is the kind and degree of civilization which is to mark anew the present era; at least I am certain it is that only which duty urges us to foster and to propagate. I believe that public opinion in the near future will compel all of us to admit the fact that the North American Indian under the influence of proper treatment will not only be improved by our efforts to bring him to a higher civilization, but will rejoice in its acceptance. This almost boundless continent is broad enough to afford homes for the native as well as the foreign races. Why, then, should the American race be driven from the forests which for a thousand years have sheltered it, and from the valleys, lakes, and rivers which for centuries have given it food? There ought not to be a possible doubt on this question. If the Caucasian and the Ethiopian can sit down together in this House, men and brethren, why shall not the native American have a chance? Justice and fair-dealing will ultimately convince all of us that the Indian is not an exception to the decree that there were made "of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth." The harmonization of races on this continent has been so rapid and their progress so great as to lend significance and verity to the prophetic declaration.

Mr. Speaker, I think these considerations which I have briefly presented ought to convince the unprejudiced mind that it is the duty of this Government to fulfill its treaty obligations strictly, and discharge its trust to the Indians agreeably to the spirit and intendment of those treaties. If it is true that history is philosophy teaching by example, we are to judge of the policy of the past by the results and conditions of the present, and draw from thence the rule and economy which ought to guide us in the future.

I shall assume for my present purpose what has been hitherto admitted, that from the year 1666 down to 1866 there was a constant diminution of the Indian tribes, amounting to an average yearly decline over the increase of 10,000 souls. The total estimate two centuries ago was two and a quarter millions within the present limits of the territory of the United States, excluding Alaska. The number now remaining, according to the best authority within my observation, does not exceed 250,000. I submit the following estimate from the Indian Office, showing the population of tribes residing on reservations over which the Government exercises more or less official intercourse and control. This table shows the number of Indians to be 244,217, but does not include the roving bands which make their habitations in the ranges of the Sierras and the Rocky Mountains; nor does it include those of Alaska, the whole of which may be estimated at 50,000. These are wholly wild Indians over which the Government has neither intercourse nor control. The total general estimate has been as high as 300,000, but a considerable reduction may well be made for those not actually known and counted. A census of sixty-six tribes within the limits of Utah, Nevada, Arizona, California, and Idaho, in 1874, by Major Powell, where it was supposed there were 30,000, shows that there were actually found but 10,437; so that with this recent evidence 250,000 is a large estimate for all the Indians in the United States.

Table showing the population of Indian tribes residing on reservations.

States or Territories.	Population.	Area.
		Sq. miles.	Acres.
Washington	14,192	6,460.65	4,134,695.38
Oregon	7,720	9,788.00	6,264,320.00
California	2,799	111.50	71,363.00
Arizona	6,970	8,822.00	5,646,080.00
Nevada	6,000	4,025.00	2,576,000.00
Utah	4,800	3,186.00	2,039,040.00
New Mexico	14,948	7,237.00	4,631,664.00
Colorado	5,000	23,100.00	14,784,000.00
Dakota	34,867	57,450.00	36,768,000.00
Idaho	4,984	5,010.00	3,206,400.00
Montana	33,135	52,704.00	33,858,600.00
Wyoming	2,000	4,200.00	2,688,000.00
Nebraska	6,598	1,402.92	897,871.88
Kansas	972	581.04	371,865.39
Indian Territory	71,150	68,991.00	44,154,240.00
Minnesota	7,803	8,976.92	5,745,233.07
Wisconsin	6,043	938.26	600,489.36
Michigan	9,164	1,221.00	781,905.00
New York	5,070	139.90	89,537.00
Total	244,217	264,345.19	159,309,304.08

The allotment of land to these Indians on the various reservations amounts to seven hundred and twenty-nine acres per capita, which is more than sufficient in quantity, but is of little practical use without cultivation and improvement in the arts of husbandry. The proceeds of the sales of their unrequired lands ought to be applied to their education and further civilization. As to their present condition, I find that 100,000 of them are considered to be civilized, the same number have made large progress toward civilization, and the remainder are but semi-barbarous. One hundred and thirty thousand support themselves upon their reservations, receiving nothing from the Government except interest upon annuities, the proceeds of lands ceded to the United States. Thirty thousand are wholly, and 80,000 in part, are subsisted by the Government. Those who gain their subsistence by hunting and fishing, and from roots, nuts, berries, wild food, and grasshoppers, number from forty to fifty thousand. There are 150,000 Indians who remain constantly on their reservations under complete control of their agents, and obey the regulations and orders of the Government; 90,000 who hold terms and intercourse with their agents, visiting frequently for food and council, but are generally roaming and hunting on or off their reservations. And there are supposed to be 50,000 remaining who never visit any agency and who are still uncontrolled and uninfluenced by the Government. They are for the most part peaceful and quiet, and commit but few acts of hostility against the whites.

Of the whole number of Indians 180,000 have treaties with the Government; 40,000 have none, but reservations are set apart for their occupancy, and agents appointed to look after them. Twenty-five thousand have no reservations, but still are in charge of agents appointed for them, and receive more or less assistance from the Government.

The annual expense of the Indians and the Indian Office is upward of $5,000,000, but at least two-fifths of that amount is in accordance with stipulations of treaties which provide for the payment and the appropriation.

It has been said that the recent rapid increase of this expenditure arose from the greed and avarice of the combination known as the Indian ring, and that much of it has been diverted from its true appropriation and has been unfaithfully disbursed. That there has been gross peculation and unfaithful administration in these affairs there is reason to fear. But that responsibility does not rest with this House, and I take none of it upon myself. I have faith that the Indian Committee will to the furthest extent of their patience and ingenuity investigate the subject and expose to the country the full volume and depth of the frauds against the Treasury, the impositions against the Indians, and the unlawful profits of the ring. Confessing in sadness that such is the fact, sorrowing that public officers of the Government should be willing to betray so sacred a trust, nevertheless I have yet confidence in that ever-changing, amending, expelling, and restoring principle, reform. Even now there is hope of it.

My friend, the Representative of the first district of Kentucky, who urges this transfer to be made, and whose argument in favor of the bill was so persuasive as to go far toward the fatal accomplishment, expresses the opinion that "the present Commissioner at the Indian Office is an honorable exception to the rule, and that there is reason to believe that he is an honest man." The country will be glad to hear and believe this evidence. I am glad to believe it, for the sullied honor and purity of my own State is involved in the imputed transactions of the Indian ring. I would investigate those transactions on all sides and leave no dark place and no corner concealed. The American name has been aspersed, and republican honor has been hawked at with grave and offensive charges in almost every department of the public service. These things have been spread before the world. Let the world know the truth and know who the guilty persons are, no matter at what public cost or what private inconvenience. The people require this. An imperative demand for honest government is heard all over the land. Public opinion has with significant unanimity sustained those who insisted upon a thorough investigation of the abuses of the Government, to the end that they shall not only be made to cease, but become impossible hereafter.

But this question does not necessarily enter into this debate. For myself, I am not prepared to admit that officers and agents from civil life, not educated at the Military Academy, are less faithful or capable in civil administration than those of the regular Army. But I am unwilling to keep back part of the truth: that the treaties of General Sherman and the peace commissioners of 1868—the last treaties made, and the last to be made, under the present policy of the Government with the various bands of the Sioux Nation, with the Utes, Kiowas, Comanches, Cheyennes, Arapahoes, Crows, Navajoes, Blackfeet, Shoshones, Bannacks, Sheepeaters, and other Indians of the plains, which ended the Indian wars of that period, extinguished the Indian titles and reclaimed and populated the Territories of Dakota, Wyoming, Montana, Idaho, Utah, Arizona, and New Mexico—imposed an additional expenditure of $3,000,000. The policy of entering into these treaties was the policy of the United States at the time. Neither this House nor the democratic party of the country is responsible for it. But it is now too late to complain of the expense and keep the treaty at the same time; and I am for preserving inviolate the deliberate written contracts and pledged faith of the Government to the Indians. Since these treaties were made comparative peace has prevailed among those tribes, where before there was continued war, and at least two of the Territories have prepared to become States. As a measure of economy, as well as safety, I cannot therefore complain of the treaties of the peace commissioners of 1868.

Of the two alternatives, to purchase peace by the treaties or to pay for an Indian war, it may well be claimed that the Government chose the cheapest and the best. For, from the well-known character and history of the Indian, we may be sure that, driven to desperation through want and starvation, he will not tamely submit to his fate, but will strike his fiercest blows, at the cost of hundreds of lives of the settlers and pioneers within his reach. And a war of this kind, as it has been found in all the past, is still a costly experiment.

Our duty seems to be twofold: First, to protect the white settler; secondly, to do justice to the Indian, and by doing him justice, in a spirit of kindness, advance him in civilization. As he cannot be driven any farther west, nor to any new point, and as removal is an exhausted resource, and of no further advantage to the Government, these duties must be performed by locating the Indians on reservations, making allotments of land, and surrounding those reservations with white men and white settlements.

Other nations have had success in this experiment; and as the fruit of the Spanish peace policy, the Pueblo tribe of New Mexico is to-day one of the most industrious and civilized tribes on this continent. But we have achieved equal results ourselves. The Cherokees, Choctaws, Chickasaws, Creeks, and Seminoles are each a civilized and Christian people. They have just and equal laws and a literature. They have schools and academies of learning. They lack no element of Christian civilization, and they possess the comforts, wealth, and refinements of modern American life. They lack only the power to enforce their just rights against this Government, which have never been fairly awarded to them.

I am satisfied that the true solution of the vexed Indian question lies in justice, kindness, and Christian brotherhood to these people. If this be the best policy, leaving out of consideration the missionary duties which philanthropy has so long and patiently assumed and discharged, the question remains, what is the best means to produce this result?

That is the question of this bill. In my judgment, if the true policy is peace and civilization, as I believe it to be, the Indian should be wholly under the management of the civil department of the Government. But if, on the other hand, you are determined on a further war of extermination, this bill should pass, and the guardianship of this race should go to that Department organized for war. For this there is some authority, some examples in history, and some credible testimony. The peace commission, under the act of July 20, 1867, which made the expensive treaties of 1868 with the Sioux and other tribes, embraced military officers of a high rank, at the head of which was the present General of the Army, a man of distinguished fame and capability both in military and in civil affairs. On the 7th of January, 1868, that commission submitted its report to the President, which is comprised in Executive Document No. 97, House of Representatives, second session of the Fortieth Congress. On pages 20 and 21 I find the following expression of opinion on this subject.

2. This brings us to consider the much-mooted question whether the Bureau should belong to the civil or military department of the Government. To determine this properly we must first know what is to be the future treatment of the Indians. If we intend to have war with them, the Bureau should go to the Secretary of War. If we intend to have peace, it should be in the civil department. In our judgment, such wars are wholly unnecessary, and hoping that the Government and the country will agree with us we cannot now advise the change. It is possible, however, that, despite our efforts to maintain peace, war may be forced on us by some tribe or tribes of Indians. In the event of such occurrence it may be well to provide, in the revision of the intercourse laws or elsewhere, at what time the civil jurisdiction shall cease and the military jurisdiction begin. If thought advisable, also, Congress may authorize the President to turn over to the military the exclusive control of such tribes as may be continually hostile or unmanageable. Under the plan which we have suggested the chief duties of the Bureau will be to educate and instruct in the peaceful arts; in other words, to civilize the Indians. The military arm of the Government is not the most admirably adapted to discharge duties of this character. We have the highest possible appreciation of the officers of the Army and fully recognize their proverbial integrity and honor, but we are satisfied that not one in a thousand would like to teach Indian children to read and write or Indian men to sow and reap. These are emphatically civil, and not military, occupations. But it is insisted that the present Indian service is corrupt, and this change should be made to get rid of the dishonest. That there are many bad men connected with the service cannot be denied. The records are abundant to show that agents have pocketed the funds appropriated by the Government and driven the Indians to starvation. It cannot be doubted that Indian wars have originated from this cause. The Sioux war in Minnesota is supposed to have been produced in this way. For a long time these officers have been selected from partisan ranks, not so much on account of honesty and qualification as for devotion to party interests and their willingness to apply the money of the Indian to promote the selfish schemes of local politicians.

This military authority is certainly considerable. It is testimony from an impartial source, and was written and submitted by Generals Sherman, Harney, Terry, and Augur, and by Messrs. Taylor, Henderson, Sanborn, and Tappan, gentlemen long familiar with the Indian service, whose duty it was to give to the subject their most careful consideration, and whose reputations were involved in discharging their duties creditably as well as conscientiously. What has since occurred to change public opinion in favor of the present bill? Is it the peculations of the Indian ring and the maladministration of Indian affairs? I know of no other plausible answer, and to this I reply it is the duty of the democratic party and of the country to reform the service and "reform it altogether;" not by a war upon the Indian, but by war of extermination against the Indian ring and its supporters and coadjutors in office. No halting, doubting, or hesitating mind need cherish fears that the people are not now ready, yea, anxious and clamorous for reform in this and all branches of the public service. The calling and election of this House was for radical reform; and which, I have the confidence to say, has already made its enduring mark upon the public mind. That mark is one of public approval. But I would fain convince that public that the mailed hand of military power is not the gentlest or the best one to guide its Indian affairs along the narrow pathway to reform. Military force may keep the peace for a time, and the civil policy admits of the use of the Army against the Indians as against the whites when the necessary occasion requires it, just as we use the sheriff and his posse to quell the riotous and the turbulent. But this power alone has no elements of civilization. It can but overcome brute force and allay bloody opposition, preparing the way for civilizing influences, as the plowshare buries the cumbrous and noxious weeds to give place to the seed of the husbandman. And after its deathly work is done, a more kindly agency than this must carry on the grand work of reclaiming the Indian from barbarism and leading him onward and upward to civilization.

For the seventeen years that the War Department had control of this business there were constant Indian wars. The legend and story of all the northwestern territory is of Indian wars and border conflicts. Volumes of these animating histories have been written. Heroes are still the namesakes of heroic chiefs. Two hundred and nineteen counties and villages have been named in memory of the chivalric deeds of border captains and defenders against the Indians. Lost tribes are yet known in the names of the lakes and rivers. They were ever on the war-path during the control of the War Department. Is there any guarantee for peace or a better future under the same circumstances? Is there a greater cruelty to be inflicted on the regular Army than to compel it to live out among the Indians and to take upon itself the work of teaching them the arts of peace? What field is there on Indian reservations for the achievement of military renown, which is the true ambition of the soldier? His duties and his desires are threefold; to kill the enemy, to kill time, and to merit promotion. Both officer and soldier as a rule, we should think, would despise this kind of work. It is averse to their education, their ambition, and the spirit of their professional duties. One fact may be stated, that while the Indian affairs were under the War Department at least seven years were spent in costly, unprofitable, and unjust wars against the Seminoles and the Sacs and Foxes; as also in vexatious contentions with the Creeks and Cherokees. And nearly all the wars under the civil administration have had their origin in the hasty and ill-considered action of military officers and soldiers stationed in the Indian country—wars which patience and prudence would have reconciled and avoided.

This fact was so well exemplified and proved by the author of the minority report against this bill (Judge WILSHIRE, of the Committee on Indian Affairs) that I will not go over the ground so ably occupied by him. This salient fact is shown, that in a seven-years war with seven hundred Seminoles, we lost fifteen hundred enlisted men, spent $50,000,000, and gained nothing. Not a Seminole was removed; not one was civilized, except in their experience of successful warfare against the regular Army.

Now I might detain the House for a full hour by the recital of the many unfortunate conflicts we have had with various tribes down to the Modoc war, detailing their origin and their cost. But I think enough has been said on this bill against its passage to satisfy impartial men who are interested in it that you cannot civilize the Indian by any superior power, wisdom, or influence of the Army; nor can you save money to the Government.

If Indian extermination is to be again resorted to, it is a slow and costly policy; for we have now been in that line of business with the help of the Army for two hundred years, and have not yet succeeded in their complete extermination. And what we have thus far accomplished through the military arm has cost us at least $500,000,000. I have estimated that there may be 250,000 Indians left. If my appraisement of the actual cost of killing an Indian is not extravagant, you will find it necessary to doubly increase the present debt of the nation in the final successful effort to get rid of him. You may exasperate and worry him with the Army to a most distressful condition. You may re-enact the Sand Creek massacre of Colorado, and the Piegan war of four years ago, but you will fail in conquering a peace or in civilizing the wild and barbarous tribes with stores of ordnance and with supplies of ammunition. Only the gateway of civilization opens upon paths of peace.

This bill being enacted, as it is not improbable that it will be, the first notice of this transfer to the Indians will be the winding horn of the cavalry, the clangor of sabers, and the thunder of artillery. Their dreaded Little Father, the Lieutenant-General of the Army and commander of the West, will administer to them the comforting and beneficent civilization that martial law and the will of the Commander-in-Chief shall direct. This short and summary code of procedure has received the latest and most authentic interpretation in the proceedings of the military sitting as a committee of privileges and elections to determine who should be members of the Louisiana Legislature in 1875. I read from Executive Document No. 13, Senate, second session Forty-third Congress, page 17:

[Telegram dated New Orleans, January 5, 1875, received at northeast corner Fourteenth street and Pennsylvania avenue, 4.47 p. m.]

W. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.:

Please say to the President that he need give himself no uneasiness about the condition of affairs here. I will preserve the peace, which it is not hard to do with the naval and military forces in and about the city, and if Congress will declare the White Leagues and other similar organizations, white or black, banditti, I will relieve it from the necessity of any special legislation for the preservation of peace and equality of rights in the States of Louisiana, Mississippi, Arkansas, and the Executive from much of the trouble heretofore had in this section of the country.

I think that the terrorism now existing in Louisiana, Mississippi, and Arkansas could be entirely removed and confidence and fair-dealing established by the arrest and trial of the ringleaders of the armed White Leagues. If Congress would pass a bill declaring them banditti they could be tried by a military commission. The ringleaders of this banditti, who murdered men here on the 14th of last September, and also more recently at Vicksburgh, Mississippi, should, in justice to law and order and the peace and prosperity of this southern part of the country, be punished. It is possible that, if the President would issue a proclamation declaring them banditti, no further action need be taken, except that which would devolve upon me.

P. H. SHERIDAN,
Lieutenant-General United States Army.

If the military jurisprudence recommended by this dispatch was considered good enough for the white and black citizens of Louisiana last year, why may not the same rule be established for the Indians under this bill? Peace is to be preserved by the military forces. The Executive and Congress are relieved of the necessity of any special legislation! How gentle, and humane, and civilizing is the military power! How obliging and condescending to perform all the functions of Government, seize the liberties of the people, and relieve them of the performance of their public and private affairs!

If six years of martial law and civil war, ending in $3,000,000,000 of public debt, are not burdens sufficient for the present day, let Congress pass this bill and re-enforce the military power with this new field of unlimited authority.

Under the rule of good men almost any evil precedent may remain harmless. If they are compelled to use it, they will suffer it to die with the untoward exigency that called it forth. But if you now go on with this business, may there not come a time in the no distant future when the people shall mourn for their lost freedom—lost through the evil example of transferring civil administration into the hands of military authority. Then shall they curse the evil day in which the bad precedent—this fatal departure—was left by us for their humiliation and defeat.

The Cultivation and Preservation of Timber.

SPEECH OF HON. MARK H. DUNNELL,

OF MINNESOTA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

April 27, 1876.

In Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

Mr. DUNNELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment:

After the word dollars, in line 1496, add the following words:

Provided, That $2,000 of the above amount shall be expended by the Commissioner of Agriculture as compensation to some man of approved attainments, who is practically well acquainted with methods of statistical inquiry and who has evinced an intimate acquaintance with questions relating to the national wants in regard to timber, to prosecute investigations and inquiries, with the view of ascertaining the annual amount of consumption, importation, and exportation of timber and other forest-products, the probable supply for future wants, the means best adapted to their preservation and renewal, the influence of forests upon climate, and the measures that have been successfully applied in foreign countries, or that may be deemed applicable in this country, for the preservation and restoration or planting of forests; and to report upon the same to the Commissioner of Agriculture, to be by him in a separate report transmitted to Congress.

Mr. Chairman, the time allowed me under the five-minute rule in which to support this amendment, will be wholly inadequate to a proper presentation of the arguments which exist for its adoption. When my time has expired, I shall ask the committee to allow me to print the balance of my remarks.

The cultivation and preservation of timber constitute an eminently practical subject. The manifold uses of the various woods, the influence of the forests upon the climates and their preservation and renewal, should not escape the attention of Congress. We shall neglect a great material interest if we do not properly foster it. This amendment does not add a single dollar to the amount named in the paragraph, but only diverts a small fraction of it to the purposes set forth in the amendment.

I am happy to say that the Committee on Appropriations have assured me that they will not object to the proviso. Timber culture, within the past few years, has been discussed and acted upon by Congress, many of the State Legislatures, and more of the agricultural societies of the country.

The rapid diminution of some of the most valuable timbers, because the most common in use, such as white pine, has been one cause for this action. The treeless prairies of the West have been heard. The winds which sweep over them have demanded the break which standing forests always furnish.

The failing streams and springs in many of the Eastern States have also conspired to usher in a consideration of the timber question, which for years has been scientifically canvassed in many countries of Europe. The schools of forestry in Germany and France and many other foreign nations, attest the truth of this statement.

The pending amendment has in view an entirely useful result. It looks to investigations and inquiry with a view to ascertain the annual amount of consumption, importation, and exportation of timber and other forest products; the probable supply for future wants and the best means for their renewal. This is right, for it recognizes timber as a material more used and more needed than any other in the great interests of commerce and agriculture.

Timber is the handmaid of civilization. Indeed, without it, there could have been no escape from the rudeness of savage life. We have legislated in the interest of all the metals. The annual timber production exceeds that of any one of the metals. It is far more essential to national prosperity than either one of them. How to preserve it from waste and how to renew it when exhausted by legitimate consumption, are very important questions. That they may be answered correctly, investigations are needed, facts must be brought into play. We need a man who is well acquainted with the methods of statistical inquiry. The small amount named in the amendment, will give to the whole country a separate report giving facts, the result of all observations, the practical experience of individuals, societies, and schools, supplemented by the best methods to be adopted for cultivation and preservation.

The public mind has become aroused to the transcendent importance of this subject. There is, however, in our libraries and in our own language, a lack of information. The people are anxious to obtain it.

On the 18th of last January, I introduced into the House a bill (H. R. No. 1013) for the appointment of a commissioner for inquiring into the destruction of forests and into the measures necessary for the preservation of timber. Since that date, I have received letters from many of the States asking for the bill and for the source of information upon the object embraced in it.

An objection exists to the multiplication of Federal officers. The amendment which I now propose recognizes this objection. No new office is created. It seeks to secure specific, well-arranged, and useful information. I sincerely hope that there will be no opposition to it.

It is not my purpose, in a further discussion of the advantages which will result from an adoption of this amendment, to give my own reasonings, but largely present facts and statistics collected from such sources as have been at my command.

The quantities of timber consumed each year are startling. Lumber statistics therefore must be used to show how absolutely necessary it is that the supply be kept good.

Before presenting these allow me, sir, to allude briefly to the acts of Congress regarding timber. In 1817 Congress passed the first act for the preservation of live-oak and red cedar for naval purposes, with penalties for cutting and destroying trees. In 1831 another act was passed to arrest spoliation. In 1855 the management of the timber interests was transferred to the General Land Office, and the local land officers were charged with the duty of protecting our timber. A full letter of instructions was issued to them by the then Commissioner of the General Land Office, Hon. Thomas A. Hendricks.

The act to encourage the growth on the western prairies approved March 3, 1873, was the last legislation, and merely protects individuals in their rights to a quarter section of land, who shall plant, protect, and keep in a healthy condition for ten years the trees called for by the act.

The American Association for the Advancement of Science, at its annual session in 1873, adopted a memorial to Congress upon the cultivation of timber and the preservation of forests.

February 14, 1874, the President in a special message transmitted this message to Congress. It was referred to the House Committee on Public Lands. This committee, March 17, 1874, submitted a report upon the same and unanimously recommended the passage of an act for the appointment of a commissioner of forestry.

The House, for the reasons already hinted at, did not sustain the committee.

The report of the committee, prepared largely by Franklin B. Hough, M. D., of New York, and George B. Emmerson, LL.D., of Massachusetts, a committee of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, was full and replete with exceedingly valuable information. The usual edition was quickly exhausted, and an extra issue of five thousand was ordered by Congress. This report was called for from every State in the Union. Hon. Mr. Vogel, in the New Zealand house of representatives, quoted from it in a speech made by him September 14, 1874, upon New Zealand forests. The Edinburgh Review for October last has a review of the speech of Mr. Vogel and recites the following facts derived in part from the report:

We should remember that the great demand which must hereafter come upon the forest reserves of the world for fuel is as yet comparatively unfelt.

In the United States, indeed, the 60,000 miles of railway now in use or soon to be completed make a steady annual demand for combustion as well as for construction.

To give 2,500 sleepers to the mile these roads require 150,000,000 of trees, each tree making generally but one sleeper. These sleepers require renewal every five years, making a demand for 30,000,000 of trees per annum.

The estimated distance run each day by trains on all the roads is 308,000 miles. Each engine with an ordinary train consumes about 1¾ cords for every 25 miles. This gives an annual consumption of 6,500,000 cords of wood. The 60,000 miles of railway require, at the rate of 40 poles per mile, 2,400,000 trees. These also decay and will require renewal.

The demand for lumber increases at the rate of 25 per cent. per annum. The fences of the United States are now valued at $1,800,000,000, costing $98,000,000 per annum for repairs and renewals. These are chiefly of wood.

In 1871, 10,000 acres of forest were stripped of their timber to supply fuel for the single city of Chicago.

Sixty-three thousand nine hundred and twenty-eight establishments, employing 393,378 persons and using material to the value of $310,000,000 per annum, were engaged in the year 1869 in manufacturing articles entirely from wood, in addition to the number of 743,840 persons partly employed on wood, and using annually wood to the value of $554,000,000. The estimate given in the speech of Mr. Vogel of $1,000,000,000 per annum as the value of the products drawn from the forests of the United States falls nearly one-third short of these enumerated items, without taking count of the consumption for the railways.

Other estimates are much too low—especially in regard to miles of railroads and needed ties.

The article in the Review from which the above is taken contains forest statistics gathered in every quarter of the globe. The constantly-multiplying uses of wood, the result in part of inventions, render the objects sought by this amendment worthy the study and support of statesmen and philanthropists.

Attention is now called to some of the conclusions of the Committee on Public Lands, as given in the report to which allusion has been made, and also to the reasonings contained in the memorial which called out the report. It must be remembered that these are presented in support of the same result which I seek to secure by my amendment.

The committee say:

After as full an investigation of this question as present opportunities allow, we are convinced that the statements of the memorial are essentially true, and that it is the duty of the Government to take immediate measures for ascertaining the condition and prospects of our timber supply, to the end that the future wants of the country with regard to these great interests, both in their scientific and practical relations, should be thoroughly investigated and made widely known.

In European countries large forests are owned and managed by governments, and elaborate systems of culture have been devised. With us, the greater part of the lands in the older States have already passed into the hands of private owners, and much that remains in the newer States and in the Territories is without timber. The operations of planting and management must, therefore, be left to private enterprise. We do not now recommend the undertaking of this industry by the Government, nor can we foresee that such a measure could ever in future be attempted beyond the reservation of such valuable timber-tracts as remain in our public domains and that may seem to require preservation against injury or depredation.

But, in the great questions of forest economy which we see arising and concerning which our people have everything to learn, we realize the need of every aid to practical success that the experience of older nations in Europe has wrought out and all the benefits that science can confer in rendering success in forest culture and timber economies certain and complete.

There is no way in which this can so effectually be done as by the employment of a man thoroughly competent for the duty, who might be able to bring to his subject the fruits of ripe experience in statistical inquiries and scientific labor, and collect, classify, condense, and make available whatever knowledge there may be found appertaining to the general object.

The memorial of the American Association for the Advancement of Science presents a full statement of the reasons for national, State, and local concern in regard to the question of timber. It compels a consideration of a future supply for fuel and the arts; it suggests the best conception of statesmanship.

Legislation which confines itself to the present alone is not always the best. Not infrequently is that the wisest which ignores the present and interests itself in the future alone.

No argument can be raised against practical legislation. That which makes more certain a supply of whatever the race shall need in the future, for life and the uses of civilized life, is not only practical but is humane. So savagely in the past, have Americans cut down the forests that stood in their way and in the march of agriculture and in the aquisition of wealth, that they should now be asked to cease the work of destruction and commence the work of renewal. Those who are to come after them have rights; they will need houses, fences, and fuel; they will need forests for health as well as use. This generation should do better in this respect than the past; that cut down and too often wasted; this should plant and preserve.

I here quote from the memorial:

That the preservation and growth of timber are a subject of great practical importance to the people of the United States and are becoming every year of more and more consequence from the increasing demand for its use; and that while this rapid exhaustion is taking place there is no effectual provision against waste or the renewal of supply.

We apprehend that the time is not distant when great public injury must result from this cause, and we deem it to be our duty to urge upon the Government the importance of taking timely action in providing against the evils that must otherwise follow.

Besides the economical value of timber for construction, fuel, and the arts, which is obvious without suggestion and must increase with the growth of the nation, there are questions of climate that appear to have a close relation to the presence or absence of woodland shade. The drying up of rivulets which feed our mill-streams and navigable rivers and supply our canals, the failure of the sources which supply our cities with pure water, and the growing tendency to floods and drought, resulting from the unequal distribution of the rain-falls since the cutting off of our forests, are subjects of common observation.

In European countries, especially in Italy, Germany, Austria, and France, where the injuries resulting from the cutting off of timber have long since been realized, the attention of governments has been turned to this subject by the necessities of the case, and conservative measures have in many instances been successfully applied, so that a supply of timber has been obtained by cultivation and other benefits resulting from this measure have been realized.

Special schools of forestry have been established under the auspices of government, and the practical applications of science in the selection of soil and conditions favorable for particular species, and in the planting, care, and removal of timber, are taught and applied, with the view of realizing the greatest benefits at the least expense.

Those who are the most unwilling to look into the future and provide for it by husbanding our present timber supplies, admit that in twenty years building-lumber will be exceedingly scarce, and in many parts of the country now reasonably supplied wholly gone. While they would put off the evil day, they do not deny its approach.

It should not be forgotten that just as the cost of the article increases, in that proportion will diminish in number and profit, many of the trades and occupations of the people. There are now many millions of workers of wood. A thousand million dollars as the value of the products drawn from the forests of the United States in a single year, indicate a fearful consumption. This consumption, while it may indicate prosperity and great national growth, is a just source of concern; for it foretells its own end. Our percentage of woodlands to all other improved and unimproved lands is but 25 per cent. The percentage in Norway is 66, and in Sweden 60 per cent. In this latter country there are not only schools of forestry, but the most stringent laws for the continuance of their lumber supply. Are such laws unreasonable? Are they not pre-eminently wise?

Though the demand for timber increases in the United States at the rate of 25 per cent. annually, and 7,000,000 acres are stripped each year, yet we have no measures in force to make up the loss. The future is left to take care of itself. The spontaneous efforts of nature will not suffice. Let me now ask the attention of the committee to the effect of forests upon rain-falls, and consequently upon the climate. The following statement was made by Dr. Hooker in the Paris Universal Exposition Report in 1863:

There is good reason to think that in tropical countries the removal of wood operates effectually in reducing the rain-fall. There can, at any rate, be no doubt that the presence of forests plays a most important part in storing the rain-fall, and yielding up gradually to the streams a continuous supply of water; a thing, I need hardly say, in a hot country of primary importance. Moreover, the rain is retained by forests on the surface of the ground; it gradually permeates to the subsoil, and so feeds the underground water-bearing strata upon which springs and wells must eventually depend. If the forest is indiscriminately removed, this rain runs off as fast as it falls, and washes away the superficial and fertile soil with it.

I have lately received an account of the deterioration of the climate of some of the Leeward Islands, which affords a melancholy confirmation of what I have urged above.

The contrast between neighboring islands is most striking. The sad change which has befallen the smaller ones is, without doubt, to be ascribed to human agency alone. It is recorded of these that in former times they were clothed with dense forests, and their oldest inhabitants remembered when the rains were abundant and the hills and all uncultivated places were sheltered by dense groves. The removal of the trees was certainly the cause of the present evil.

I ask attention to the following extract from the annual message of Governor Hartranft, of Pennsylvania, to the Legislature of that State, in 1874:

I specially invite your attention to an evil of considerable magnitude, which every year grows more aggravated, and in certain regions, at times, is the occasion of serious apprehension and loss. I refer to the wholesale destruction of our forests, the stripping our mountains and hills of their trees, resulting in an enormous diminution of water for mechanical and fertilizing purposes, and in great changes in the normal conditions of temperature and moisture affecting the general health, and at seasons bringing about devastating floods. These consequences, as the effects of this indiscriminate waste, are demonstrable, and a wise legislation will forecast the future, and establish such regulations as will rescue our descendants from the ills a perseverance in this practice will certainly entail upon them.

In Eastern Ohio, it is a common observation that the summers are becoming drier and the streams smaller; some rivers showing considerable decrease in navigability during the last fifty years.

The summers are hotter and the winters colder. This can be referred to the destruction of the forests along the tributaries of the Mississippi. Valencia, in South America, "was formerly situated about one mile and a half from a beautiful lake which was surrounded by a dense forest. The trees were cut away, and in course of time the waters receded to the distance of four and a half miles. The trees were afterward replaced by others, and in about twenty-two years the lake returned to its original boundaries."

Many instances can be furnished where lands, once gardens of freshness, beauty, and fertility, have become utter deserts by the removal of the forests which covered them. Many mill privileges, found at the outlets of ponds and on rivers in the older wooded States, have now disappeared, and the size of the rivers has greatly changed. I would here give a few extracts from the last annual report of the Massachusetts board of agriculture. One contributor to that report says:

There is a good illustration of the effects of the destruction and reproduction of forests in drying up and restoring ponds in my immediate neighborhood. Within about one-half mile of my residence there is a pond upon which mills have been standing for a long time, dating back, I believe, to the first settlement of the town. These have been kept in constant operation until within about twenty or thirty years, when the supply of water began to fail. The pond owes its existence to a stream which has its source in the hills which stretch some miles to the south. Within the time mentioned, these hills, which were clothed with a dense forest, have been almost entirely stripped of trees; and to the wonder and loss of the mill-owners, the water in the pond has failed, except in the season of freshets, and what was never heard of before, the stream itself has been entirely dry. Within the last ten years a new growth of wood has sprung up on most of the land formerly occupied by the old forest; and now the water runs through the year, notwithstanding the great droughts of the last few years, going back from 1856.

Another instance is given:

Such have been the changes in the flow of the Milwaukee River, even while the area from which it receives its supply is but partially cleared, that the proprietors of most of the mills and factories have found it necessary to resort to the use of steam, at a largely increased yearly cost, to supply the deficiency of water-power in dry seasons of the year. The floods of spring are increased until they are sufficient to carry away bridges and dams before deemed secure against their ravages. What has happened to the Milwaukee River has happened to all other water-courses in the State from whose banks the forests have been removed, and many farmers who selected land upon which there was a living brook of clear, pure water, now find the brooks dried up during a considerable portion of the year.

Many fruits which grew in abundance in New England fifty years ago, cannot now be produced there. This is a result not so much from an exhaustion of the soil, as a change in the climate by the felling of the forests.

The winter in the State of Michigan has greatly increased in severity during the last twenty years. This severity seems to keep pace with the cutting off of the forests.

Thirty years ago, the peach, corn, and winter-wheat crops were far more certain and abundant than now.

The influence of belts of trees on local climate is admitted. The statements above made will not be denied; they could be vastly multiplied. The subject of timber challenges consideration. Its destruction, preservation, and renewal constitute a question of supreme importance.

The value of timber, its part in civilized life, are not likely to be overestimated. It is a matter of congratulation that many States have become aroused to tree-planting. The public sentiment which shall sustain the planting of trees will secure their preservation and resist further reckless waste. In the older and the newer, States we now witness a deep interest in the tree question. I do not deem it out of place to mention some facts concerning the State which I have the honor in part to represent on this floor. Within the past two years many hundreds of entries have been made under the act to encourage the growth of timber on the western prairies. This act and the report of the Committee on Public Lands in the Forty-third Congress, to which I have already referred, have also conspired to the formation of a State forestry association. Its officers are among the foremost men of the State. Article 2 of the constitution of the association reads as follows:

The object of this association shall be the encouragement and promotion of forest culture, by the collection and diffusion of practical information on that subject, and by the discussion of all questions pertaining thereto, to secure the general observance of arbor day throughout the State, and to promote the ultimate redemption of the treeless regions of Minnesota.

The association now offers in premiums for the coming arbor day, the first Tuesday in May, the sum of $3,000.

Not less than one million of forest trees were planted last year under the stimulus of $400, besides the tens of thousands not reported. The last Legislature appropriated $2,500 for premiums for the coming month of May.

It was a noble act, and will prove a rich investment. The time will come when our magnificent prairies shall all be occupied by a prosperous and happy people, because to their rich soil, there shall be added the milder winter and an absence of the insecurities attendant upon treeless prairies. God has given us their deep, rich soil and commanded us to break the wind which sweeps over them, to draw the moisture from the passing clouds by planted forests, and so make them the fittest abode for mortals. Then the locust will depart to the treeless region beyond.

The newspapers of the State are teeming with articles of encouragement to every owner of land.

One paper properly says:

Each quarter section should have at least twenty acres of timber, and this year we hope every man who has a farm will commence his centennial forest and each recurring May add a few trees until he covers a sufficient area to supply his farm with timber forever. Though no one now living will live to see what our efforts now will develop into a hundred years hence, the people then will not even suspect that this entire country was once a treeless waste, but the records of the Forestry Association will exist to tell how these prairies were transformed into a new life.

The earnest and intelligent secretary of the association, Hon. Leonard B. Hodges, wrote me recently that "with the aid of the State appropriation, we will arrange a premium list which will set nearly every man, woman, and child in the treeless region of Minnesota at work, and will make our next arbor day something to be proud of;" and elsewhere, speaking of the prosperity of the association, he says:

Every day adds to our strength; ours is a broad church; tree planting is our creed, and no falling from grace. We must have ten thousand members.

Kansas, Nebraska, and some of the Territories are beginning to move in this enterprise.

A few days since the New York Evening Express contained an article headed, "Again we say, plant trees." From this article I take the following:

Temperature, moisture, climate, and pestilence are all mastered in a degree by forests. Our changes in climate not only increase diseases, but produce new ones. The narrowing of the winter-wheat belt and of the fruit zone so as to reduce their areas by millions of acres is also a result of these irregularities. The healing influence of the conifera upon those afflicted with consumption, catarrhal, asthmatic, and throat difficulties is also an important count in the case at issue. The census maps show distinctly the regions where such diseases are especially prevalent, and it is significant to find New England, once so rich in her robes of evergreen, has become the most scourged of any portion of the country and probably of the world—not wholly, perhaps, from the destruction of forests, but partially so at least. The fathers, for gain, tore off this protecting robe, and their children have to bear the consequences.

Governor Bagley, of Michigan, recently suggested in a public address that every person "owning a piece of God's ground," wherever it may be, in city, village, or county, plant a tree as a memorial of the nation's centennial birthday. Aside from the patriotic consideration of such an act is that of the initiation of all landowners into the practice of tree culture. Sooner or later much of the country will have to be reset with trees.

Statistics every year show a startling inroad upon our forests, the railroads alone being great consumers of trees, and the constant requirements for building and furniture completing the work of reduction. To this, year in and year out, there is no let-up except the new growth, and it is for this new growth we are now pleading with our readers in the country, and we hope with success. At least plant as many trees each year as are cut down.

An Army officer stationed in Montana, General James S. Brisbane, has sent through me to the Committee on Public Lands of the House an elaborate communication on the subject. I deeply regret my inability to quote more largely from his facts and arguments. He begs to represent that—

We have left untouched in the whole United States but one really fine tract of timber, consisting of about one-half of Washington Territory and a third of Oregon. California has perhaps 500,000 acres of fuel, one-half of which has been cut away within the last two years; but that State, aware of the future necessity, and thereby alive to the depletion of our forests, has already commenced the cultivation of the Australia, a tree that grows rapidly and to great size.

New York has lost her maple, walnut, and hickory, and now has no considerable forest left, except what is to be found in her Adirondacks. The Wisconsin forests are in process of rapid destruction; no less than 1,030,000,000 trees have been cut in a single year. Tens of thousands of logs are rafted down the Mississippi to towns in Iowa, where they are cut into lumber. In one place 185,000,000 feet of Wisconsin logs were cut in Iowa; and your petitioner predicts that if the present destruction goes on, in ten or twenty years at most not only the forests of Wisconsin, but Michigan and Minnesota, will be swept away.

After asking Congress to provide for the appointment of a commissioner of forestry, he closes as follows:

I beg that you will further make it the duty of the commissioner of forestry to prepare a yearly report, showing the annual consumption of lumber in the United States and the amount reproduced, the most suitable kind of trees to plant in each State, and their influence upon the climate, together with tables and statistics relative to the renewal of forests in foreign countries.

Mr. Chairman, I have had no other wish or purpose in these remarks than to point out in the simplest manner the great interests involved in the object sought to be reached by the amendment which I have offered. It makes no increase in the amount appropriated, but simply indicates the manner in which the Commissioner of Agriculture shall expend a very small portion of this amount. No diversion could be more perfectly in keeping with the objects of this appropriation. The agricultural interests of the country underlie all we vote for the Agricultural Department. No one could specify an object more vitally important to the farmers of the country, and especially of those portions not so well provided by nature with timber, as the careful use of timber where now found and the growth of it where not found.

The timber put into the houses, barns, and fences of the farmers of the country, to say nothing of the quantity used for fuel, costs an amount of money many times exceeding that of the national debt. Agriculture must have timber.

Timber, as I once have said, is an element of civilization. It should be grown as well as wheat or rye or oats. How this may be done should be an object of study. The supreme importance and dignity of timber preservation and cultivation should be brought home to the whole country. It should know what other countries have done to promote the great interest. While our Government is not asked to establish schools of forestry, yet it may have the results of such schools in England, Scotland, Germany, France, Austria, Russia, Sweden, Italy, and other countries. These results are too numerous even to state; some of them would be of incalculable value to us. A demonstration of the profitableness of timber culture would go far to settle it with a people like ours. These schools have ascertained the soils and climate suited to all the trees of the forest.

The mighty interests sought to be aided by my amendment, call for demonstrations, the facts of science, the results of experiment, methods, and specific instructions.

For the reasons which I have now given, and many more which for want of time I cannot give, I hope for the adoption of the pending amendment.

The amendment of Mr. DUNNELL was agreed to.

River and Harbor Appropriations.

SPEECH OF HON. C. J. FAULKNER,

OF WEST VIRGINIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

May 3, 1876,

On the bill (H. R. No. 3022) making appropriations for the construction, repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works, of rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. FAULKNER. Mr. Speaker, the bill now under consideration contains five separate appropriations for the improvement of the rivers of West Virginia; and, as many gentlemen now upon this floor are unacquainted with the present condition and undeveloped resources of that State, this is an appropriate occasion to show the fair and just claims which it has to a participation in any system designed to extend and facilitate the inland navigation of the United States.

The rivers provided for by this bill are the Great Kanawha, the New River, the Big Sandy, the Elk, and the Monongahela. Provision should also have been made for the Little Kanawha; but, as the estimates for that improvement were not embraced in the report of the War Department transmitted to the present Congress, the consideration of its claims has been postponed until such a report shall hereafter be received. The sums this year appropriated are small, being less than one-third of the official estimates of the Engineer and War Departments. But we cheerfully submit, in common with all the other interests concerned, to this reduction upon the estimates for the present year, concurring fully in the general policy that in the present depleted condition of the Treasury and in the existing depressed industries of the nation we should reduce the expenditures of the Government to the lowest point consistent with the interests of the public service.

Before I proceed to advert to the specific appropriations contained in this bill, I will present some general views upon the extent and character of the resources of the State of West Virginia, which, when they shall be understood and justly appreciated, cannot fail to attract the attention of the capitalists of the world and to satisfy the people of the United States that they have, in the great undeveloped wealth of that State, elements of national power and advancement which they must recognize as worthy of the patronage and protection of this Government.

I may perhaps startle and astonish gentlemen upon this floor when I assert that West Virginia, in the variety, quality, and magnitude of her coal-fields and in the extent and quality of her iron ores, is capable of becoming, for its territorial area, one of the most productive States of this Union. It is true ours is a mountain country; its population is comparatively thin; we enjoy, so far, but few improvements and have but little capital, and we are generally now classed among the poorer States of this Republic. Such, indeed, is admittedly our present condition; but this classification, as applied to our State, will cease when we shall be able to throw off that embargo with which nature has encompassed and imprisoned our wealth, and when we shall by your aid become able to establish such commercial communications east and west of us as will bring the now unexplored riches of our State into a condition of active and practical development.

COAL.

First, then, let me call the attention of this body to the extent and magnitude of the coal-fields that underlie the surface of that State. The great Appalachian or Alleghany coal-fields extend from Pennsylvania as far south as Alabama. Throughout this distance of upward of eight hundred miles they vary greatly in the quality and value of their deposits. It is in West Virginia that the richest, the most extensive, and the most available portion of this great coal-field lies. Its area in that State is estimated to embrace 16,000 square miles, which is something more than two-thirds of its entire territorial surface. It has, indeed, been well termed an enormous area of nearly horizontal strata, with geographical features of great simplicity.

It embraces every variety of valuable coal, from the fat and gaseous bituminous, the iron-smelting splint, the rich and oily cannel, to the anthracite, which is found to exist in the western parts of Berkeley County. They have been found upon analysis and experiment to be purer, better, and more available for all the purposes of trade and manufacture than in any other portion of the Alleghany coal-fields. The seams are more numerous and their thickness greater, so that they can be mined cheaper and with more economy generally than in any other country of the world.

It is one of their peculiarities that they are generally above the water level; thus "no borings are needed to prove the presence of the minerals; no shafts are required to reach them; no pumping is necessary to drain them; and no machinery to open and work them, and they are naturally and easily ventilated."

When I was a member of the State senate of Virginia some years ago, a geological survey of that State was projected, to be executed by Professor William B. Rogers, a gentleman of high scientific attainments. He made five annual reports of progress for the years 1837, 1838, 1839, 1840, and 1841, in which were embraced some of the most interesting portions of what is now West Virginia. His reports, though imperfect and detached, were marked by great research and profound learning; but unhappily his valuable labors were brought to a close from the want of funds, and his work thus left in an unfinished condition.

While, therefore, we have not that exact and scientific survey of the mineral resources of our entire State which would be desirable, yet the enterprise of our own people, with the aid of some foreign capital, the demands of trade and of fuel, and the occasional visits of geologists of high distinction, both European and American, enable us to have a very clear general view of the boundless wealth which lies under the surface of our soil.

If I may, therefore, as the result of my own reading and observation, be allowed to classify the principal coal-measures of our State by geographical description, I would say that they present five clearly defined lines of observation. They are:

First, the Ohio River district. This line of observation extends from the northern limits of Hancock County, thence along the Ohio River to the mouth of the Big Sandy. At Wheeling, and for many miles down the river, the cliff or bank presents an uninterrupted bed of bituminous coal, upward of six feet thick, of such a quality as to furnish fuel for all the dwellings and manufactories of that enterprising and prosperous city and its neighborhood. So at the extreme southern limit of that district we find the deposits as rich and abundant as in any intermediate portion of it. In his geological report of the survey of Kentucky, David Dale Owen, after referring to the abundant coal west of the Big Sandy, the dividing line between West Virginia and Kentucky, says, "That the coal-beds increase in thickness and number east of the Big Sandy; and as far as can be seen in unwrought outcrop, the coal appears to be of excellent quality."

Secondly, the Monongahela Valley district. This valley occupies, within the limits of West Virginia, a space of about one hundred miles in length, by sixty or eighty in breadth, and lies between the Alleghany Mountains and their collateral ranges on the east, and the Ohio River on the west. Its general direction is north and south, with a rapid declination from its southern border to its northern extremity. Between the ranges of mountains, long but narrow strips of level land here called "glades" are to be seen. The table-lands of Mexico are here represented in miniature. Professor Rogers, in speaking of this section of the State, says:

> At Clarksburgh and northward down the valley of the Monongahela, there exists one of the richest coal deposits in the State. One of the seams in some places in the neighborhood of this town is from ten to twelve feet in thickness, below which, and separated chiefly by a heavy bed of sandstone, there lies a thinner stratum of a more highly bituminous character. * * * We may form some idea of the vast extent of these coal seams from the fact that from some distance above Clarksburgh they may be followed with scarcely any interruptions throughout the whole length of the valley of the Monongahela down to Pittsburgh.

Thirdly, the Potomac district. This embraces the counties of Hampshire, Mineral, Hardy, Grant, and Pendleton. Professor Rogers gave but a very limited examination to this section of the State; but what he states in regard to Hampshire is equally applicable to other portions of that district.

In Hampshire County—

Says this distinguished geologist—

> upon a stratum of valuable iron ore not less than fifteen feet in thickness, there rests a bed of sandstone, upon which reposes a coal seam three feet thick; above this another bed of sandstone, then a two-foot vein of coal, then sandstone, then another coal seam of four feet; again a stratum of sandstone, and over it a seven-foot vein of coal; over this a heavy bed of iron ore; and, crowning the series, an enormous coal seam of from fifteen to twenty feet in thickness.

Fourthly, the central district, which lies west of the first range of the Alleghany Mountains, south of the northwestern railroad, and north of the Kanawha Valley, and is that important section of the State, embracing fifteen counties, through which the Washington and Ohio Railroad and the Washington, Cincinnati and Saint Louis Railroad are destined to penetrate before many years, revealing the boundless wealth yet undeveloped in its mountains and valleys. Some idea of the hidden treasures of this section may be gathered from the extract of a letter from John R. Bestor, civil engineer, written a few days ago from Weston, in which he thus speaks of one of the veins of coal which he had personally examined:

> I as the assistant of the State board of centennial managers for West Virginia have visited this remarkable vein at Roaring Creek, Randolph County. At one place it appears from an approximate measurement to be about thirty-eight feet thick The Washington and Ohio Railroad will run on this vein of coal from the mouth of Roaring Creek to near Buckhannon. The deposit covers not less than eight hundred square miles, to my personal knowledge.

Fifthly, the great Kanawha Valley district. It is here that the God of nature has poured out his choicest gifts, and it is here that the deposit of coal is to be seen in all its richest and most varied developments. That river, running at right angles to the Ohio, traverses the wonderful coal-measures of this region, and renders accessible to the industry of man their mineral treasures in a manner most available for practical production. Coal River, Elk River, and Gauley, tributaries of that river, spread their branches over one of the most remarkable coal regions upon earth, and pour their wealth into one common center on the Kanawha. Well has Mr. Daddow said that this is the natural mining and manufacturing center, not only of West Virginia, but of the great Alleghany coal-field, and he very justly anticipates that the day will arrive when Charleston will become a formidable rival to Pittsburgh. Although a Pennsylvanian, he concedes that Charleston has natural advantages superior to Pittsburgh, it being two hundred miles nearer to Cincinnati, with a river, improved as this Government is now improving it, always open to navigation, while the Ohio to Pittsburgh is frequently closed by ice in the winter, and interrupted by low water in the summer.

No one is better capable by his long residence and familiarity with the subject to speak of the wonderful deposits of this valley than Benjamin H. Smith, one of the most highly esteemed and respected residents of Charleston. I take the following extract from one of his letters:

Four-fifths of West Virginia lie on the western slope of the Cumberland range, and nearly all the country west of it abounds in coal; but in that part of the State on the Great Kanawha and its tributaries, Elk and Coal Rivers, and on the Guyandotte River, coal is found on a magnificent scale. It exists in numerous strata of different thicknesses, rising from the base of the hills to their tops, all nearly horizontal, and slightly dipping to the north. This place is sixty miles above the mouth of the river. Here the hills become lofty, and increase in elevation to Cotton Hill or Gauley Mountain. Ascending the river a distance of thirty-six miles, coal of all varieties, except the anthracite, is found of superior quality—the cannel, splint, bituminous, and all varieties of each. Geologists and others report in those thirty-six miles, at different points, workable strata of good coals amounting in all to from sixty to one hundred feet in thickness, aggregating the several strata. These strata are severally from three to fourteen feet thick. They extend over the whole country for miles, running from creek to creek, and river to river. They are readily made accessible to the Great Kanawha, Guyandotte, or Big Sandy Rivers. * * * The amount of coal in the Kanawha and its tributaries, Elk and Coal Rivers, is incredible. There is nothing equal to it anywhere.

While the coal-fields of West Virginia embrace, as I have before stated, an area of 16,000 square miles, it is not thence to be inferred that the whole of it is equally accessible to the enterprise of capital or to the labors of the industrious miner. This would not be in accordance with the ways of Providence nor consistent with the received theory of the formation of the crust of the earth. In view of the mountainous character of our State, it must necessarily be that vast fields are buried at considerable depth under the surface of the soil, and which, at this time, could not repay the cost of production. This condition of our deposits has been justly remarked by an eminent and reflecting geologist as a wise and providential arrangement of the Creator in view of the wasteful propensity of mankind, whether in a savage or civilized condition of life. It is a provision of nature not only for the present but for all future generations that may inhabit our State or this continent. When that which is most easily accessible to the enterprise of man shall in the course of many centuries hence become exhausted, then the generations which at that distant period shall succeed to the inheritance of our soil, armed with new facilities and implements of labor, will penetrate into these hidden recesses and extract from the bowels of the earth that which it would not be either wise or profitable for us to attempt to apply to our present uses. Thus has our beneficent Creator stowed away at different depths in our soil incalculable quantities of this great element of private comfort and national wealth, with enough now accessible to cover our entire territory with prosperity, population, and wealth, and enough to supply all future generations until the last syllable of recorded time.

IRON.

Magnificent as our coal-fields are, they do not surpass our resources in iron. The iron of West Virginia may be said to exist literally throughout the State. The ores are hematites of various aspects, yielding a high percentage of metal of the finest quality. Daddow and Bannan, speaking of the existence of that metal in West Virginia, say:

This region of iron-ores will perhaps rival any locality in our country—Iron-Mountain, Pilot Knob, or Lake Superior not excepted—either in quality or quantity. There is no limit to the resources of brown hematite in this section. It exists in massive beds of great extent, and ranges through a vast area of country. We have seen beds of ore in this region equal to the celebrated Cornwall deposits, and can state from practical experience, there is no richer or purer iron-ore of this description to be found. The miniature map shows the coal of the Kanawha to be in close proximity to this great region of iron, and connected by a large river, which levels, as it were, the mountains, and grades a uniform path through the huge Alleghanies.

AUTHORITIES CITED.

I now propose to fortify what I have said as to the mineral wealth of West Virginia by a few citations from some of the most recent and approved works of authors treating upon the mineral resources of the United States.

James Macfarlane, a citizen of Pennsylvania, in his admirable work on the coal regions of America, devotes a chapter to those of West Virginia, and thus speaks of them:

The coal regions of West Virginia are so rich and extensive, that they afford a tempting subject for conjecture as to the future greatness of this State. The reader will be permitted to indulge in these for himself; and to aid him in forming a just estimate of the value of this coal-field, he is referred to the chapter of this work as to the requisites of a successful coal trade.

Again, at page 278, he says:

Everything bespeaks West Virginia to have been originally an extended plain, which was afterward gently tilted on the east side from the horizontal position, so that its surface and the body of rocks beneath were made to decline with a slight but very uniform depression very gently toward the northwest to the valley of the Ohio. The great inequalities of surface were evidently caused by the furrowing action of a mighty and devastating rush of waters, which, by a rapid draining, scooped out enormous valleys. The parallel position of the strata keeps the coal-seams near the surface over enormously wide spaces of country, while the great depth of the valleys exposes them to the day under positions for mining the easiest imaginable.

Daddow and Bannan, in their treatise upon "coal, iron, and oil," thus refer to West Virginia:

In no other portion of our country, North or South, are there more inviting prospects to labor, enterprise, and capital than is now presented in the Great Kanawha Valley. Not only its unlimited mineral resources invite attention, but the best portion of the trade of the great Mississippi Valley may be diverted into the channel of the Kanawha by ordinary means.

The same intelligent writers, after referring to the extraordinary variety and richness of the mineral resources of that section, thus proceed:

The whole valley of the Mississippi is open beyond controlling competition to the trade and the production of this region, while the present avenues to the East and the commerce of the world are but little less available than from the older and more developed centers, with this advantage ever open to the Kanawha region, that a route may be constructed having every advantage over the most favorable avenues of trade now open from the East to the West. This is, therefore, the natural mining and manufacturing center, not only of West Virginia, but of the great Alleghany coal-field.

Looking to the natural results of location and availability, now that this magnificent region is open to free labor and a corresponding development, we may anticipate for Charleston the dignity of the State capital at no very distant day, or, what may be better, the metropolis of the mining and manufacturing interests of the West.

From a printed memorial addressed to Congress from the State of Pennsylvania I will make the following extracts:

If we consider carefully the causes of the troubles we are at present laboring under, and survey the deplorable condition of the iron industry of Pennsylvania, we shall be convinced that we may not expect much of a change until this country realizes and acts upon the axiom that capital must submit to nature and harmonize with it; that wherever the raw material exists in the best quality and greatest abundance, and can be mined and worked up at the least cost, there is the only natural field for the employment of capital and labor in the development of our mineral resources, whether that field be north, south, east, or west.

This is no new or experimental theory, but a plain, practical question of trade; for if the iron-master can afford to consume millions of tons of bituminous coal, with the heavy transportation charges added to its cost, and produce iron from his furnaces in Eastern Pennsylvania at even the lowest percentage of profit, he can readily calculate how much greater his profit would be were he to transfer his furnaces to West Virginia, where his supplies of coal would cost him nothing beyond the mere labor of mining. An experience of twenty years in the use of this cheap coal has conclusively proved it to be the best in the world for iron-manufacturing purposes.

Mr. Speaker, I am unwilling to consume the time of this House by a further citation of authority upon a point so clear and undeniable as the vast and wonderful mineral resources of the State of West Virginia. It is a fact of universal recognition by all who have bestowed any attention upon this subject. And now, sir, with such established and recognized facts before us, what is the duty which devolves upon Congress? Shall this immense mass of yet undeveloped and unexplored wealth be allowed to remain unused in the bowels of the earth, or will you, by reasonable and moderate appropriations, open these hidden treasures to the active industries of the world? As I have before remarked, ours is a mountain country. Its population is thinly scattered through its hills and valleys, not exceeding twenty inhabitants to the square mile. We have little capital, few improvements; and yet we have rivers which, if we can get the aid of this Government in their improvement, will enable us to pour into the markets east and west such an amount of mineral treasure as never before floated on the surface of any river of this continent. The plainest dictates of practical economy would authorize and justify such appropriation. The expenditures in themselves will be small, while the results flowing from them will assume national importance.

In describing the mineral wealth of West Virginia I have so far confined myself to the two great articles of coal and iron, for these are the great sources of national power and advancement, the mainsprings of modern civilization. Upon what foundation has the gigantic structure of British power been reared? Clearly and admittedly upon her coal and iron. But nations have their periods of decline as well as of prosperity. The cloud which now casts a shadow over the greatness of England is the growing scarcity and increasing cost of the production of coal in that country. Mr. Bell, the president of the Iron and Steel Institute, and doubtlessly one of the best-informed persons in regard to iron and coal now living, appeared by request before a committee of Parliament, and in his testimony presented some striking and astounding statistics, and expressed the grave apprehension which he felt that the prosperity of the British Empire was destined to be materially affected by the absence of a more ample supply of coal. He says:

The impediment which stands in the way of any great extension of the iron trade is coal. Our great rival is the New World. In ores of the finest description the resources of the United States are unlimited, while in coal our own wealth is in comparison but poverty.

The London Daily Advertiser says:

As to the future, it is, we think, not difficult to speak with confidence. As we have frequently said in these columns, we believe that England has passed the zenith of her greatness as an iron-producing country, and that she must steadily lose ground against the growing competition of the United States.

The British Quarterly, in reviewing the report of the royal commission appointed by Parliament to look into the subject of coal in Great Britain, says:

If the present rate of increase of consumption continues, the last ton of coal in Great Britain will be extracted within a hundred years, and the United States will be the only nation that can supply the world's demand for coal and iron.

Assuming this fact to be true, the inquiry very naturally suggests itself, from what portion of the United States is this supply to come? Doubtless there are many sections of the Union from which large contributions can be made; but where upon this continent is the coal and iron region to be found that can justly compare with West Virginia? Where is the State or country that in the variety, richness, and manufacturing qualities of its coal can rival those wonderful deposits which are comprehended in our sixteen thousand square miles of exhaustless wealth? There are to be found coal, ore, and limestone, the three great elements of iron manufacture, in close proximity, enabling the West Virginia operator to surpass that of any portion of the civilized world in the cheapness of production and in the quality of the articles of his labor.

In confining my remarks so far to the two articles of coal and iron, it is not to be inferred that West Virginia does not possess other elements of great commercial value. Lead is known to exist in considerable quantities; copper has been found in several places; petroleum abounds; and our salt-wells have acquired a national celebrity.

I have spoken of West Virginia as a mountain State; let me not be misunderstood. It is true that from the North Mountain to the Ohio River it is a succession of mountain elevations; but she has also valleys, which upon one occasion inspired a distinguished statesmen to say of them that they were "fairer and fatter than the vale of Tempe," and lofty elevations, where the richest grasses and cereals find a compensating cultivation to their highest summits. I trust I may be pardoned for quoting from an English work, published in London by Edward Bull for the use of British emigrants, the following just and measured account of the agricultural capacities of that State:

The face of the country in West Virginia is undulating and unequal, being crossed in all directions by mountains, which attain their highest elevation—about three thousand feet above the level of the sea—at nearly two hundred miles from the coast. These mountains are extremely productive, and are covered with the finest timber-trees, many specimens of which denote the richest and most fruitful soil. As the hills are generally not precipitous, but of easy and gradual ascent, they are susceptible of being cultivated to their very summits. Between them lie some of the most fruitful valleys of the earth, rich in their productions and in the luxuriant and majestic beauty of their variegated scenery. As the country affords a course to many great rivers and to innumerable tributary streams, large tracts of alluvial soil stretch along their banks, varying in width from a hundred yards to two miles. The uneven surfaces of these tracts prevent their retaining water so as to form swamps. A natural draining carries off all the superfluous water, leaving the soil firm and dry as that of the higher lands.

This alluvial deposit, though low, is still not sufficiently so to be overflowed during the periodical risings of the rivers. It is moreover of extraordinary fertility, yielding rich crops of wheat, barley, oats, rye, turnips, potatoes, hemp, flax, Indian corn, and tobacco. The upland soil is equally productive, and contains, besides, beautiful pasture lands for the raising of cattle and stock, including horses, sheep, and hogs, in which a considerable trade is carried on, not only with the circumjacent cities and towns, but also for exportation. The sides of the highest and steepest hills are admirably suited to the cultivation of the grape. The mulberry-tree, which, as well as the vine, is indigenous, flourishes there in great luxuriance and vigor. The production therefore of wine and silk may be looked upon as a new source of wealth which a very few years will develop in Western Virginia. The olive-tree also grows extremely well in most parts of the country and bears abundantly.

I do not believe that I have in any respect overdrawn or exaggerated the resources and capacities of West Virginia. I have preferred to restrict my citation of authorities to those sources which could be least suspected of partiality. And what have you thus before you? A State possessed of every element of prosperity and greatness; a State adapted to furnish homes to millions of happy and contented laborers, and of adding incalculably to the power and resources of this Republic, and yet whose treasures lie in a great measure unproductive and locked up in their natural depositories for want of easy and convenient communication with market. What man having a valuable private estate yielding him little or nothing, and who could by the expenditure of a few thousand dollars make it productive and profitable, would not consider it the highest practical economy to invest such sum in such improvements? It is true in this case the United States has no ownership in the soil of West Virginia; but as a government it is clothed with the entire commercial power of this nation, not only with foreign powers, but between the States; and if it should apply some small portion of those funds which are derived from commerce to extend and advance this interest, it would be acting in the same line of practical economy that the proprietor of a tract of land would do who would secure to his estate access to a market where he had none before.

The appropriations made by this bill are—

First. For the Kanawha and its two tributaries, the New River and the Elk. These all contemplate the same general object—the development of the coal, iron, salt, and timber interests of the great Kanawha Valley, and the opening of channels of communication for the transportation to market of the varied products of that interesting section of the State. The improvement of this valley has now become historical. It connects itself with one of the most useful and sagacious conceptions of the Father of our Country. The improvements of this valley form an essential link in that great Virginia and West Virginia water line which I hope to see one day completed, and which will furnish one of the shortest and cheapest routes upon this continent for the agricultural productions of the States of Ohio, Kentucky, Indiana, Illinois, and Wisconsin. This route is too well known to require any more particular description of it; yet I cannot refrain from quoting some remarks uttered by Hon. WILLIAM WINDOM, Senator from Minnesota, and chairman of the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard, whose valuable labors and active support of this great West Virginia interest entitle him to the grateful acknowledgment of the people of this State. On the 3d of March, 1875, he submitted in the Senate an amendment to the river and harbor bill, then pending before that body, to appropriate $600,000 for the improvement of the great Kanawha River. This amendment of Mr. WINDOM was adopted by the Senate, yeas 25, nays 19; but it was subsequently reduced by the committee of conference of the two Houses to $300,000, the same amount which is asked for in the present bill. His remarks made upon that occasion are as appropriate to the present bill as they were to the bill of the last session; and coming from a source so impartial and disinterested, cannot fail to have their just weight and influence in this body. He says:

The improvement of the Ohio and Kanawha Rivers is a condition-precedent to the practicability and usefulness of the central water-route, and hence whatever may be done upon these rivers is in the line of that work. But aside from any question affecting the entire central route, the improvement of the Kanawha River, and by means of slack-water navigation, is of very great importance for the purpose of developing the inexhaustible resources of coal and iron to which I have already referred. The advantages to be realized by the improvement of the Kanawha River as now proposed are not uncertain or conjectural; they are apparent and demonstrable. They can be best estimated from the results of similar improvements on the Monongahela River, which more than any other one thing has conduced to the development of the commerce and industries of Pittsburgh. The value of the coal transportation on the Monongahela prior to January 18, 1875, was $34,179,403. The cost of the improvement was $1,146,038; cost of the works only 3½ per cent. of the value of the coal. It appears also that the value of other commodities paying toll to the company was about equal to that of the coal. It is probable, therefore, that the total value of commerce developed by the improvement amounts to $60,000,000.

To put it in another form, it appears that an expenditure of $1,146,038 has been an essential condition in the development of $60,000,000 of wealth: and if we could trace the effects of the coal product thus developed upon the various industries to which it has given existence, we should find that the wealth created by it would be expressed by the value of the coal many times multiplied. The inexhaustible supply of coal in West Virginia, embracing bituminous, cannel, and splint, as well as of iron ores of superior quality, and the entire practicability of improving the Kanawha River at a cost quite inconsiderable in proportion to the advantages which would be secured, prove that equal or even greater results may be expected than have been realized from the improvement of the Monongahela.

Coal has been fitly termed "the bread of industry." The wonderful advancement in wealth and enterprise of all the commercial nations on the globe during the last fifty years has been attained largely through the creative power of coal.

These facts, as well as the magnificent results which have flowed from the development of our own coal and iron resources, point to the proposed improvement of the Ohio and Kanawha Rivers as works which should not be delayed. I have mentioned only one or two of the principal reasons for these works. Time would fail me if I were to attempt to enumerate all the advantages that would flow from them.

The New River, which is one of the tributaries, or perhaps it might be regarded as the head source of the Great Kanawha, is embraced as one of the objects of appropriation by this bill. I cannot withhold the very graphic and picturesque description which Governor Wise of Virginia has given of this river in his address before the literary societies of Roanoke College, at Salem, on the 17th of June 1873:

The New River, which rises far south in North Carolina, is one of the strangest streams that wind their way through mountain passes Coming north it crosses the southern boundary of Virginia and strikes the Alleghanies, where Iron and Ewing Mountains meet. Thence it cuts through ridge after ridge of mountain chains for one hundred and twenty miles. It flows apparently against the law of gravitation up the plane of water-shed to encounter and overthrow the rocky barriers of the Alleghanies and to penetrate them through gorge after gorge to join the Gauley and the Great Kanawha in their rapid descent to the Ohio, then with that river to turn south again to join the swollen floods of the mighty Mississippi and roll on to the Gulf, there to be swept by the gulf stream past the isles to the main ocean. And through what riparian grandeur flows the whole of its alpine course. Well may it be called the New River. It is a novelty in nature. It presents at every turn, in bed and banks, scenes of study for the topographer, physical geographer, engineer, and poet.

It has swept away mountain sides like dams. It plunges from fall to fall, from deep to deeper profound for a hundred miles. Its coal and iron, salt and oil, and forests are subjects of wealth for Titans to work upon, and its pastures of blue-grass and its fish and game could feed a host of Titans at their work. Its awful precipice of the Hawk's Nest is but a spot of its grandeur; it is not its dizzy height which so astounds sight and thought as the whole river itself, the grandeur of which rises up from its bed below above the height of its precipices. Whenever it is densely settled and has the necessary capital—and both will flow to it as soon as it is better known to immigrants—and whenever public improvement will develop its powers of production, it will be the most capacious and richest and strongest land and water of rivers of the same extent in the world. It is the Rhine of North America, and directly in the track of the great continental belt of transit toward its eastern outlet at the capes of the Chesapeake.

The Elk as a tributary to the Great Kanawha comes in for a small appropriation. This river has its source in the highlands of the central district of the State, and unites with the Kanawha at Charlestown. It embraces the best lumber trade in the State, and its banks are the depositories of inexhaustible supplies of coal and iron. The aid proposed by this bill to the improvement of the Elk is, in the highest degree, wise and judicious.

Secondly. The next distinct interest provided for by the bill is the Big Sandy, the dividing line between the States of Kentucky and West Virginia. This river finds its head-springs among the elevated peaks of the Cumberland group of mountains, and among the flat mountains or table-lands found between the heads of the Halston and the Guyandotte, and empties into the Ohio southwest of the Kanawha. No survey has yet been made by Virginia or West Virginia of this wild but interesting country. Professor D. D. Owen, in his State Geological Report of Kentucky, bestows a considerable portion of it upon an exhibition of the mineral resources of the counties of Lawrence, Johnson, and Floyd, in Kentucky, and which lie along the east line of that State, on the Big Sandy, and contiguous to West Virginia. He shows that the richest varieties of coal abound in those counties, and remarks that they not only extend east of that and run into West Virginia, but that the coal-beds increase both in size and richness in that direction.

The last appropriation is for the Monongahela River. This is an improvement which has been so often and so favorably patronized by Congress that I need to add but little on the subject; and yet that little shall be a few extracts from the speech of Captain T. P. Roberts, who was employed last fall by the Government to survey that river from Morgantown to Fairmont. Being called upon for the expression of his views after the survey was finished, he made some remarks from which I take the following extract:

The improvement of our navigable rivers is a subject worthy of very careful consideration, and I am glad that I have the opportunity to express to you, gentlemen, the warm sympathy I have as an American citizen for this present proposed undertaking, namely, the improvement of the Upper Monongahela from Morgantown to Fairmont by means of locks and dams.

About thirty-five years ago my father, W. Malnor Roberts, superintended the improvement of the Monongahela from Pittsburgh to Brownsville, as the company's chief engineer. I recollect hearing him say that upon the occasion of the opening of the slack-water navigation, he prophesied that before thirty years would pass by the demand for coal in the southern cities along the Ohio and Mississippi to the Gulf would be so great that at least fifteen million bushels of it would be shipped annually from the ports above Pittsburgh. * * * His prophecy was ridiculed by some; but the facts showed that instead of fifteen million bushels being shipped from the Monongahela Valley, in 1870 the quantity was nearly ninety million bushels.

Gentlemen, I propose to follow in my father's footsteps, and attempt a prophecy also, and it is not so hard now in the light of experience, which is this: That in less than twenty years the shipment of coal from the Monongahela Valley will exceed three hundred and fifty million bushels per annum. Already there are engaged in the trade one hundred and twenty-five stanch steam tow-boats, and three thousand barges and boats, forming an aggregate of one million three hundred thousand tonnage, owned in Pittsburgh; a tonnage greater than all the rest afloat in the Mississippi Valley from the Gulf to the lakes, greater than the combined tonnage of New York and Boston, our great maritime centers.

After stating several other important facts, which I should with pleasure quote if time permitted, he proceeds to say:

As you West Virginians mine coal for about one-half of what is paid in Pennsylvania, I am firmly persuaded that it would pay to extend the slack water up to the eleven-foot vein between Morgantown and Fairmont. At least I shall certainly, in my report to Colonel Merrill, of the United States Engineer Corps, urge the extension of the slack water to Fairmont. It is only here, in my opinion, that it should terminate. Here, properly speaking, is the head of navigation of the Ohio River. Here there is an outlet to the seaboard over the grand-trunk line, the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad.

I have now presented to you as fully as I have deemed it necessary to do the claims of West Virginia to a fair participation in any system that may be adopted by Congress to improve the inland navigation of the United States. It is certainly within its constitutional power, as it is one of the highest duties of Congress to contribute its assistance to remove the obstructions which impede commercial intercourse between the States, and especially if any State be so situated that it cannot by its own means remove the obstacles that prevent this intercourse; and more especially if a comparatively small expenditure of money will add largely to the wealth, resources, and power of this Republic. I have shown that such is the condition of West Virginia. I have, I think, satisfactorily shown that no appropriation made by this bill to any improvement in the United States will be followed by more important and productive results than those which are asked on behalf of my State.

The State of West Virginia, although one of the smaller States of this Union, inland in her position, mountainous in her physical characteristics, and debarred from convenient access to the seaboard for the heavier articles of her commerce, she nevertheless possesses elements of wealth that must at some future day give her a prominent position in the sisterhood of States. It cannot be that in a country so distinguished for energy and enterprise these extraordinary resources can long remain hidden in the bowels of the earth. Already foreign capital has to some extent appreciated these bounties of Providence and has constructed across our territory two important highways, the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad through the northern portion of it, with one branch extended to Wheeling and the other to Parkersburgh, and the Chesapeake and Ohio Railroad through the southern part of our State. But for the crushing financial crisis of 1873 we should have seen the Washington and Ohio Railroad and the Washington, Cincinnati and Saint Louis Railroad far advanced through the central counties of that State. When these highways are all finished we shall want but one additional improvement of that character to complete the railroad system of our State, and that is from some point on the Pennsylvania line, crossing the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, pursuing the valley of the Elk River, and terminating at Charleston. No improvement can be suggested that would more effectually bind the whole State into one homogeneous mass than the one last mentioned. That sectionalism which naturally results from our mountain barriers would at once disappear, and an entire unity of interest and feeling would pervade every part of our State. So thoroughly satisfied was I, when a member of the State constitutional convention, of the importance of such a channel of intercourse between the southern and northern sections of West Virginia, that I was prepared, as a matter of State policy, to make it an exception to all the other limitations and prohibitions of the constitution, and to have vested in the State full authority to aid in the construction of such a road.

But, while no one appreciates the benefits and advantages of railroads more than I do, they cannot dispense with that class of improvements which it is the purpose of this bill to supply. For heavy articles like iron and coal no mode of transportation can compare in cheapness to that of water, and when, under the benign auspices of this Government, our rivers shall be cleared of their obstructions and made capable of floating upon their surface our rich products to market, we shall bid defiance to competition and feel that we are prepared "to stand up against a world in arms."

Emma Mine.

SPEECH OF HON. C. G. WILLIAMS,

OF WISCONSIN,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

May 25, 1876.

The House having under consideration the report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs in relation to the connection of General Robert C. Schenck, minister to the Court of St. James, with the Emma Mine—

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin, said:

Mr. SPEAKER: The investigation of the connection of the American minister, General Robert C. Schenck, with the sale of the Emma Mine in London has been protracted and somewhat arduous, but on the whole, I think, impartial and complete.

The inquiry has taken a wide range, and a large amount of evidence has been received, some relevant and some irrelevant, some direct and positive, given under the sanction of an oath and subjected to the tests of cross-examination, and some resting wholly upon hearsay, and sustained only by the breath of private gossip or public scandal.

The limited time allotted to this debate precludes the possibility of any analysis of the case and affords only slight opportunity for general deductions and conclusions.

A volume of eight hundred and seventy-nine printed pages of testimony lies before me. I can only glance at its contents, without attempting to traverse the various fields of inquiry into which it leads. While it is absolutely impossible to do justice to the whole case within any reasonable time, the danger is that in so hasty a review injustice may be done to some of the parties connected therewith.

The Emma Mine, situated in the Little Cottonwood Cañon, twenty-seven miles southwest of Salt Lake City, in the Territory of Utah, was discovered some time in the year 1868 by Thomas F. Woodman and Robert B. Chisholm. In the fall of that year they invited James E. Lyon, of Wisconsin, a practical miner, to aid them in developing the property, giving him a one-third interest therein. The three worked the mine some few weeks, taking therefrom about seventy-five tons of first-class silver ore of the value of $100 per ton, after which Lyon returned to the East and seems to have given the enterprise no further attention until June 1870, when, learning that Woodman and Chisholm, in connection with other parties, were taking large quantities of rich and valuable ore from the mine, he returned to Utah and demanded settlement, which was at first promised and then evaded or refused. From that hour the mine seems to have run the gauntlet common to all valuable mining property of adverse claimants, pretended owners, protests, injunctions, and law-suits, innumerable. Through all this litigation and trouble Ex-Senator William M. Stewart, of Nevada, acted as the attorney of Lyon.

In April, 1871, Trenor W. Park and General H. H. Baxter, of New York, purchased a one-half interest in the mine held by Woodman & Chisholm or their associates for $375,000, and subject to Lyon's interest; and they subsequently purchased a one-sixteenth interest upon a valuation of $1,500,000 for the entire mine. Upon this purchase litigation broke forth afresh, and continued until August of that year, when, under the advice of Stewart, Lyon entered into an agreement with the Emma Silver Mining Company, of New York, into which the interest of Park and Baxter had been merged, to the effect that Lyon would withdraw a protest which he had filed in the Government land office in Utah, allow the title to be perfected in said company, and the mine to be sold under the supervision of Park and Stewart, one-third of the proceeds of the sale to be deposited as security for Lyon to abide the event of the litigation, which was to go on to trial, and if at the expiration of three months any part of the stock should remain unsold, one-third of such unsold portion to be also deposited for Lyon's security, reserving to Lyon, however, the option to accept in lieu of the above, at any time before trial, one-eighth of the proceeds of the sale, first deducting therefrom the sum of $1,500,000; and in case such one-eighth part, after such deduction, should amount to $500,000 or more, Lyon to accept the same in full satisfaction and discharge of his demand.

Lyon and Stewart differ as to what this agreement or the litigation related to, Lyon claiming that it related not only to the mine in its then condition, but to the ore which had been previously taken therefrom, amounting, as he claims, to $2,000,000, and that after deducting $500,000 for expenses he was entitled to one-third of the balance, or $500,000. He further claims that it was well understood by Stewart and Park that the mine was nearly exhausted; that it was not a mine of vein power at all, but a mere shell, pocket, or deposit; and that they virtually designed to perpetrate a swindle upon the English public in its sale. And he refers to the expression of Stewart in his letter of August 5, 1871, printed in the committee's report, where he says, "We will not be fighting for a worked-out mine." In confirmation of this view, Stewart, on the contrary, insists that the matter had no reference to the ore previously taken from the mine, as there was no way of tracing or reclaiming that or its value, but that it related to the mine in its then condition. And he thus explains the phrase "worked-out mine:" Other parties were working the mine. Lyon had failed in restraining them. Remedies in the courts were inadequate or uncertain; the litigation might continue for years. And hence it was better to obtain some tangible security, as they would not then be fighting, as they otherwise might be toward the close of the litigation, for "a worked-out mine." Stewart's compensation was to be one-fourth of the amount which should be realized by Lyon.

Pursuant to the above agreement Park, as the representative of the owners of the mine, and Stewart, as the attorney of Lyon, sailed for Europe in the month of September, 1871, to place the property on the London market.

Time forbids my going into the details of the negotiations which led up to the sale of the mine and ensnared General Schenck into connection with it. The following extract from the report of the committee will furnish the outlines:

The evidence shows that during the summer and up to this time extraordinary efforts had been made to produce a large yield of ore from the mine, and that the product of the four months from 1st May to 1st September (page 672) was much larger than it had ever been before or ever was afterward. All the rich ore produced was forwarded by steamers to England and there sold, and the large yield and value of the ore were well known to the mining world.

On their arrival in London, (pages 464, 465,) they were met by Mr. C. M. Fisher, an American lawyer, who it is testified had done a good deal of legal business for the American legation, and whom General Schenck had known in London prior to his appointment as minister.

Fisher introduced Park and Stewart to Coates & Hankey as a firm desirous to purchase the property. A contingent arrangement was made with this firm, which subsequently fell through, but resulted in the introduction by them of Park and Stewart to Albert Grant, of the firm of Grant & Co., of London, well known for their success in bringing out, or "floating," as it is called, new companies upon the English market. After some negotiation, covering the month of October, 1871, Albert Grant agreed to take up the enterprise.

* * * * * * *

The contract with Grant & Co. is given at length in the evidence, (page 252.) It provides that the property shall be capitalized at £1,000,000, half of which is to be offered to the public at par in £20 shares, and the other half of the shares are to be retained by the vendors for nine months unless Grant & Co. should consent to their sale at an earlier date. Grant & Co. were to receive as compensation for "promoting" the company 20 per cent., equal to £100,000, on the sale of the first half of the shares, and one-half of the profits realized upon the sale of the second half retained by the vendors. Grant & Co. were authorized to "sustain the market" pending the allotment by the purchase of shares at a premium for the account of the vendors.

Thereupon a prospectus, dated November 9, 1871, (pages 69–74,) was issued, inviting proposals for the stock from the public until the 16th of November, when it appears that shares were applied for largely in excess of the whole number advertised to be sold.

* * * * * * *

The prospectus contains a very full statement of the property sold and the resources in hand available for cash dividends, affirming that these are sufficient to warrant cash dividends at the rate of 1½ per cent. per month for twelve months.

In addition to these resources, the prospectus asserts that "the mine includes about 13,250 tons of first-class ore already developed in various parts of the mine, and described in Professor Silliman's report of the estimated net value of £357,750.

The prospectus then states:

"From the above arrangements and details will be seen the extraordinary character of the property that will be acquired by the company, and in what a totally different character the Emma Mine stands to almost every mine in which the public have been allowed to participate by subscription."

For this statement every director, including the American minister, was responsible, so far as his character and judgment were concerned.

If this statement had been true, then the resources "already developed" were sufficient for two years' additional dividends at the rate of 18 per cent. per annum, thus securing from both sources to the stockholders 54 per cent. of the purchase-money, without any further product whatever beyond the reserves already developed.

The evidence shows (page 696) that dividends at the rate of 1½ per cent. per month were paid for thirteen months consecutively, until December, 1872, since when no dividends have been earned or paid, and there is no money on hand out of which they can be paid, and there is no ore in sight which can be mined, all the ore in the old workings having been absolutely exhausted, and no new ore developed by the subsequent explorations. Of the dividends paid, £36,000 were advanced on sales of ore by Mr. Park, (pages 554, 656,) who is now suing the company for a balance of about £25,000 thereof, so that the net amount of earnings actually divided was £170,000.

On inquiry by the committee, Mr. Park professed his inability to account for the disappearance of the reserves, alleging as a reason that he had been refused access to the mine, and no satisfactory (page 657) evidence was presented to the committee as to what had become of the remainder of the available resources, estimated in the prospectus to be of the total value of £539,050, or of the large quantity of ore which ought to have been found during the years 1872 and 1873, during which mining operations were steadily prosecuted. The result is that the shares have greatly depreciated in value, having fallen from £32 per share, at which they were sold May 11, 1872, to £1 5s., at which they are now quoted.

The above furnishes but a faint sketch of the negotiations and counter-negotiations, the criminations and recriminations, of the various parties connected with this unfortunate enterprise. Suffice it to say that the following are some of its general features and results: There was paid to Mr. Albert Grant, the promoter of the mine, and who launched it upon the English public, the sum of $500,000, beside certain other profits; to the banking-house of Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co., $125,000; for the use of the name of Mr. Puleston, one of the firm, and the privilege of depositing the proceeds of the sale with them; to Professor Silliman, for visiting Utah twice and examining and reporting upon this mine and others, $25,000; to E. Bridges Willyams, a member of Parliament, one of the English directors of the Emma Silver-Mining Company, and a smelter of Cornwall, for visiting Utah and reporting upon the mine, $25,000.

It has been asserted—and I think the evidence confirms the truth of the assertion—that there was advanced at least $1,000,000 in placing the mine upon the market. Mr. Park paid for a half interest in the mine the sum of $375,000 and for one-sixteenth interest $93,750.

He received as his final profit from the investment and enterprise not less than $3,000,000. Mr. Lyon received $200,000 in full for his interest, and Senator Stewart, his attorney, received $275,000 in all.

General Schenck made $10,000 from an independent investment in the shares of the company in the space of about ten days, and some time thereafter in another like investment lost that amount, together with $16,000 in addition thereto, and stands to-day, notwithstanding dividends received upon his stock, at least $32,000 worse off in the world pecuniarily than if he had never heard of the Emma Silver-Mining Company (limited) of London, while the British public stand relieved of the handsome sum of $3,700,000!

Such, Mr. Speaker, are some of the characteristics and such some of the sad results of this unfortunate enterprise. Through what means were they accomplished and who are responsible for them? Prominent among the latter the committee have felt compelled to place General Schenck, though they gladly acquit him of any intentional wrong.

But, sir, there are others who must bear their full share of responsibility. Professor Silliman, on account of his known high character, was selected by the English people to examine and report upon the mine. His report is dated October 16, 1871, in which he says:

In the aggregate the amount of silver-ores removed from the great chamber is about 25,000 tons, of which eight thousand are second class; and its money value in silver and lead is stated at over three and a half million dollars, independent of the reserves and late discoveries of new ore-masses presently to be described.

In a supplemental report, dated February 29, 1872, he says:

Upon these data we conclude that the body of ores, of all grades, now standing in the new exploration will reach fully 24,000 tons, (of two thousand pounds,) one-half of which will probably fall into the rank of first-class ores.

These two estimates, Mr. Speaker, would carry the value of the mine well toward $7,000,000; and connected with the following statement, contained in his original report, and which was copied into the prospectus, would go far toward convincing the English public that this was a mine of exceeding great richness and value. He says:

These several facts in my opinion establish beyond all reasonable doubt the conclusion that the Emma is a true mineral vein of great power, and place it in the category of the great mines of the world.

In justice to Professor Silliman it should be stated that he has appeared before the committee, and he, as well as other mining engineers eminent in their profession, has expressed the opinion that the Emma Mine is a mine of true vein power, and that future explorations will develop the fact of its great richness and value. This, however, hardly bears upon past estimates based upon actual explorations. In April, 1872, Professor Silliman joins Willyams and Henry in a telegram sent to London from the mine, in which are the following statements:

Very great improvements since last report. On seventh floor drifted 120 feet, and tenth floor 40 feet, all in ore. At bottom winze, 70 feet below old workings, drifted 40 feet, all in ore. Sample assays 28 per cent. lead and $2,000 silver. Reserves discovered since last report, over 8,000 tons. Everything connected with the mine is highly satisfactory.

Mr. Park testifies that Willyams's report "shows that the new explorations have developed some 80,000 tons of ore beyond the quantity mentioned in Professor Silliman's report." And Willyams writes from Salt Lake City, February 28, 1872:

I have no doubt that there is ore enough discovered within the last four months to pay two years' dividends, without touching the reserves.

Mr. Park, at the first meeting of the share-holders in London, March 7, 1872, said:

Now as to the future. Mr. Willyams's report says we are taking out forty tons a day, and can largely increase it if desired. It is not desired. We can save £10 a ton, or 12 per cent. dividend if we can smelt these ores there. In other words, it costs £10 a ton to transport them here. I am satisfied the ores can be smelted there. Mr. Willyams, being a smelter, and having smelted these ores, can form a judgment; therefore we do not desire to send any more over, because we are losing £10 a ton on every ton if they can be smelted there.

There can be taken from that mine one hundred tons a day, and never has a mine been worked in the way this mine is worked and given out. I am satisfied the ore will hold out; and if I had a guarantee I would hold out as long as the ore will, I would not want a better life insurance.

* * * * * * *

The shares are held by eighteen hundred shareholders, and people who do not want to sell need not mind these stories, but still they do not like to see their property depreciated; and in order to get the quotation, I am willing to sell enough shares to reduce the vendors holding down to a third, if it can be done at a proper time and I can get a proper price; but when I took these shares I believed, and do believe, instead of these shares being worth £20 a share, they are worth £40. That is my judgment. I may be entirely mistaken; but I shall certainly hold shares until they go to £40. No man is always going to hold 25,000 shares. I represent fifteen different parties, and some of them are willing to sell at such a price as I am willing to sell at. When we get Mr. Willyams's report and Professor Silliman's report, I shall make such an arrangement as is proper to sell part of my shares so that our exchange may be obtained. [Cheers.]

Whereupon the following proceeding occurred:

The CHAIRMAN. May I conclude the shareholders are now satisfied they are holders of shares in a really satisfactory mine, and instead of their standing at £22 in the market they ought to stand at £40 or £50? It has been a great satisfaction to the directors to receive these recent reports, because every one of us have suffered very severely from the adverse statements we have had to submit to. I hope there is an end of them, and that the company will go on in a satisfactory way in the future.

A SHAREHOLDER. I beg to move the thanks of the meeting to the chairman and directors for their full and frank explanation of the affairs of the company.

Sir, the irony of all this can be best appreciated by those who now hold shares in the Emma Silver-Mining Company (limited) at £1 5s., including General Schenck himself, who still holds his original four hundred and seventy-five shares.

Mr. Speaker, this cursory narrative, already too long continued, only illustrates again, for the thousandth time, the nature, course, and probable results of the kind of enterprise with which General Schenck was asked to connect his name and lend the influence of his official position, and in that connection is perhaps only material to this inquiry.

It is not pretended that General Schenck knew in advance that these results would follow. He fully believed that this was a rich and valuable mine, and that large returns would come to the English shareholders as well as himself from the investment. He scrutinized the title papers with becoming care, and critically examined the statements and reports presented to him. That he was guiltless of all fraud or fraudulent intent, the committee have cheerfully and unanimously found.

Wherein, then, consisted his error? His own first impulse gave the true answer. He says in his testimony:

> It was suggested to me, perhaps first by Mr. Stewart, but by either Park or Stewart, that I ought to be one of the managers of the company. I at first demurred to any such idea.

He says arguments were presented which seemed plausible—

> But I still objected; and I placed my objection first upon the ground that I doubted the propriety of my having anything to do with the management of a company while I was there in a representative capacity.

He was assured that members of Parliament, honorable gentlemen, would be his co-directors.

O, sir, how unfortunate that the American minister could not have remembered at that precise time—for surely he must have read it—that matchless description of Dickens, where Ralph Nickleby, the great London promoter of that day, organized the "United Metropolitan Improved Hot-Muffin and Crumpet-Baking and Punctual-Delivery Company, capital five millions, in five hundred thousand shares of ten pounds each." [Laughter.] "Why the very name," exclaims Bonney, "will get the shares up to a premium in ten days." "And when they are at a premium," said Mr. Ralph Nickleby, smiling—— "When they are, you know what to do with them as well as any man alive and how to back quietly out at the right time," said Mr. Bonney, clapping the capitalist familiarly on the shoulder.

Ralph declared that he must have a live member of Parliament; and the ever-smiling Bonney exclaimed, "My dear Nickleby, Sir Matthew Pupker takes the chair and three members of Parliament are positively coming!" [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, General Schenck tells us somewhere in his testimony that Park seemed to take a great fancy and liking to him, and always treated him with great liberality and kindness.

Ah, sir, when will our public men, not only at foreign legations but in these very Halls and elsewhere, learn that promoters of their own private interests do yearn toward eminent men in official station with a love even like the yearning love of a mother for her first-born?

When Mr. Park, on a few days' acquaintance, offered to loan General Schenck $50,000 for one year, without interest, on his own individual note, and agreed to guarantee 2 per cent. a month on that amount for one year, or, in other words, 24 per cent. on his own indebtedness, without interest, is it not to be regretted, and I doubt not General Schenck regrets to-day, that he did not obey his first impulse? He doubted, hesitated, and, as the report states, it was unfortunate that he did not counsel with representatives at other legations and consult with the State Department at Washington. But his confidence in the enterprise was such that while he hesitated he seemed to think there could be no risk in the investment.

Sir, that was a most unfortunate mistake. There can be no certainty in stock-promoting enterprises; as some of these experts have testified, there is no certainty of the value or resources of a mine, except as you see the ore at the end of the pick.

Mr. Park himself writes General Schenck, May 24, 1874, in explanation of his part in the transaction, concluding as follows:

> I understand, as all intelligent persons do, that mines are uncertain property, and do not always turn out as well as they promise; but that does not prove anything against a vendor of the mine. I wonder if the English gentlemen who are so unsparing of their abuse of Americans would have felt called upon to make further payment to the vendors if the mine had turned out better than it promised to.

This, sir, is the whole matter in a nutshell.

How much better would it have been had General Schenck, when thus approached, obeying his first impulse, replied as follows: "Of course I can have nothing to do with this business; my position here utterly forbids it; I am the American minister, accredited to the leading court of Europe; I am the representative of the American Republic, a Government ordained to teach the world simplicity, purity, and high honor in the administration of public affairs. The enterprise you propose is hazardous. Connect my name, and the influence which my official position gives, with it; throw the whole upon the ups and downs of the leading stock market of the world, and the enterprise lands where I can neither control it nor withdraw the influence, nor repair the injury which it may work." Let him have said this. No, Mr. Speaker, let him not have said this, but let him have drawn from the chambers of his own capacious brain terms to express the tendencies and improprieties of an act which my feeble language can only suggest, and he would have drawn a circle as of fire around the American legation in London which would stand as a warning for all coming time that stock pools, speculators, and promoters of hazardous enterprises generally were not wanted there.

Sir, let this rule be observed inflexibly, let a delicate sense of appreciation and a high tone of honor go with these great trusts, and our foreign missions will stand unchallenged, high, pure, and commanding, even as the hopes, aspirations, and bright ideals of the people of the future destiny of the Republic.

But, sir, while we regret that General Schenck was drawn into this unfortunate error, let us not seek to make him the scape-goat to bear away into diplomatic disgrace all the woes that we have fallen heir to. We do not forget, and we cannot forget, that within the last few years occurrences of this nature have become altogether too common. They are confined to no party, to no locality, to no class. But it is idle to talk longer about public virtue and popular intelligence being the main props and stays of representative government if official influence and power can be farmed out and bartered in the political market, while offices of trust and honor are knocked down to the highest bidder. Within the recent past enterprises have been brought to the doors of this Capitol, and the object boldly avowed of ensnaring the interests of members of Congress with a view to warp their judgments upon matters liable to come directly before them for legislation.

Some of our noblest men in public life have been embarrassed by these schemes, while others have been drawn down into the vortex of irretrievable ruin. Sir, you may call it simplicity, demagogism, verdancy, or what you will. If there is any one thing which the American people are determined upon to-day it is that these things shall cease; that in what party or wherever found they shall be utterly extirpated root and branch. If General Schenck's misfortune has furnished a painful reminder of these abuses let it not be claimed that his case presents the most flagrant phase of them. Remembering our common weaknesses, foibles, and misjudgments, if we must condemn, let it be done in sorrow rather than in anger. None but the savage brandishes the tomahawk over the head of a suffering victim, and none but a ghoul will sit squat at the ear of the public press distilling poison which can only carry distress to the heart and darkness to the household. While the people condemn misconduct in official life, they despise as journalists themselves despise these harpies and magpies of the times. No, Mr. Speaker, if we find ourselves growing censorious and misanthropic, let us go again into the old Senate Chamber yonder and listen once more to the voice of that great soul still saying and sounding down the ages:

> I thank God, if I am gifted with little of the spirit which is able to raise mortals to the skies, I have none, as I trust, of that other spirit which would drag angels down.

Sir, if partisanship cannot palliate, so partisanship should not seek to persecute. I join with the gentleman from West Virginia, [Mr. FAULKNER,] my colleague on the committee, in the congratulation that we have been able to agree to a unanimous report; for, while the phraseology and some of the inferences are not in all cases what the republican members would have employed or suggested, yet the general conclusions express the unanimous opinion of the committee. And let me say to our democratic friends on the other side of the House that while we unite with you in condemnation of the error of General Schenck it is we who claim the right to chide, and we claim it because the republican party remembers its origin, its traditions, its high standards, its record, its achievements, its responsibilities, its hopes, and its future, and renews its determination to carry the banner of republicanism still higher, and hold all its votaries to strict accountability.

But, while we condemn General Schenck's error, we do not forget that he promptly resigned his directorship at the instigation of his Government, and offered to throw up his mission also if his continuing longer would cause it embarrassment; that he is sacrificing every dollar of his property and putting forth every effort in his power to re-imburse individuals who have suffered loss on his account, declaring, if God spares his life, they shall be indemnified to the last dollar.

Nor do we forget, Mr. Speaker, what this House and the country can never forget, that when only a few years ago hostile guns were trained on this Capitol building for its destruction, and the Dome which stands over this marble pile was to have been the target for artillery planted on yonder heights; when infuriate hands would rend the flag of our common country and tear its Constitution to shreds, General Schenck was among the first to draw his sword and bare his breast to the storm, helping to roll back the tide of rebellion which would whelm us in one common ruin.

Remembering these things, and standing here together to-day protected by that same Government which could not be destroyed, and professing to love it and to love one another as our forefathers did one hundred years ago, if we must condemn, let us see to it that it be done with becoming modesty.

Sir, if we do not forget the gallantry of General Schenck, so we cannot forget his eminent public services. When the roar and tumult of war had passed, and the reconstruction acts and kindred legislation were pending before Congress, it was in this very Hall that his great intellect bore sway, and here that he moved men as by the magic of imperial power. Here he helped to remodel and rebuild his country's shattered institutions, and under this roof he rounded out the record of an illustrious career.

Again I repeat, that while we unite with the opposition in condemning his connection with the sale of the Emma Mine "as ill-advised, unfortunate, and incompatible with the duties of his official position," and as something which we hope never to see repeated, we still bespeak for him, what we doubt not he will receive, the lenient judgment of the American people.

Railroad Combinations and Discriminations.

SPEECH OF HON. JAMES H. HOPKINS,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

May 29, 1876,

On the subject of railroad combinations and discriminations.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, I derogate nothing from the magnitude of any of the subjects which have been presented for our consideration when I claim that the bill to prohibit discriminations by common carriers is second to none in universal and practical importance.

Favoritism under all circumstances is obnoxious to the general public. When practiced by corporations enjoying special privileges under the law it is peculiarly odious. When those corporations are powerful and wealthy, it is apt to become tyrannical and oppressive.

When prosperity abounds, when business is active, when men are absorbed by the imperative demands of trade they pay little heed to the greater facilities which their neighbors may enjoy. While manufacturing and commerce are fairly remunerative, unequal burdens may be borne without complaint. But when profits dwindle away, when trade languishes, when capital is idle, when industry is unemployed, men apply their thoughts to learn every cause of depression and eagerly seek redress for every wrong. In the severe school of the last few years many harsh and unwelcome lessons have been learned. Some of those who, despite the panic, might have struggled on through depression and gloom have found that they were crushed beneath the superadded burdens of others. Against this inequality the masses of the people have indignantly protested, and have called upon us for a measure of relief.

Of all communities smitten by the simoom of 1873 none was more severely scorched and withered than that which I represent upon this floor—a people whose capitalists are renowned for their proverbial industry and conservative energy; for their substantial wealth and for their steady prosperity; and whose artisans stand in the front rank of skilled, intelligent, and honest workmen. To that people nature has been very lavish of her bounties, giving them at their very doors coal and iron and oil, offering the most generous inducements to capital and labor to convert the crude materials into a thousand forms of usefulness and beauty. That great center of manufacturing facilities, stimulated by the suggestions of nature, grew into a large, busy, and prosperous city. But desolate rolling-mills, furnaces out of blast, refineries dilapidated, machinery idle, hundreds unemployed, and none so busy as the bankrupt courts, presents a sorrowful contrast with former years. Much of this gloom results from causes beyond legislative control. But part of it is due to the arbitrary and unjust imposition of corporations, from which relief is sought by those who have survived the financial crash and have stood up bravely in an unequal contest.

During the past few weeks I have received and presented to this House petitions from hundreds of citizens of Pittsburgh asking for the passage of this bill. The chamber of commerce has memorialized Congress upon the subject, and the laboring-men have held meetings to declare their great interest in this measure.

What is true of Pittsburgh is true of many other places; and between citizens of the same place there are many cases of unjust and onerous discrimination which cry out for redress. In presenting the grievances of my constituents I feel assured they are but the counterpart of those of other localities, and in speaking against the wrongs with which I am most familiar, I speak for all who have experienced the same unfriendly policy.

Mr. Speaker, I desire to show this House some of the evils complained of and their disastrous results, and then to urge such remedy as it may be in our power to bestow.

The discovery of petroleum in Western Pennsylvania rapidly developed into one of our most important elements of industry and wealth. The oil-producing region extends to within thirty-five miles of Pittsburgh, thus making that city the most convenient and natural point for refining and shipping. Trade, uninfluenced by extraneous circumstances, suggests its own best line of travel. And so the oil traffic chose Pittsburgh as its distributive point. At one time there were over sixty refineries there, employing a large amount of capital and a great many busy hands. Now scarcely one-third of that number are in operation, and of that third fully one-half are unremunerative. The demand for oil has not decreased, but on the contrary it is continually finding new uses and new markets throughout the world. Its manufacturers have lost none of their energy or skill; and yet they have seen this stream of abundance and affluence drying up before their eyes; or, to speak more accurately, they have seen it, by forced and unnatural means, diverted from its course, and their works left dry and idle on the beach. Most of this great trade has been turned backward to find its starting-point for foreign shipment one hundred and forty miles farther from the sea. The sufferers from this harsh process affirm that it has been brought about by an unlawful combination and by the most oppressive discriminations against them. Certain it is that no other explanation has been given or can be imagined for this extraordinary fact, for this extreme departure from the natural law of commerce.

To those unfamiliar with the extent of the oil business it may seem like giving it undue importance to refer to it as fully as I propose to do. But let it be remembered that this is one of the great elements of national wealth, one of the chief articles of export, one of the main supports of our shipping interests, and a leading source of supply of foreign exchange. Let it be remembered that in 1875 we exported 217,000,000 gallons of oil, bringing to this country in return $30,000,000. Let it also be remembered that this has become the poor man's light throughout this country.

I cannot better illustrate the magnitude of the petroleum business properly belonging to Pittsburgh, the extent of its influence upon other industries, and the disastrous effects of an adverse policy, than by quoting from a report recently made to the Chamber of Commerce of that city:

Your committee appointed to obtain statistics in relation to the petroleum-oil business of this district report as follows:

There are twenty-one oil refineries idle, owing to freight discriminations and combinations.

Over $2,000,000 are invested in the construction of the same.

The refining capacity of the twenty-one refineries is about 58,000 barrels of refined oil per week.

There will be required for this capacity, including the benzine product, the consumption per week of over 60,000 barrels, giving employment per day to 1,660 men.

Sixty thousand bushels of coal, giving employment per day to 100 men.

Three hundred tons of hoop iron, giving employment per day to 325 men.

Two hundred and ten tons of sulphuric acid, giving employment per day to 105 men.

Fifteen tons of glue, giving employment per day to 60 men.

Seven tons of paint, giving employment per day to 5 men.

Ten thousand dollars' worth of chemicals, giving employment per day to 5 men.

Also requiring at the oil refineries 800 men, making an aggregate of 3,060 men directly unemployed, to which may be added a large number unemployed directly and remotely connected with the various branches of business enumerated above, as well as numbers of carpenters, masons, bricklayers, boiler-makers, pump-makers, and various other trades, who would have employment and profit if the oil-refining business was in a prosperous condition.

The direct loss to our community in the unprosperous condition of this business cannot be estimated with any degree of precision; but that it is a very large loss cannot be denied when it is considered that petroleum is the third article in magnitude of the exports of this country, and that the largest part of this business properly belongs to this city and vicinity by reason of geographical position and unequaled facilities for cheap work and fuel. If these oil refineries were in operation as they have been in the past, and it is self-evident they would be now except for railroad discriminations and combinations forcing the business out of its natural channel, it would put in active circulation the sum of $800,000 per week, for oil is a cash article and paid for as soon as delivered for export.

In view of these facts, Mr. Speaker, is it a matter of surprise that those whose judicious investments have proved ruinous, those whose honest enterprises have been crushed, those whose means of livelihood have been taken away should with united and earnest voice demand relief?

I do not propose to suggest or discuss the motives which prompt the turning of trade hundreds of miles out of its usual and regular channel. I simply state the uncontroverted fact, drawing no inference except the apparent one, that a great wrong is done to legitimate commerce which we can and should redress. In 1873 the receipts of crude oil by rail at Pittsburgh amounted to about 1,500,000 barrels. In 1875, under the policy complained of, only about 550,000 barrels were received. During a few weeks of the present year, while Pittsburgh received but 22,000 barrels, 122,000 barrels were delivered at Cleveland. From Cleveland this same oil can be and is shipped to the seaboard, part of it directly through Pittsburgh, at a lower rate than is charged the Pittsburgh shipper who may not be of the favored few.

Another fact developed within the past few weeks: Those who have been denied equal facilities and equal rates over the roads running directly east have discovered that they can carry their oil some three hundred miles down the Ohio River and ship it from Huntingdon over the Chesapeake and Ohio road to Richmond, a distance of four hundred and twenty-one miles, at fully one-third less than they would be required to pay over either of the direct lines; and many thousand barrels have been already shipped by that circuitous route. Why impose upon the owner this increased danger and increased care? Perhaps no product can be transported by rail with less expense or trouble to the carrier. It is therefore apparent that the carriage of oil is not objectionable. In fact it was the subject of lively competition, which preserved reasonable and impartial rates until monopolies bargained for, and are striving to secure, its absolute control. The same thing was attempted once before; and the records of this House show the extent and the power of the combination which then had wound its coils around individual enterprise and industry, and had well-nigh crushed their life out, when the people arose in their majesty and throttled the monster. But now it seems they "scotched the snake, not killed it." A reference to that record will serve the triple purpose of presenting in an authentic way the fact, the method, and the effect of these combinations by common carriers.

Early in 1872 the oil-producers were startled by an announcement that their rates of freight were immediately to be doubled. Every indication pointed to a powerful and extensive combination to seize upon and monopolize the oil traffic by driving individual enterprise into bankruptcy or by forcing it to surrender. Excitement, indignation, and alarm spread throughout the producing region. Public meetings were held; protective associations were formed; a congressional investigation was instituted, and the facts elicited have now the verity of history. It was proved that all of the railroads leading from that section had combined with each other and with another corporation called the South Improvement Company, looking to the absolute control of that vast industry and the arbitrary parceling out of its profits among themselves. The original articles of agreement were produced, the parties thereto were sworn, and all the details of the arrangement were disclosed. The possibility of individual interests being thus smitten to the ground and trampled upon by a reckless monopoly filled the people with terror. If the oil trade could thus be swallowed up, why not the iron, the cotton, the glass, the sugar, the breadstuffs of the country? So vehement and angry was the popular clamor that these powerful railroad companies were compelled to cancel their compact, and the Legislature was forced to repeal the charter of the South Improvement Company. The excitement then abated, business resumed its natural flow, and the then contemplated regulation of commerce was abandoned under the vain hope that that trouble was forever ended. But it is believed and charged that the present mischief is wrought by the self-same means. Certain it is that, now as then, those not in the charmed circle are being driven to the wall by the most unfair and remorseless discriminations.

Mr. Speaker, it is not oil alone which has felt the disastrous effects of the policy of unfairness which this bill seeks to correct. Nor are these discriminations confined to east-bound freight.

No city produces a better article of white lead than Pittsburgh, and purchasers recognized the fact by their large purchases. In 1874 one manufacturing firm sold 12,000 tons. In 1875, this same firm sold but one thousand tons, because the freights upon this article were much less from a city farther east.

The manufacture of glass has been one of our largest industries, but how long it will continue so, may be imagined when you know that its dealers are charged forty cents per hundred pounds to Chicago; while the same article can be, and is carried more than three hundred miles farther at one-half the cost.

Iron, one of the chiefest elements of our substantial wealth, which by its multiform industries has done so much for the growth and prosperity of our city, which has given employment to thousands of operatives and to millions of capital, has experienced the same ruthless treatment. All of the natural advantages which have made that city the American Birmingham are nullified by the partiality of common carriers. The competition between manufacturers at different points is always active, and an advantage of freight rates may at any time put out the fires in the mills of one locality and give those elsewhere a double duty. And so it has been found that merchants have turned away from the Iron City, not because the prices and the articles were not satisfactory, but because the freights were lower from a much remoter market.

In further illustration of this policy I refer to the article of flour; and this argument is felt at every fireside; and every item of increased cost is seriously felt by the toiling millions of the land. Depression in wages and increased cost of living in any locality come with a peculiar hardship to those unable to move to a more favored place. They are compelled to struggle with the adversities which confront them; and even a slight increase in the cost of the necessaries of life is of more moment to them than thousands of dollars to the wealthy class. The poor men, of all others, are entitled to protection from unnecessary burdens, and all discriminations which affect them are not only unnecessary, but especially unjust. By a recent schedule Pittsburgh dealers were required to pay a much higher rate of freight on flour than any of those in seaboard cities; and at all times our people are at a serious disadvantage in this regard.

I need not multiply illustrations. I have certainly given enough to justify the earnestness of my constituents in pleading with Congress for relief from the unequal and unfair burdens which they have too long been compelled to bear.

I have said, Mr. Speaker, that the grievances which I have recited are not peculiar to Pittsburgh. They are felt everywhere. Sometimes whole communities feel them; sometimes special branches of industry; sometimes only a portion of those in the same place engaged in the same business. All of which demonstrates the fact of favoritism, and of uncertainty which is in itself an incubus upon business. The board of trade of Cleveland have recommended the passage of the bill under consideration, and representative men from that city, from Titusville, from Baltimore, from Philadelphia, from New York City, have been before the Committee on Commerce urging Congressional action.

An able article in the New York Journal of Commerce, advocating Government supervision of railways, gives this strong illustration not only of exorbitant but of unequal charges:

> If a merchant desires to ship one hundred pounds of goods from New York to a local station on the Pacific line, say Winnemucca, which is four hundred and sixty miles east of San Francisco, they charge him first the through rate to San Francisco, $6, and then, in addition to that, the local rate from San Francisco back to Winnemucca, $2.29, making $8.29 per one hundred pounds.

There is scarcely a gentleman upon this floor who does not represent constituents at least to some extent similarly affected. The evil being so general and its effect so grevious, why should Congress refuse to interpose? It cannot be for want of jurisdiction over the subject-matter; for I think I can conclusively show by precedent that Congress has exercised as full control as it is here asked to assume, and by well-established authority that its powers in that direction are supreme.

In 1866 an act was passed authorizing railroads of one State to connect with those of another State in order to form continuous lines of travel and to carry over and upon its roads, ferries, and bridges all manner of freight. Here was direct legislation upon the subject of inter state commerce; legislation which asserted the power of Congress as against State Legislatures which had prohibited certain railroads to form connections and to carry through freight.

On the 24th of January, 1872, this House by a unanimous vote directed the Committee on Commerce to inquire "whether the commerce among the several States of this Union is injuriously affected by any inadequacy in the present amount of land transportation or by any combination or monopoly in the control or ownership thereof, or by means of any existing or inequitable rates of freight or fare charged by common carriers, or by means of other improper burdens or restraints imposed upon such commerce by such carriers."

A few weeks later in the same session a resolution was passed without a word of opposition which still further asserted the complete power of Congress over such commerce. That resolution was as follows:

> Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce is hereby instructed in carrying out the resolution of the House of January 24 last, directing certain inquiries by them concerning injuries to commerce by reason of combinations or monopolies in control or ownership of the present means of land transportation, particularly to inquire into the nature, extent, and object of an alleged combination of railroad interests known as the South Improvement Company, alleged to be designed to control all the existing avenues of transportation from the oil regions of Pennsylvania to the seaboard, to the oppression and injury of the producing classes.

Still later and fuller recognition of this power was shown by the passage of a bill in this House on March 28, 1874, providing for the appointment by the President of a board of railroad commissioners, who should have power to prescribe schedules of charges for carrying freight and passengers; and the violation of such schedules was to be visited with the severest penalties.

In 1873 an act was passed prohibiting railroad companies engaged in carrying live-stock between States from confining such stock in the same cars longer than twenty-eight consecutive hours without water, food, and rest.

Further in the line of precedents asserting the jurisdiction of Congress over interstate commerce, I refer to the appointment by the Senate in 1872 of a select committee "to investigate and report upon the subject of transportation between the interior and the seaboard," a committee which held its sessions in different parts of the country for a period of two years, and prepared a most elaborate, exhaustive, and able report.

These precedents are so abundantly sustained that it seems difficult to find foundation for a doubt of the power of Congress to pass the bill under consideration.

The powers specifically delegated to Congress are enumerated in section 8 of article 1 of the Constitution, and among them is the power—

> To regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States.

Section 9 of the same article declares, in the list of prohibited powers, that—

> No preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another; nor shall vessels bound to or from one State be obliged to enter, clear, or pay duties in another.

These two clauses are the basis of the authority sought to be exercised by the pending bill. The one shows the unquestionable power of Congress over interstate as well as foreign commerce, while the other indicates with equal clearness that there should be no abuse of that power, no discriminations for or against any locality; but that every regulation which Congress might make should be governed by justice and equity.

It is needless to refer to the commercial troubles experienced while the Union existed under articles of confederation, and which prompted the States to surrender this exclusive control to Congress. Here we find the power given "to regulate commerce;" and if any doubt exists as to the full meaning of those words, it will easily be removed by an examination of the judicial interpretation they have often received.

In Martin's Summary of the Law of Nations it is said:

> Commerce consists in selling the superfluity; in purchasing articles of necessity, as well productions as manufactures; in buying from one nation and selling to another; or in transporting the merchandise from the seller to the buyer to gain the freight.

In the great and leading case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, 9 Wheaton, 193, Chief Justice Marshall discusses this question in all its bearings, and with his usual power sets at rest all doubts or misgivings. He says:

> The word used in the Constitution then comprehends, and has been always understood to comprehend, navigation within its meaning; and a power to regulate navigation is as expressly granted as if that term had been added to the word "commerce." It has, we believe, been universally admitted that these words comprehend every species of commercial intercourse between the United States and foreign nations. No sort of trade can be carried on between this country and any other to which this power does not extend. It has been truly said that commerce, as the word is used in the Constitution, is a unit, every part of which is indicated by the term. * * * Commerce among the States cannot stop at the external boundary-line of each State, but may be introduced into the interior. * * * Can a trading expedition between two adjoining States commence and terminate outside of each; and if the trading intercourse be between two States remote from each other, must it not commence in one, terminate in the other, and probably pass through a third? The power of Congress then, whatever it may be, must be exercised within the territorial jurisdiction of the several States. The sense of the nation on this subject is unequivocally manifested by the provisions made in the laws for transporting goods by land between Baltimore and Providence, between

New York and Philadelphia, and between Philadelphia and Baltimore. We are now arrived at the inquiry, what is this power? It is the power to regulate, that is, to prescribe the rule by which commerce is to be governed. This power, like all others vested in Congress, is complete in itself, may be exercised to its utmost extent, and acknowledges no limitations other than are prescribed in the Constitution.

Story, in his Commentaries on the Constitution, volume 2, section 1064, sums up his review of the decisions upon this clause in these words:

It may, therefore, be safely affirmed that the terms of the Constitution have at all times been understood to include a power over navigation as well as trade, over intercourse as well as traffic.

The same definition, more minutely expressed, is found in the opinion of Justice Johnson in the case just cited:

Commerce, in its simplest signification, means an exchange of goods; but in the advancement of society, labor, transportation, intelligence, care, and various mediums of exchange become commodities, and enter into commerce, the subject, the vehicle, the agent, and their various operations become the objects of commercial regulation; ship-building, the carrying trade, and the propagation of seamen are such vital agents of commercial prosperity that the nation which could not legislate over these subjects would not possess power to regulate commerce. (9 Wheaton, page 229.)

The only limitation upon this comprehensive and absolute power is that "no preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce." So far from that being an objection to the bill under consideration, the very purpose sought to be accomplished by this regulation of commerce is to break up and prohibit the most arbitrary and unjust preferences, which have grown into a system, because of the failure to provide adequate penalties. It is not pretended that the discriminations complained of are authorized by State law. There is no conflict between Federal and State law upon this subject. The wrongs sought to be remedied are in violation of the common law as to common carriers; and cannot be defended upon any ground whatever.

These preferences are shown, these discriminations made by corporations, the creatures of law; and it needs no argument to show, that the creature cannot exercise more power than the creator. The States themselves, which gave life to these corporations, with all their power could not impose such burdens upon interstate and foreign commerce nor grant such special privileges to any portion of such traffic.

Acts of the New York Legislature granting to Livingston and Fulton the exclusive navigation of the waters of the State in vessels propelled by steam were held to be unconstitutional and void and repugnant to the power given to Congress to regulate commerce, so far as they prohibited vessels licensed by the United States for carrying on the coasting trade from navigating the waters of New York. (Gibbons vs. Ogden, 9 Wheaton.)

This power to regulate commerce by Congress and to secure it from all restrictions or burdens under State authority, has been so jealously guarded that the Supreme Court decided to be unconstitutional a State law requiring a payment to the master and wardens of a port in addition to their fees. (Southern Steamship Company vs. Portwardens of New Orleans, 6 Wallace, 31.)

So a State law authorizing the health commissioner to collect a certain sum from the master and each cabin passenger for marine hospital, &c., was held to be unconstitutional, as encroaching upon the power of Congress alone to regulate commerce. (Passenger Cases, 7 Howard, 283.)

Although it is true that traffic by railroad was unknown and undreamed of when the Constitution of the United States was framed, it is also true that navigation by steam-vessels was unknown; yet, in the comprehensive language used in the clauses of that instrument which have been quoted, as indeed in all its clauses, we see the amazing wisdom, if not inspiration, which guided its authors. The words used adapt themselves to every advancement in civilization, to all the changes of time and circumstance. And hence we find that Congress has not hesitated to enact laws regulating the construction and management of steamboats; and no one has questioned our power over all the details of such commerce. The power of Congress "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States" is absolute, and has no limitation but the single one that all such regulations shall be equitable. Commerce, foreign and interstate, whether upon the ocean, the lakes, the rivers, or the land, is subject to the control of Congress. Remembering that commerce includes intercourse, the carrying-trade, and that "the subject, the vehicle, the agent, and their various operations become the objects of commercial regulation," there can be no doubt that all common carriers, whether by river, canal, or railroad, are included within the reach of this power wherever and whenever their traffic is from State to State or with foreign nations.

The power to regulate commerce does not stop at the mere boundary-line of a State; nor is it confined to acts done upon the water or in the necessary course of the navigation thereof. It extends to such acts done on land which interfere with, obstruct, or prevent the due exercise of the power to regulate commerce and navigation with foreign nations and among the States. Any offense which thus interferes with, obstructs, or prevents such commerce and navigation, though done on land, may be punished by Congress under its general authority to make all laws necessary and proper to execute their delegated constitutional powers. (United States vs. Coombs, 12 Peters, 78.)

Judge Redfield, who devoted many years to the study of railways and the laws which govern them, and whose distinguished abilities make him a recognized authority upon all things appertaining thereto, affirms the right of the National Government to control the railways of the country, and argues that uniformity of charges "is the one thing which alone will enable the railways and the people both to live and conduct business upon fair grounds." And "the want of some such stringent system of supervision, which should bring all charges to a uniform standard and a reasonable limit, is the very thing which has ruined many of the most productive lines of railway in the country."

In the Clinton-bridge case it was said by Justice Miller (16 American Law Register, page 153) that railroads which are lines or parts of lines of interstate communication are equally subject to the regulation of Congress, as are steamboats. This proposition is so manifestly clear and logically conclusive that no one will venture to controvert it.

Congress, then, having the unquestionable, unlimited, and exclusive power over the evils complained of, why should it not exercise that power?

I have already said that the wrongs complained of are in violation of the law of common carriers. All the text-books on the subject teach us, that a common carrier is bound to receive the goods of all persons alike, and upon the same terms, and at the same rate. (Chitty's Commercial Law, 71.) And there is no distinction between a carrier by land or an inland carrier by water, or, as Sir William Jones expresses it, between a wagon and a barge; and he might have added between a steamboat and a railroad.

It may be confidently affirmed that every violation of this duty of perfect equality subjects the carrier to an action at law. But something more is needed than the mere common-law remedy.

So it was found in England. And accordingly in 1854 an act of Parliament was passed known as "the railway and canal traffic act," which, although more minute in its details, had the same general purpose as the bill under consideration. Under that act unjust preferences to a great extent were broken up; trade was no longer diverted from its shortest and legitimate route out of motives of selfishness or rivalry. Many wrongs were redressed, and injury was done to neither the shipper nor the carrier. The numerous cases collated in a treatise by Gilmore Evans, and another by George Brown, show the extent of the evils complained of and the necessity for legislative interference.

In this country there is no denial of the fact that discriminations are constantly made; that unfair preferences are continually given, and that the disastrous effects of this policy are shown upon the bankrupt records, by individual enterprise which has been crushed, by special industries in some localities deprived of their natural sustenance, by the entire diversion of one great element of a state's wealth and commerce from its natural route, and by the tribute which every unfavored place or way-station is compelled to pay to those enjoying the benefits of discrimination.

I have called special attention to the ruinous effects of adverse discrimination upon the constituency which I immediately represent; but I have said that the evil is wide-spread and the complaint comes up from all sections of the country. In Wisconsin a political revolution was wrought upon this question. In Illinois it was regarded so important that the right to control railroads and prohibit discriminations was incorporated into the State constitution in 1870. The constitution of Pennsylvania contains clauses of similar import, seeking to accomplish the same reform. Massachusetts has a board of railroad commissioners with extensive powers, and other States have sought in various ways to accomplish the same end, the correction of abuses, the prevention of discriminations.

The relief given by State legislation is necessarily partial, local, and unequal. Its inadequacy will be apparent when it is remembered that all of the great railroad lines enter into and pass through more than one State, and the equity and impartiality which one Commonwealth may enforce may be nullified by undue burdens laid upon the same cargo when the State boundary is crossed. The power of Congress here invoked does not in the slightest degree interfere with the recognized right of each State to regulate its internal commerce. But interstate commerce and commerce between inland States and foreign nations are obstructed and injured in ways which State laws cannot reach, and hence the demand is made of the General Government to exercise the power which the States surrendered to it for the general good.

In urging the passage of this bill I am not unmindful of the serious difficulties which embarrass all legislation upon this subject. The cost of construction of various roads and the cost of maintaining and working them differ and the expenses upon different parts of the same road are not uniform. Hence an objection to fixing an unvarying schedule per mile for freight on all roads. Fully appreciating all of the difficulties which lie in the way of legislation which will be alike just to the railroads and to the people and remembering the duty and liability of common carriers, I have merely sought by this bill to give efficacy to the common law upon this subject.

The first section declares that no discrimination shall be made by common carriers within the jurisdiction of the United States Government. And that is but a re-affirmation of the law governing common carriers everywhere.

The second section furnishes the shipper with information as to the established rates, prevents sudden and frequent changes, and provides a penalty in case he is subjected to unequal charges.

The third section provides penalties for all evasions of the law.

The fourth section prohibits combinations by which the objects of the act may be defeated and unfair preferences given.

It will be observed that this bill gives no new privileges to shippers; it imposes no new burdens upon carriers. It but recognizes a principle of law older than any corporation, the universal disregard of which renders necessary its re-enactment, with adequate penalties for its violation.

Our American railway system has grown into power unrestrained by legislative control. We have trusted to competition to secure us from abuses of this power; but competition has ended in combination, or in spasmodic conflicts which are equally injurious to steady trade. Commerce has suffered so much of late years from the caprices, the rivalry, and the self-interest of railway managers that relief must be found. It may be obtained by legislative regulation, or, if not there, in Government control or even Government ownership. I allude to the possibility—which I trust may never be realized—of an outraged and angry people, through their Legislatures, arresting the charters of these corporations and managing them through their executive officer. In Belgium there are railroads owned by the government, and it is said they are managed with economy and fidelity. Some of the States of the Union have tried the experiment of running lines of railroad and canal. But they usually become instruments of political power and hot-beds of corruption. Legislative regulation is exercised in England and France with the most satisfactory results. The French law is based upon three principles: that railroads shall not charge more for carriage over a less than over a greater distance; under similar circumstances there shall be no discriminations made between persons; no changes in tariffs shall be effected except after a specified public notice and upon the approval of the minister of public works. These same principles are recognized in the pending bill, and their enforcement, while working no hardships to any corporation, will be but simple justice and will allay public excitement produced by existing wrongs.

This bill does not propose that Congress shall arbitrarily fix a schedule of freight charges which every railroad shall observe. It leaves that to the control of the several corporations, to be regulated as the judgment of each may direct. The managers of each road know the exact cost and average quantity of freight carried over their lines, and can easily make an equitable and uniform rate, a rate remunerative to the shareholders, yet fair to the public. If each trunk line is required to prepare its schedule upon this basis, and is prohibited from making sudden and frequent changes thereof, there will be an end to those furious and wasteful railroad wars, and an end to the crushing burden put upon way-freight in order that through-freight may be carried at less than cost—an odious tribute to folly and obstinacy.

Just now the business interests of the country are unsettled because of a fresh quarrel between the great railroad managers. The published correspondence shows that they attempt no concealment of the fact that they had combined and conspired to control the freights. William H. Vanderbilt, addressing the presidents of other companies, says:

> Our withdrawal from the agreement of March 2 simply places the western roads on east-bound business in the same position we are on west-bound, and we refuse to exact from them any longer compliance with our dictation.

These mammoth corporations have no consideration for the great commercial interests of the country. They make compacts and break them; they combine and they go to war, caring nothing for those who suffer. A sudden and radical change of rates inevitably brings confusion and disaster. Already we read of numerous failures in the East and West caused by the serious disturbance of values resulting from this railroad war.

While I speak for the people in demanding from Congress a recognition of their rights which railroad officials refuse to respect, I insist that the passage of this bill would be an advantage to railroads, by protecting them from each other, and from combinations among themselves which always end in contention, in expensive, and demoralizing rivalry.

I urge this measure upon the consideration of Congress, believing it to be just to the shipper and the carrier; believing it will conduce to the regularity and prosperity of commerce; believing it will relieve trade from unnatural restraints and diversions; and believing it to be in the interest of that fair play to which all American citizens are entitled.

Protection and Development of Home Industry.

SPEECH OF HON. C. FREEMAN,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

May 18, 1876.

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. FREEMAN said:

I thank the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. HENDEE] for his courtesy.

Mr. Chairman, as it is my intention to vote against the tariff bill reported from the Committee of Ways and Means, and as I consider it in many respects the most important measure of the session, I propose to ask the attention of the committee while I give, as briefly as may be, my reasons for that vote. It is entitled "A bill to revise and simplify existing laws imposing duties on imports, and to reduce taxation." Let us see to what extent and in what manner these objects are achieved. The necessity of revenue, however derived, is, primarily, for the purpose of carrying on the Government, but it is not to be doubted that duties imposed on imports are also intimately connected with the nurture of home-labor. It is in the highest degree essential to the public welfare, therefore, that they should be levied in such form and to such extent as will make the burden lightest and most conducive to the development and protection of that home-labor. It is an undeniable proposition that in a new country from the necessarily relative sparsity of its population, labor will command a higher remuneration than in one older and more densely peopled; and this, of course, from the settled principle of supply and demand. And particularly is this so in regard to what may be termed skilled labor. It is also to be borne in mind that to an extent almost unknown within the boundaries of any other government under the sky the vast expanse of this country presents a complex diversity of interests which it should be the aim of a broad statesmanship to harmonize and foster.

I, sir, am in favor of such action by this Government as shall most minister to the welfare of the people by protecting home industry and fostering and developing home productions and manufactures. Self-protection is the inevitable law of life, individual or governmental; and no prosperity can attend the growth of any new and young country in which that vital principle is not carefully studied and applied. Under this beneficent doctrine, the products of American manufacturing, mining, and mechanic arts have increased from $1,019,106,616 in 1850 to $1,885,861,676 in 1860, and to $4,232,325,442 in 1870. And this aid, too, of necessity, should be free from vacillation and uncertainty. As an eminent writer, Mr. Bigelow, so forcibly puts it in his able treatise upon this subject:

> No matter how capable or how energetic any people may naturally be, nor how favored in position or climate or soil, their industrial capacities can never be fully developed under a vacillating and uncertain public policy. Men do not embark either capital or skill in enterprises liable at any time to be defeated by inconsiderate or unfriendly legislation. A stable order of things and a well-founded confidence in the future are all essential conditions of manufacturing success. Such stability and such confidence the English manufacturer has always enjoyed. Alike in peace and in war and under all administrations, he has been able to rely upon the steady and enlightened co-operation of his government. To protect, encourage, and extend the manufactures of Great Britain has been the wise and uniform policy of her statesmen for at least a century; and the result is seen in a manufacturing prosperity that is without a parallel.

Of late years the doctrine of Great Britain is alleged to have undergone a change; but it is more alleged than real, and always has been governed by the circumstances of its own case and guided in the direction of its own home welfare. These, then, are clearly two of the vital elements of the productive power of a country: on the one hand, a protective duty on the imports of articles of home manufacture that shall equalize the cost of production, the prices and hours of labor, the thoroughly developed advantages of long years of application of capital in firmly established commercial relations; and, on the other hand, a judicious stability and regularity in the laws governing such duties, that commercial matters may be free from the deadly incubus of uncertainty, that capital may be encouraged to pour out its mighty resources into the lap of industry with that freedom and confidence which well-digested and steadfast legislation can alone induce.

Now, sir, what does this new tariff bill propose to do? It is but a little more than a decade after the close of the most frightful civil struggle which human history unfolds. That struggle was one, which, it is but the solemn language of truth to assert, was only made endurable and successful by this young people through the action of the wise men who had been able, amid the bitter opposition of less thoughtful minds, to throw around home industry that partial system of protection which enabled the latent energy of the manufacturing interests to spring into an enlarged vitality, breathing a living energy into the Government which had else been comparatively powerless. The reaction which follows the expansion of war, and brings to every people engaged therein the resulting misery of war, is still enshrouding us to-day. The factories and mills are nearly still; the demand for the wealth of the bosom of the earth is sluggard and staggering; commerce is prostrate, and the home of the laborer is darkened with want. The suffering people are looking to Congress for relief.

The democratic party, capitalizing the misery resulting from its ruthless war upon free institutions, rode into accidental power in this House. And what has it done? In mockery of the vast debt hurled by its own iniquities upon an overconfiding people, it has struck at some of the greatest interests of our commerce, and, in a wild delirium of desire for party gain, has junketed around by day and fished around by night in the contortions of its embryo virtue, until public business is almost at a halt; and all in the prostituted names of honesty and economy. And what does it propose to do? One of the answers is to be found in this bill. Sir, it proposes to put another twist around the almost strangulated neck of trade, and drive another nail in the coffin which all but entombs American industry to-day. In round numbers this bill decreases the duties on articles of home production and manufactures to the extent of nearly $15,000,000, and makes a net decrease in the revenue from customs duties to just that amount; and this, too, at a time when importations are still decreasing from the depressed condition of business and the general stagnation of commerce throughout the world.

The annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury shows that for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, the total receipts of the Government from all sources were $288,000,051.10. Of this amount there were received from customs duties $157,167,722.35, being more than one-half of the national revenue. The present tariff went into operation on the 1st day of July, 1874. Prior to that time importations decreased, not owing to the tariff, but on account of the business panic of September, 1873, under the effects of which the nation is still writhing. The value of merchandise entered for consumption during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874, was $595,865,754.10, and the amount of duty paid thereon was $160,522,284.63. In 1875 the value of merchandise entered for consumption was $547,050,117.90, and the amount of duty paid thereon was $154,554,982.55. This shows a falling off of $48,815,636.20 in the value of merchandise imported and entered for consumption, and a loss of $5,967,302.08 in the total of duty paid in 1875 as compared with 1874. And yet, in the face of this serious decline of customs duties and the prostration of domestic industry, it is proposed that the enormous reductions provided for in this bill shall be made, many of them—as the original bill intended, and is still to be attempted in this—directly in favor of the greatest luxuries of life, and only within the enjoyment of the favored few.

In order that a proper understanding may be reached of the alterations suggested by this bill, there is herewith appended a complete classification of the amounts of duty collected during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, on commodities enumerated therein, and of estimated duties on amounts entered in 1875 under the proposed rates of duty in this bill.

Statement of amount of duty collected during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, on commodities enumerated in House bill No. 3132, and of estimated duties on amounts entered in 1875, under the proposed rates of duty in said bill, with equivalent ad valorem duties.

Commodities.	Foreign merchandise entered into consumption during the fiscal year 1875.			Estimated duties on amounts entered in 1875 at proposed rate.	Decrease of duty on amounts entered in 1875.	Rate of duty in force in 1875.	Equivalent ad valorem at rates in force in 1875.	Proposed rate in bill H. R. No. 3132.	Equivalent ad valorem under proposed rates.	Increase of duty.	Equivalent ad valorem under existing law.	Percentage of decrease.
	Quantity.	Value.	Amount of duty.
Cotton, manufactures of:
On all manufactures of cottons (except jeans, denims, drillings, &c.) not bleached, colored, painted, or printed, and not exceeding 100 threads to the sq. in., counting warps and filling, and exceeding in weight 5 oz. per sq. yd., unbleached sq. yd.	29,949.00	$3,585 00	$1,388 09	$898 47	$489 62	5c. per sq. yd	38.72	3c. per sq. yd	25.06		31.72	20.99
Bleached sq. yd.	6,988,340.00	881,034 38	356,577 09	279,533 60	77,043 49	5½c. per sq. yd.	30.37	4c. per sq. yd	31.74		43.64	27.27
Colored, stained, painted, or printed sq. yd.	411,750.00	32,105 33	23,440 26	18,528 75	7,911 51	5½c. per sq. yd. and 10 p. c.	73.01	4½c. per sq. yd.	57.71		63.65
Finer and lighter goods of like description, not exceeding 200 threads to the sq. in., counting the warp and filling, unbleached sq. yd.	29,949.00	3,585 00	1,389 09	898 47	489 62	5c. per sq. yd	38.72	4c. per sq. yd	25 06		31.72	20.99
Bleached sq. yd.	6,988,340.00	881,034 38	356,577 09	279,533 61	77,043 48	5½c. per sq. yd.	40.47	4½c. per sq. yd.	31.74		43.64	27.27
Colored, &c sq. yd.	12,983,573.00	1,923,456 48	1,010,401 16	649,178 65	361,222 51	5½c. per sq. yd. and 20 p. c.	52.53	5c. per sq. yd	33.75		56.47
Goods of like description, exceeding 200 threads to the sq. in., counting the warp and filling, unbleached sq. yd.	29,949.00	3,585 00	1,388 09	898 47	489 62	5c. per sq. yd	38.72	4c. per sq. yd	25.06		31.72	20.99
Bleached sq. yd.	6,988,340.00	881,034 38	356,577 09	279,533 60	77,043 48	5½c. per sq. yd.	40.47	4½c. per sq. yd.	31.74		43.64	27.27
Colored, &c sq. yd.	1,281,674.00	188,415 50	99,634 64	64,083 70	35,550 94	5½c. per sq. yd. and 20 p. c.	50.76	5c. per sq. yd	34.01		58.04	41.04
Cotton jeans, denims, drillings, bed-tickings, ginghams, plaids, cottonades, &c., and not exceeding 100 threads in sq. in., counting warps and filling, and exceeding 5 oz. to the sq. yd., unbleached sq. yd.	2,258.00	472 33	122 65	90 32	32 33	6c. per sq. yd	25.97	4c. per sq. yd	19.12		19.82	00.04
Bleached sq. yd.	138.00	17 00	8 14	6 21	1 93	6½c. per sq. yd.	47.88	4½c. per sq. yd.	36.53		32.50	11.03
Colored, &c sq. yd.	26,325.00	3,765 67	1,953 93	1,316 25	637 68	6½c. per sq. yd. and 10 p. c.	51.88	5c. per sq. yd	34.95		53.86	33.25
Finer and lighter goods of like description, not exceeding 200 threads to sq. in., counting warp and filling, unbleached						6c. per sq. yd		4c. per sq. yd
Bleached						6½c. per sq. yd.		4½c. per sq. yd.
Colored, &c	1,873,581.50	249,220 00	147,315 11	93,679 07	53,636 04	6½c. per sq. yd. and 15 p. c.	59.11	5c. per sq. yd	33.58		64.36	47.82
Goods of lighter description, exceeding 200 threads to the sq. in., counting warp and filling, unbleached						7c. per sq. yd		4½c. per sq. yd.
Bleached sq yd.	11,815.00	1,661 00	876 47	590 75	285 72	7½c. per sq. yd.	52.77	5c. per sq. yd	35.57		54.71	32.59
Colored, &c						7½c. per sq. yd. and 15 p. c.		7½c. per sq. yd.
Plain woven cotton goods, not otherwise specified:
Unbleached, valued over 16 cents per sq. yd		27,619 00	9,543 71			35 p. c.		25 p. c
Bleached, valued over 20 cents per sq. yd		144,707 00	49,153 71			35 p. c.		25 p. c.
Colored, valued over 25 cents per sq. yd		989,233 00	319,298 66	290,947 75	87,812 00	35 p. c.	32.55	25 p. c.	25.00		35.00	28.57
Cotton jeans, denims, and drillings, unbleached, valued over 20 cents per sq. yd		2,182 00	763 70			35 p. c.		25 p. c.
All other cotton goods						35 p. c.		25 p. c.
Cords, gimps, galloon, and cotton laces, colored		2,842,732 01	926,519 88			35 p. c.		30 p. c.
Shirts and drawers, woven or made on frames		9,917 00	3,304 27			35 p. c.		30 p. c.
Hosiery		4,998,936 95	1,631,454 86			35 p. c.		30 p. c.
Velvet		1,084,731 12	344,888 64			35 p. c.		30 p. c.
Braids, inserting, laces, trimmings, and bobbinet				4,600,232 29	387,551 61		32.53		30.00		35.00	14.28
Other manufactures of, not otherwise specified		6,397,791 53	2,081,616 25			35 p. c.		30 p. c.
						35 p. c., 40 p. c., &c.		30 p. c.

Statement of amount of duty collected during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, on commodities enumerated in House bill No. 3132, &c.—Continued.

Commodities.	Foreign merchandise entered into consumption during the fiscal year 1875.			Estimated duties on amounts entered in 1875 at proposed rate.	Decrease of duty on amounts entered in 1875.	Rate of duty in force in 1875.	Equivalent ad valorem at rates in force in 1875.	Proposed rate in bill H. R. No. 3132.	Equivalent ad valorem under proposed rates.	Increase of duty.	Equivalent ad valorem under existing law.	Percentage of decrease.
	Quantity.	Value.	Amount of duty.
Cotton, manufactures of—Continued.
On spool-thread of cotton, containing on each spool not exceeding 100 yards of thread...doz..	424,748.50	$65,919 00	$45,452 01	$25,484 91	$19,967 10	6c. per doz. and 30 p. c.	68.95	6c. per doz.....	38.66	.....	68.61	44.13
Exceeding 100 yards, for every additional 100 yards of thread on each spool or fractional part thereof.....doz..	458,667.50	72,013 00	48,036 20	27,520 05	20,516 15	6c. per doz. and 35 p. c.	66.7	6c. per doz.....	38.22	.....	74.29	48.55
Cotton thread, yarn, warps, or warp yarn not wound upon spools, whether single or advanced beyond the condition of single by twisting two or more single yarns together, whether on beams or in bundles, skeins, or cops, or in any other form:
Valued not over 40 cents per pound.....lbs..	14,964.00	5,718 00	2,503 00	1,496 40	1,006 60	10c. per lb. and 20 p. c.	43.77	10c. per lb.....	26.17	.....	45.86	42.94
Valued over 40 cents per pound, and not over 60 cents per pound ..lbs..	314,447.25	164,737 00	89,777 86	62,889 45	26,888 41	20c. per lb. and 20 p. c.	54.5	20c. per lb.....	38.18	.....	58.42	34.65
Valued over 60 cents per pound, and not over 80 cents per pound...lbs..	502,450.50	368,765 00	205,965 15	150,735 15	55,230 00	30c. per lb. and 20 p. c.	55.85	30c. per lb.....	40.88	.....	59.63	31.44
Valued over 80 cents per pound.....lbs..	1,495,768.50	1,969,421 00	928,874 92	598,307 40	330,567 52	40c. per lb. and 20 p. c.	47.17	40c. per lb.....	30.38	.....	54.46	44.22
Iron and steel, manufactures of:
Pig-iron.....tons..	61,748.12	1,811,151 34	*402,593 57	308,743 00	93,850 57	$7 per ton.....	22.23	$5 per ton.....	17 05	.....	26.84	32.72
Spiegeleisen, in pigs.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	$6 per ton.....	.....	.....	.....	.....
Bar-iron, rolled or hammered:
Flats not less than 1 in. nor more than 6 in. wide.
Flats not less than ⅜ in. nor more than 2 in. thick.....lbs..	4,437,537.00	141,101 99	*40,093 87	22,187 68	17,906 19	1c. per lb.....	28.41	¼c. per lb.....	15.72	.....	36.03	56.37
Round, not less than ¾ nor more than 2 in. in diameter.
Square, not less than ¾ nor more than 2 in. square.
Flats less than ⅜ in. nor more than 2 in. thick. or flats less than 1 in. nor more than 6 in. wide.	963,044.00	31,592 15	*13,050 85	7,222 83	5,828 02	1½c. per lb.....	44.48	¾c. per lb.....	22.86	.....	43.24	06.24
Rounds ¾ in. nor more than 2 in. in diameter.
Squares ¾ in. nor more than 2 in. square.
Moisic iron made from sand ore by one process.....tons..	100.05	6,168 00	*1,503 87	1,002 50	501 37	$15 per ton....	24.38	$10 per ton.....	16.25	.....	24.38	33.35
Iron bars for railroads or inclined planes....lbs..	20,214,739.00	430,987 74	*127,684 72	90,244 50	37,440 22	70c. per 100 lbs..	29.63	$10 per ton.....	20.94	.....	36.66	42.88
Boiler and other plate iron not less than 3-16 in. in thickness.....lbs..	127,879.00	9,190 00	1,824 32	1,598 49	225 83	1¼c. per lb.....	19.85	1¼c. per lb.....	17.39	.....	19.78	12.08
Boiler and other plate iron not otherwise specified.....tons..	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	$25 per ton.....	.....	$20 per ton.....	.....	.....	.....	25.00
Iron wire, bright, coppered, or trimmed, drawn and finished, not more than ¼ in. in diameter nor less than No. 16 wire-gauge.....lbs..	1,840,190.00	*96,590 00	47,060 37	32,203 32	14,857 05	2c. per lb. and 15 p. c.	48.72	1¾c. per lb.....	33.34	.....	52.42	12.13
Over No. 16 and not over No. 25.....lbs..	211,961.00	*17,653 00	9,630 31	6,358 83	3,271 48	3½c. per lb. and 15 p. c.	54.55	3c. per lb.....	36.02	.....	56.95	36.75
Over or finer than No. 25.....lbs..	2,865.50	409 00	172 29	114 62	57 67	4c. per lb. and 15 p. c.	42.12	4c. per lb.....	28.02	.....	48.10	41.75
Iron wire, bright, &c., covered with cotton, silk, or other materials, not more than ¼ in. in diameter, nor less than No. 16 wire-gauge.lbs..	82 00	*35 00	9 89	5 54	4 35	7c. per lb. and 15 p. c.	25.4	6¾c. per lb.....	15.84	.....	28.2	43.83
Over No. 16 and not over No. 25.....lbs..	706.60	*421 00	112 51	56 48	56 03	8½c. per lb. and 15 p. c.	26.72	8c. per lb.....	13.41	.....	28.53	53.00
Over or finer than No. 25.....lbs..	748.25	*573 00	143 53	67 43	76 10	9c. per lb. and 15 p. c.	25.04	9c. per lb.....	11.76	.....	27.24	56.83
Round iron in coils, 3-16 in. or less in diameter, whether coated with metal or not, and all descriptions of iron wire not over No. 16 wire-gauge .....lbs..	1,367,689.00	*86,016 00	36,526 56	23,934 55	12,592 01	2c. per lb. and 15 p. c.	42.47	1¾c. per lb.....	27.82	.....	49.36	43.64
Over No. 16 and not over No. 25 wire-gauge..lbs..	266,730.00	*26,011 00	12,148 64	8,001 90	4,146 74	3½c. per lb. and 15 p. c.	46.70	3c. per lb.....	30.76	.....	56.95	45.99
Over or finer than No. 25.....lbs..	1,663.00	*644 00	419 25	66 32	82 93	4c. per lb. and 15 p. c	23.17	4c. per lb.....	10.29	.....	48.10	78.61

*Less 10 per cent. during eight months and three days.

Statement of amount of duty collected during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, on commodities enumerated in House bill No. 3132, &c.—Continued.

Commodities.	Foreign merchandise entered into consumption during the fiscal year 1875.			Estimated duties on amounts entered in 1875 at proposed rate.	Decrease of duty on amounts entered in 1875.	Rate of duty in force in 1875.	Equivalent ad valorem at rates in force in 1875.	Proposed rate in bill H. R. No. 3132.	Equivalent ad valorem under proposed rates.	Increase of duty.	Equivalent ad valorem under existing law.	Percentage of decrease.
	Quantity.	Value.	Amount of duty.
Iron and steel, manufactures of—Continued.
Wire, spiral furniture-springs of iron wire	7,681.00	*$789 00	$244 78	$134 41	$110 37	2c. per lb. and 15 p. c.	31.02	1¾c. per lb	17.03		34.47	50.59
Sheet-iron, smooth or polished ..... lbs.	4,665,827.00	*446,008 00	124,983 88	93,316 54	31,667 34	3c. per lb	28.02	2c. per lb	20.82		32.58	36.10
Sheet-iron, common and block, not thinner than 20 in. wire-gauge. lbs.	1,803,518.00	*74,183 00	20,594 15	18,035 18	2,558 97	1½c. per lb	27.76	1c. per lb	24.31		28.93	12.51
Thinner than No. 25 wire-gauge ..... lbs.	126,694.00	5,446 04	1,995 62	1,583 69	411 93	1¾c. per lb	36.64	1c. per lb	29.07		35.00	16.94
Thinner than No. 20 wire-gauge and not thinner than No. 25 ..... lbs.	765,190.00	*35,801 75	10,432 63	7,651 90	2,780 73	1½c. per lb	29.13	1c. per lb	21.37		26.33	18.84
Band, hoop, and scroll iron, ⅛ to 6 in. in width, not thinner than ⅛ in. lbs.	6,561,339.00	*247,229 51	74,362 60	49,210 04	25,152 56	1½c. per lb	30.07	¾c. per lb	19.90		35.64	44.16
One-half to 6 in. in width, under ⅛ in. thick, not thinner than No. 20 wire-gauge ..... lbs.	1,745,110.00	*56,815 21	23,590 32	17,451 10	6,139 22	1½c. per lb	41.52	1c. per lb	30.71		60.67	49.38
Thinner than No. 20 wire-gauge ..... lbs.	284,087.00	*11,801 00	4,484 84	3,551 09	933 75	1¾c. per lb	38.00	1¼c. per lb	30.09		40.87	26.38
Slit rods ..... lbs.	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	1½c. per lb	.....	1¾c. per lb	.....	.....	.....	.....
Iron, rolled and hammered, not otherwise specified ..... lbs.	7,362,305.00	*250,282 00	84,667 45	55,217 28	29,450 17	1½c. per lb	33.74	¾c. per lb	22.06		41.32	46.61
Handsaws not over 24 in. in length ..... doz.	113.75	*781 00	296 05	227 50	68 55	75c. and 30 p. c	37.91	$2 per doz	29.12		42.13	30.88
Handsaws over 24 in. in length ..... doz.	167.92	*1,695 00	618 43	419 80	198 63	$1 and 30 p. c.	36.48	$2.50 per doz	25.35		38.60	34.33
Backsaws not over 10 in. in length ..... doz.	15.00	*109 00	41 97	30 00	11 97	75c. and 30 p. c	38.50	$2 per doz	27.52		40.40	31.63
Backsaws over 10 in. in length ..... doz.	35.67	*343 00	124 71	89 17	35 54	$1 and 30 p. c.	36.35	$2.50 per doz	25.99		40.80	36.21
Files, file-blanks, rasps, and floats, not over 10 in. in length ..... doz.	325,529.25	*225,440 63	92,685 78	65,105 85	27,579 93	10c. and 30 p. c	41.11	20c. per lb	28.87		43.45	33.56
Over 10 in. in length doz.	589,957.00	150,789 83	74,692 68	53,096 13	21,596 55	6c. and 30 p. c.	49.53	9c. per lb	35.21		54.24	35.08
Needles for knitting or sewing machines ..... n. l.	1,737.40	17,524 60	*7,211 01	3,474 80	3,736 21	$1 per 1,000 and 35 p. c.	41.14	$2 per 1,000	19.82		46.04	56.95
Iron squares, marked on one side ..... lbs.	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	3c. per lb. and 30 p. c.	.....	3c. per lb,	.....	.....	.....	.....
All other of iron and steel ..... lbs.	392.00	52 00	41 65	11 76	29 89	6c. per lb. and 30 p. c.	80.09	3c. per lb	22.61		79.53	71.57
All manufactures of steel not otherwise specified.	.....	*1,013,985 04	424,592 56	304,195 71	120,396 85	45 p. c.	41.87	30 p. c	30.00		45.00	33.33
Steel railroad bars ... tons.	43,683.00	*3,183,156 00	1,116,258 17	655,245 00	461,013 17	1½c. per lb	35.06	$15 per ton (2,240 pounds.)	20.58		39.68	48.14
Chains, trace, halter, and fence, made of wire or rods, not less than ⅛ in. in diameter ..... lbs.	4,794,718.00	*269,321,61	109,087 81	95,894 36	13,193 45	2½c. per lb	40.50	2 c. per lb	35.60		44.70	20.36
Less than ⅛ and not under No. 9 wire-gauge. lbs.	774,187.00	*59,187,09	21,218 34	19,354 67	1,863 67	3c. per lb	35 84	2½c. per lb	32.70		36.13	94.93
Under No. 9 wire-gauge ..... lbs.	57,178.00	*7,745 10	2,454 64	2,323 50	131 14	35 p. c	31.69	30 p. c	30.00		35.00	14.29
Anchors and parts of. lbs.	95,468.00	*4,897 50	1,952 24	1,432 02	570 22	2½c. per lb	39.85	1½c. per lb	29.23		58.64	50.15
Blacksmiths' hammers and sledges ..... lbs.	74,387.50	*6,891 00	1,681 61	1,487 75	193 86	2½c. per lb	24,40	2c. per lb	20.86		24.40	14.51
Wrought-iron railroad chairs, axles, and washers ..... lbs.	365,812.00	*16,235 90	6,765 14	3,658 12	3,107 02	2c. per lb	41.68	1c. per lb	22.53		45.06	50.00
Bed-screws and hinges, wrought board-nails, spikes, rivets, and bolts ..... lbs.	287,100.00	*14,626 06	6,547 63	4,306 50	2,241 13	2½c. per lb	44.76	1½c. per lb	29.44		32.83	10.33
Wrought steam, gas, and water tubes and flues ..... lbs.	400,181.00	*39,064 20	13,054 98	10,004 52	3,050 46	3½c. per lb	33.46	2½c. per lb	25.61		70.06	63.45
Wood-screws 2 in. and over in length ..... lbs.	116,909.00	*17,061 00	8,632 02	5,849 95	2,802 09	8c. per lb	50.71	4c. per lb	34,28		59.69	42.57
Wood-screws less than 2 in ..... lbs.	919,203.00	*182,677 00	93,604 85	64,344 21	29,260 64	11c. per lb	51.24	6c per lb	35.22		52.23	32.57
Cast-iron steam, gas, and water-pipes ..... lbs.	371,847.00	*10,341 33	5,025 22	2,788 85	2,236 34	1½c. per lb	48.59	¾c. per lb	26.96		18.00	†33.23
Hollow-ware, glazed or tinned ..... lbs.	33,529.33	*2,583 00	1,056 20	838 23	217 97	3½c. per lb	40.89	2½c. per lb	32.45		48.43	33.00
Cast scrap-iron ..... cwt.	34,455.60	*29,303 65	9,467 57	6,891 12	2,576 45	$6 per ton	32.30	$4 per ton	23.51		44.20	46.92
Wrought scrap-iron .. cwt.	701,728.14	*958,421 64	255,895 42	210,518 40	45,357 02	$8 per ton	26.69	$6 per ton	21.96		37.84	41.97
Ingots, bars, coils, sheets, and steel wire not less than ⅛ in. diameter, valued 7 cents or less per pound ..... lbs.	14,231,987.00	*718,120 00	298,654 68	213,479 80	85,174 88	2½c. per lb	41.58	1½c. per lb	29.72		45.44	34.57
Valued over 7 cents and not over 11 cents per pound ..... lbs.	7,636,041.00	*719,300 00	212,260 12	190,901 02	21,359 10	3c. per lb	29.50	2½c. per lb	26.53		31.64	13.00
Valued over 11 cents per pound ..... lbs.	5,908,579.00	*720,346 50	257,224 04	206,800 28	50,423 76	3c per lb. and 10 p. c.	35.70	3½c. per lb	28.70		38.59	25.63
Steel wire, less than ¼ in. in diameter and not less than No. 16 wire-gauge ..... lbs.	181,164.50	*35,206 00	10,765 47	7,246 58	3,518 89	2½c. per lb. and 20 p. c.	30.59	4c. per lb	20.58		32.02	35.72
Less than No. 16 wire-gauge ..... lbs.	140,059.00	*$51,741 00	$13,505 14	$9,804 13	$3,701 00	3c. per lb. and 20 p. c.	26.10	7c. per lb	18.94		26.55	28.66
Wire for crinolines, corsets, and hats ..... lbs.	1,020.50	*378 00	122 03	61 23	60 81	9c. per lb. and 10 p. c.	32.28	6c. per lb	16.19		39.49	59.00
Lead:
Sheets and pipes ..... lbs.	22,163.00	*2,321 95	587 48	443 26	144 22	2⅔c. per lb	25.30	2c. per lb	19.08		26.08	26.84

*Less 10 per cent. during eight months and three days.

Statement of amount of duty collected during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, on commodities enumerated in House bill No. 3132, &c.—Continued.

Commodities.	Foreign merchandise entered into consumption during the fiscal year 1875.			Estimated duties on amounts entered in 1875 at proposed rate.	Decrease of duty on amounts entered in 1875.	Rate of duty in force in 1875.	Equivalent ad valorem at rates in force in 1875.	Proposed rate in bill H. R. 3132.	Equivalent ad valorem under proposed rates.	Increase of duty.	Equivalent ad valorem under existing law.	Percentage of decrease.
	Quantity.	Value.	Amount of duty.
Lead—Continued.
Shot.....lbs..	58.00	*4 00	1 59	1 01	58	2½c. per lb	39.75	1¾c. per lb.....	25.25	.....	39.75	36.47
Pigs and bars.....lbs..	32,770,712.50	*1,559,017 00	601,257 48	327,707 12	273,650 36	2c. per lb.....	38.59	1c. per lb	21.02	.....	41.98	49.72
Old, fit only to be manufactured.....lbs..	382,150.00	*13,964 00	5,322 41	3,821 50	1,500 91	1½c. per lb.....	38.11	1c. per lb	25.40	.....	44.05	42.34
Copper:
Plates, bars, ingots, and pigs ..... lbs..	58,475.00	*10,741 00	2,631 38	1,169 50	1,461 88	5c. per lb.....	24.49	2c. per lb	10.88	.....	24.50	55.59
Braziers', copper sheets, rods, pipes, and copper buttons and all manufactures of, n. o. s.....	.....	*617 00	251 02	185 10	65 92	45c. p. c.....	40.68	30 p. c.....	30 00	.....	45.00	33.33
Manufactures of.....	.....	*35,572 05	14,824 48	10,671 62	4,152 86	45c. p. c.....	41.67	30 p. c.....	30.00	.....	45.00	33.33
Old copper, fit only for manufacture.....lbs..	396,320.00	58,563,96	14,627 15	9,926 40	6,700 75	4c. per lb.....	24.97	2c. per lb	10.64	.....	26.16	59.32
Tin, in bars, blocks, or pigs	11,525,248.00	2,329,487 96	Free	345,757 44	.....	Free of duty.	0.0	3c. per lb	14.84	$345,757 44	0.0	‡100
Tobacco:
Paper cigars and cigarettes.	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	$2.50 per lb. and 25 per c.	.....	$2 per lb	.....	.....	.....	.....
Cigars, cigarettes, &c..lbs..	7,539,598.00	2,805,450 84	2,565,074 69	2,609,196 80	.....	$2.50 per lb. and 25 per c.	91.43	$3.50 per lb.....	93.00	44,122 11	91.43	†2.66
Leaf, unmanufactured and not stemmed.....lbs..	.....	4,201,634 17	2,638,859 31	3,015,839 20	.....	35c. per lb.....	62.80	40c. per lb.....	71.77	376,979 88	62.80†	12.49
Wool:
First class, value 32 cents or less per pound..lbs..	11,455,304.00	2,932,819 04	1,341,277 28	687,318 24	653,959 04	10c. per lb. and 11 p. c.*	45.73	6c. per lb	23.43	.....	50.08	53.21
Value over 32 cents per pound .....lbs..	1,647,829.00	652,293 07	237,726 93	164,782 90	72,944 03	12c. per lb. and 10 p. c.*	36.44	10c. per lb.....	25.26	.....	39.01	35.24
Second class, value 32 cents or less per pound..lbs..	5,480,528.00	1,239,122 00	618,254 09	274,026 40	344,227 69	10c. per lb. and 11 p. c.*	49.89	5c. per lb	22.11	.....	42.00	47.36
Value over 32 cents per pound .....lbs..	2,388,629.00	914,139 00	333,764 90	238,862 90	94,902 00	12c. per lb. and 10 p. c.*	36.51	10c. per lb.....	26.23	.....	38.68	32.19
Third class, value 12 cents or less per pound..lbs..	21,813,748.00	2,699,011 70	602,790 66	654,412 44	.....	3c. per lb.....	22.33	3c. per lb	24.28	51,621 78	24.28	0
Value over 12 cents per pound .....lbs..	8,985,710.00	1,773,814 00	493,930 30	269,571 30	224,359 00	6c. per lb.....	27.85	3c. per lb	14.63	.....	27.63	47.00
First class, washed:
Value 32 cents or less per pound ....lbs..	14,231.00	7,163 00	3,999 72	1,695 62	2,304 10	20c. per lb. and 22 p. c.*	55.83	12c. per lb.....	23.67	.....	63.16	62.52
Value over 32 cents per pound .....lbs..	315.00	259 00	114 66	94 50	20 16	24c. per lb. and 20 p. c. less 10 p. c.*	44.27	30c. per lb.....	36.49	.....	49.19	25.82
First class, scoured:
Value 32 cents or less per pound .....lbs..	No transactions.		.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	18c. per lb	.....	.....	.....	.....
Value over 32 cents per pound .....lbs..	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	30c. per lb.....	.....	.....	.....	.....
Second class, scoured:
Value 32 cents or less per pound ....lbs..	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	15c. per lb..	.....	.....	.....	.....
Value over 32 cents per pound .....lbs..	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	30c. per lb.....	.....	.....	.....	.....
Third class, scoured:
Value 32 cents or less per pound .....lbs..	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	9c. per lb.....	.....	.....	.....	.....
Value over 32 cents per pound .....lbs..	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	9c. per lb.....	.....	.....	.....	.....
Woolen rags, shoddy, mungo, waste, & flocks, lbs..	1,459,222.00	158,526 00	158,523 00	87,553 32	70,969 68	12c. per lb.....	100.00	6c. per lb.....	52.23	.....	80.35	31.26
Cloth, shawls, and other manufactures of . lbs..	9,731,146.41	15,297,499 74	9,297,499 74	6,811,802 49	2,485,697 25	50c. per lb., 30, 35, and 40*	60.77	70c. per lb.....	44.53	.....	65.26	31.75
Flannels, blankets, hats, knit goods, &c.:
Value not over 40 cents per pound.....lbs..	756.25	330 30	236 96	151 25	85 71	20c. per lb. and 35 p. c.*	71.81	20c. per lb.....	46.00	.....	79.89	42.42
Value over 40 c. and not over 60 c. p. lb....lbs..	44,416.00	24,869 06	20,608 61	13,324 80	7,283 81	30c. per lb. and 35 p. c.*	82.87	30c. per lb.....	53.57	.....	88.00	39.13
Value over 60 c. and not over 80 c. p. lb....lbs..	62,024.75	54,382 06	45,160 39	24,809 90	20,350 49	40c. per lb. and 35 p. c.*	83.04	40c. per lb.....	45.62	.....	86.35	47.17
Value over 80 cents per pound .....lbs ..	1,663,622.67	2,487,810 55	1,560,286 96	831,811 33	728,475 63	50c. per lb. and 35 p. c.*	54.79	50c. per lb.....	29.29	.....	69.71	58.00
Endless belts or felts for paper or printing machines .....lbs..	126,410.00	$126,394 00	$63,883 50	$37,923 00	$25,960 50	20c. per lb. and 35 p. c.*	50.54	30c. per lb.	30.00	.....	54.70	45.15
Bunting .....sq. yds..	6,698.50	1,862 00	1,866 71	1,004 78	861 93	20c. per lb. and 35 p. c.*	100.25	15c. per sq. yd.	53.96	.....	91.39	40.95
Women's and children's dress goods, and real or imitation Italian cloth, not over 20 cents per sq. yd.....sq. yds..	24,209,815.00	4,323,997 46	2,738,777 43	2,178,883 35	559,894 08	6c. per sq. yd. and 35 p. c.*	63.34	9c. per sq. yd...	27.06	.....	68.99	60.77
Valued over 20 cents per sq. yd..... sq. yds..	49,326,185.43	15,830,343 12	9,414,298 01	7,398,927 81	2,015,370 70	8c. per sq. yd. and 35 p. c.*	59.47	15c. per sq. yd..	46.75	.....	63.01	25.81
All goods weighing 4 oz. and over, sq. yd. lbs...	1,234,825.17	2,175,677 14	1,263,044 07	987,860 13	275,183 94	50c. per lb. and 35 p. c.*	58.05	80c. per lb.....	45.40	.....	61.68	26.39
Clothing, ready made, and wholly or in part of wool.....	109,548.18	808,998 67	392,335 24	219,096 36	173,238 88	50c. per lb. and 40 p. c.*	48.05	$2 per lb.....	27.08	.....	49.09	44.84
Webbings, weltings, braids, gimps, &c . lbs..	540,445.58	1,687,612 97	1,044,054 16	843,806 48	200,247 68	50c. per lb. and 50 p. c.	61.87	50 p. c.....	50.00	.....	68.26	26.72
Saxony, Wilton, and Tournay velvet carpets wrought by Jacquard machinery....sq. yds..	65,372.50	147,734 00	86,255 02	58,835 25	27,419 77	70c. per sq. yd. and 35 p. c.*	61.29	90c. per sq. yd..	41.81	.....	69.12	39.51
Brussels.....sq. yds..	410,761.00	596,015 51	354,616 35	266,994 65	87,621 70	44c. per sq. yd. and 35 p. c.*	59.05	65c. per sq. yd..	44.80	.....	65.13	31.21
Patent velvet and tapestry velvet .....sq. yds..	223,345.00	359,072 00	195,715 33	145,174 25	50,541 08	40c. per sq. yd. and 35 p. c.*	54.51	65c. per sq. yd..	40.43	.....	66.61	39.29

*Less 10 per cent. during eight months and three days. †Increase. ‡Per cent. increase.

Statement of amount of duty collected during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, on commodities enumerated in House bill No. 3132, &c.—Continued.

Commodities.	Foreign merchandise entered into consumption during the fiscal year 1875.			Estimated duties on amounts entered in 1875 at proposed rate.	Decrease of duty on amounts entered in 1875.	Rate of duty in force in 1875.	Equivalent ad valorem at rates in force in 1875.	Proposed rate in bill H. R. No. 3132.	Equivalent ad valorem under proposed rates.	Increase of duty.	Equivalent ad valorem under existing law.	Percentage of decrease.
	Quantity.	Value.	Amount of duty.
Wool—Continued.
Tap'y Brussels....sq. yds.	1,454,710.50	1,282,773 12	775,739 30	581,884 20	193,855 10	28c. per sq. yd. and 35 p. c.*	60.47	40c. per sq. yd..	45.36	.....	55.60	22.77
Treble ingrain, three-ply, and worsted chain....	109.00	137 74	69 25	59 15	10 10	17c. per sq. yd. and 35 p. c.*	50.28	35c. per sq. yd..	42.94	.....	.....	.....
Yarn, venetian, and two-ply ingrain....sq. yds.	5,016.50	3,705 81	1,713 27	1,504 95	208 32	12c. per sq. yd. and 35 p. c.*	46.24	30c. per sq. yd..	40.61	.....	51.00	20.37
Druggets and bockings, printed and colored.....sq. yds.	19,035.00	9,787 00	7,405 09	3,807 00	3,598 09	25c. per sq. yd. and 35 p. c.	75.56	20c. per sq. yd..	38.90	.....	96.34	59.62
Fruits:
Candied citron, orange, and lemon peels.....lbs.								8c. per lb....
Oranges in cases not over 40 x 18 x 15 inches.....								55c. per case
Oranges in cases not over 30 x 16 x 13 inches.....	.....	4,233,325 24	846,664 99	846,664 99	.....	20 p. p.....	20.00	18c. per box.	20 00	.....	20.00	20.00
Lemons in cases not over 30 x 16 x 13 inches.....								35c. per box.
On all oranges and lemons not otherwise specified								20 p. c.....
Gloves of kid.....doz	.....	3,555,003 32	1,777,501 66	1,185,001 11	582,500 55	50 p. c.....	50.00	$4 per doz...	.....	.....	.....	.....
Gloves of lambskin or leather.....doz..								$2 per doz...
Gunpowder and all explosive substances.....lbs	25,452.50	13,788 50	5,312 95	1,527 15	3,785 80	6, 10, 20, and 30 p. c.	38.53	6c. per lb.....	11.08	.....	50.00	†33.33
Hair-pins made of wire.....	.....	70,327 00	32,516 40	24,614 45	7,901 95	50 p. c.....	50.00	35 p. c.....	35.00	.....	50.00	30.00
Marble:
White, statuary, brocatella, &c.....ft.	718.25	1,623 00	1,124 00	430 95	693 05	$1 per cu. ft. and 25 p. c.	69.25	60c. per cu. ft..	26.55	.....	69.25	61.66
Veined and other, in blocks or squares.....ft.	497,621.34	527,628 00	354,336 26	149,286 40	205,049 86	50c. per cu. ft. and 25 p. c.	67.16	30c. per cu. ft..	28.66	.....	67.16	57.92
Sawed, dressed, &c., sq. ft.	5,760.00	1,979 50	2,173 05	576 00	1,597 05	25 to 45c. per sq. ft. and 30 p. c.	109.78	10c. per sq. ft..	29.10	.....	109.78	73.05
Manufactures of, not otherwise provided for.....	.....	72,389 00	36,194 50	21,716 70	14,477 80	50 p. c.....	50.00	30 p. c.....	30.00	.....	50.00	40.00
Stones, freestone, granite, sandstone, and all building or ornamental stone, except marble.....tons	15,707.61	452,387 85	99,528 89	66,352 60	33,176 29	10 and 20 p. c., and $1.50 per ton.	.....	$1 per ton.....	.....	.....	.....	†33.33
Grindstones, rough or unfinished.....tons	7,656.17	90,172 25	11,484 24	7,656 17	3,828 07	$1.50 per ton...	12.73	$1 per ton.....	8.49	.....	12.73	33.30
Pencils of wood filled with lead or other materials.....gross..	59,869.58	104,850 02	61,389 83	41,908 71	19,481 12	50c. per gross and 30 p. c.	58.55	70c. per gross..	40.00	.....	58.55	31.67
Pens, metallic, other than gold.....gross.	281,067.38	101,142 43	49,576 06	33,728 08	15,847 98	10c. per gross and 25 p. c.	48.00	12c. per gross..	33.35	.....	53.00	37,08
Gold pens.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	40 p. c.....	40.00	35 p. c.....	35.00	.....	40.00	12.05
Soap, fancy, perfumed, honey, transparent, and all descriptions of toilet and shaving soaps.....lbs..	248,181.50	$79,154 39	$44,606 76	$29,781 78	$14,824 98	10c. per lb. and 25 p. c.	56.35	12c. per lb.....	37.62	.....	56.35	33.24
Soaps, not otherwise provided for.....lbs..	3,869,181.00	217,878 64	103,239 04	77,383 62	25,855 42	1c. per lb. and 30 and 35 p. c.	47.34	2c. per lb.....	35.51	.....	47.34	25.00
Varnish:
Valued at $1.50 or less per gallon.....galls..	3,264.50	3,179 00	2,268 05	1,632 25	635 80	50c. per gal. and 20 p. c.	71.34	50c. per gal	51.31	.....	71.34	27.99
Valued above $1.50 per gallon.....galls..	26,412.12	83,263 00	34,021 82	26,412 12	7,609 70	50c. per gal. and 25 p. c.	40.86	$1 per gal.....	31.72	.....	40.86	22.37
Putty.....lbs..	45.00	2 25	68	45	23	1½c. per lb.....	30.22	1c. per lb	20.14	.....	30.22	33.35
Lead:
Nitrate of.....lbs..	374,610.00	25,659 00	11,238 30	7,492 20	3,746 10	3c. per lb	43.79	2c. per lb	29.20	.....	43.79	33 33
White, dry or ground in oil.....lbs..	4,354,131.50	295,642 09	130,623 95	87,082 63	43,541 32	3c. per lb.....	44.18	2c. per lb	29.45	.....	44.18	33.33
Red, dry or ground in oil.....lbs..	1,048,713.00	73,131 63	31,461 39	20,974 26	10,487 13	3c. per lb.....	43.01	2c. per lb	28.67	.....	43.01	33.33
Litharge, dry or ground in oil.....lbs..	15,767.00	950 00	473 01	315 34	157 67	3c. per lb.....	49.75	2c. per lb	33.17	.....	49.75	33.33
Oil, linseed or flaxseed, 7½ lbs. to the gallon.....galls..	38,535.30	21,070 14	11,560 59	9,631 32	1,929 27	30c. per gal.....	54.87	25c. per gal....	45.71	.....	54.87	16.67
Castor-beans or seeds, 50 lbs. to the bushel.....bush..	30,191.00	35,899 00	18,114 60	12,076 40	6,038 20	60c. per bush...	50.46	40c. per bush...	33.64	.....	50.46	33.33
Castor-oil.....galls..	758.19	941 11	758 19	530 73	227 46	$1 per gal.....	80.56	70c. per gal	56.04	.....	80.56	30.00
Opium, prepared for smoking.....lbs..	62.774.66	662,066 00	376,647 93	564,971 94	.....	$6 per lb.....	56.89	$9 per lb	85.33	$188,324 01	56.89	†50
Champagne, and all other sparkling wines, in bottles:
Containing each not more than 1 quart and more than 1 pint.....doz..	127,048.15	1,450,380 01	762,288 85	1,143,433 33	.....	$6 per doz.....	52.55	$9 per doz.....	78.83	381,144 48	52.55	†50
Containing each not more than 1 pint and more than ½ pint.....doz..	128,411.97	773,224 24	385,235 90	577,853 85	.....	$3 per doz.....	49.82	$4.50 per doz...	74.73	192,617 95	49.82	†50
Containing ½ pint each or less.....doz..	8,125.50	23,367 00	12,188 25	18,282 38	.....	$1.50 per doz ...	52.16	$2.25 per doz...	78.24	6,094 13	52.16	†50
Collodion.....lbs..	52.00	52 00	52 00	26 00	26 00	$1 per lb.....	100.00	50c. per lb.....	50.00	.....	100.00	50.00
Ethers of all kinds.....lbs..	374.50	650 00	374 50	187 25	187 25	$1 per lb.....	57.62	50c. per lb.....	28.81	.....	57.62	50.00
Licorice, paste or in rolls lbs..	1,336,356.00	172,777 00	121,549 14	66,817 80	54,731 34	10c. per lb.....	70.34	5c. per lb	38.67	.....	70.34	50.00
Emery grains.....lbs.	487,725.00	23,345 00	9,754 50	4,877 25	4,877 25	2c. per lb	41.78	1c. per lb	20.89	.....	41.78	50.00
Emery ore.....tons..	9,619.8[illegible]	31,972 00	5,771 94	2,885 97	2,885 97	$6 per ton.....	18.05	$3 per ton.....	9.03	.....	18.05	50.00
Emery, manufactured, ground, or pulverized.....lbs..	85,853.00	2,990 00	858 53	429 27	429 26	1c. per lb.....	28.71	½c. per lb	14.36	.....	28.71	50.00
Aniline dyes or colors.. lbs..	189,996.25	597,874 00	304,254 02	149,468 50	154,785 52	50c. per lb. and 35 p. c.	50.89	25 p. c	25.00	.....	50.89	50.87

*Less 10 per cent. during eight months and three days. †Estimated one-third loss of revenue.

Statement of amount of duty collected during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, on commodities enumerated in House bill No. 3132, &c.—Continued.

Commodities.	Foreign merchandise entered into consumption during the fiscal year 1875.			Estimated duties on amounts entered in 1875 at proposed rate.	Decrease of duty on amounts entered in 1875.	Rate of duty in force in 1875.	Equivalent ad valorem at rates in force in 1875.	Proposed rate in bill H. R. No. 3132.	Equivalent ad valorem under proposed rates	Increase of duty.	Equivalent ad valorem under existing law.	Percentage of decrease.
	Quantity.	Value.	Amount of duty.
French green, Paris green, mineral blue, and Prussian blue ..... lbs..	77,549.00	18,583 00	5,574 90	2,787 45	2,787 45	30 p. c.....	30.00	15 p. c	15.00	.....	30.00	50.00
Indian red..... lbs..	646,009.00	9,714 03	2,428 51	1,214 26	1,214 25	25 p. c.....	25.00	12½ p. c.....	12.50	.....	25.00	50.00
Logwood and other dye-wood extracts, &c.....	.....	127,496 00	12,749 60	6,374 80	6,374 80	10 p. c.....	10.00	5 p. c	5.00	.....	10.00	50.00
Ochers, not otherwise provided for, dry..... lbs..	3,282,415.00	37,929 00	16,412 09	8,206 05	8,206 04	50c. per 100 lbs	43.27	25c. per 100 lbs.	21.64	.....	43.27	50.00
Ground in oil ..... lbs..	280,517.00	12,352 00	4,207 77	2,103 89	2,103 88	$1.50 per 100 lbs	34.07	75c. per 100 lbs.	17.04	.....	34.07	50.00
Spanish brown..... lbs..	See Indian red	.....	.....	.....	.....	25 p. c.....	25.00	12½ p. c	12.50	.....	25.00	50.00
Umber..... lbs..	513,811.00	5,596 00	2,569 06	1,284 53	1,284 53	50c. per 100 lbs	45.91	25c. per 100 lbs	22.96	.....	45.91	50.00
Vandyke brown..... lbs..	38,468.00	3,305 00	661 00	330 50	330 50	20 p. c.....	20.00	10 p. c	10.00	.....	20.00	50.00
Wood lake, Venetian red, vermilion, chrome-yellow, Dutch pink, and paints and painters' colors, &c., dry or ground in oil, and moist water-colors, &c.....	.....	341,254 60	90,503 15	42,706 83	47,796 32	25 p.c. and 35 p.c	26.53	12½ p. c	12.50	.....	26.52	53.24
Potash:
Chromate and bichromate of..... lbs..	1,417,812.00	183,424 00	44,170 16	28,356 24	15,813 92	3 and 4 c. per lb	24.08	2c. per lb	15.46	.....	24.08	35.08
Chlorate of..... lbs..	755,791.00	161,189 00	22,673 73	11,336 87	11,336 86	3c. per lb.....	14.07	1½c. per lb.....	7.04	.....	14.07	50.00
Hydriodate, iodate, &c. lbs..	482.50	1,499 00	361 88	180 94	180 94	75c. per lb.....	24.14	37½c. per lb ...	12.07	.....	24.14	50.00
Acetate* ..... lbs..	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	25c. per lb.....	.....	12½c. per lb	.....	.....	.....	50.00
Prussiate, yellow ..... lbs..	133,023.00	32,290 00	6,651 15	6,651 15	.....	5c. per lb	20.60	5c. per lb	20.60	.....	20.60	.....
red ..... lbs..	9,454.00	6,791 00	945 40	472 70	472 70	10c. per lb.....	13.92	5c. per lb	6.96	.....	13.92	50.00
Quinine, salts of ..... oz..	1,427.75	2,226 00	1,601 70	333 90	667 80	45 p. c.....	45.00	15 p. c	15.00	.....	45.00	66.66
Saleratus and bicarbonate of soda ..... lbs..	6,853,588.00	231,754 86	102,803 81	51,401 91	51,401 90	1½c. per lb.....	44.36	¾c. per lb	22.18	.....	44.36	50.00
Sal soda ..... lbs..	27,666,534.00	379,857 00	69,166 32	34,583 16	34,583 16	½c. per lb	18.21	⅜c. per lb	9.11	.....	18.21	50.00
Soda-ash..... lbs..	170,892,671.00	3,552,600 71	427,231 67	213,615 83	213,615 84	4c. per lb	12.09	2c. per lb	6.05	.....	12.09	50.00
Caustic ..... lbs..	37,669,885.00	1,419,292 00	565,048 39	282,524 19	282,524 20	1½c. per lb.....	39.53	¾c. per lb	19.77	.....	39.53	50.00
Hyposulphate of, and all carbonates of	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	20 p. c.....	20.00	10 p. c	10.00	.....	20.00	50.00
Vitriol, white, or sulphate of zinc..... lbs..	19,696.00	471 00	94 20	47 10	47 10	20 p. c.....	20.00	10 p. c	10.00	.....	20.00	50.00
Blue ..... lbs..	77,215.00	6,657 00	3,088 60	1,544 30	1,544 30	4c. per lb.....	46.38	2c. per lb	23.19	.....	46.38	50.00

* Acetate potash, in dutiable and free. † Per cent. increase.

FREE OF DUTY.

Quantity, value, rate, and amount of duties received for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1875.

Articles.	Quantity.	Value.	Present rate of duty.	Amount of duty received in 1875.
Acetates of—
Ammonia ..... lbs..	4	$11 00	25 cts. p. lb	$1 00
Baryta.....	.....	.....	25 cts. p. lb	.....
Copper..... lbs..	404	140 00	10 cts. p. lb	40 40
Iron	.....	.....	25 cts. p. lb	.....
Lead, brown ..... lbs..	3,558.50	718 00	5 cts. p. lb	177 92
Lead, white..... lbs..	58	15 00	10 cts. p. lb	5 80
Lime ..... lbs..	2,232,401	73,926 00	25 cts. pr. c	18,481 50
Magnesia ..... lbs..	346	1,535 10	50 cts. p. lb	173 00
Potassa	.....	.....	25 cts. p. lb	.....
Soda ..... lbs..	65	24 00	25 cts. p. lb.	16 25
Strontia.....	.....	.....	25 cts. p. lb	.....
Zinc	.....	.....	25 cts. p. lb	.....
Acids:
Acetic, acetous, and pyroligneous—
Specific gravity 1.047, or less ..... lbs..	754	138 00	5 cts. p. lb.	37 70
Specific gravity of over 1.047 ..... lbs..	0.50	4 00	30 cts. p. lb	15
Benzoic..... lbs..	2,671.25	5,671 00	10 p. c.....	567 10
Carbolic liquid..... lbs..	58,071.50	27,046 00	10 p. c.....	2,704 60
Chromic ..... lbs..	45	22 00	15 p. c.....	3 30
Citric..... lbs..	30,890	30,438 00	10 cts. p. lb.	3,089 00
Gallic..... lbs..	11	39 00	$1 p. lb....	11 00
Nitric.....	.....	.....	10 p. c.....	.....
Sulphuric, fuming, (Nordhausen)	.....	.....	1 c. p. lb ..	.....
Tannic..... lbs..	117	89 00	$1 p. lb...	117 00
Tartaric ..... lbs..	403	156 00	15 cts. p. lb	60 45
All other, used for medicinal purposes or the fine arts.....	.....	6,307 00	10 & 20 p. c	1,238 40
Alum, patent alum, &c ..... lbs..	6,951,396	112,516 00	60 cts. p. 100 lbs.	41,708 37
Ammonia:
Sulphate of ..... lbs..	24,695	1,422 00	20 p. ct....	288 40
Carbonate of..... lbs..	680,345	93,812 00	20 p. c.....	18,762 40
Sal ammonia or muriate of ..lbs..	658,724	58,324 00	10 p. c.....	5,832 40
Antimony, crude, and regulus of..... lbs..	1,238,823	131,360 00	10 p. c. & 10 less 10 p. c.	12,175 64
Asphaltum ..... lbs..	2,351,855	26,006 40	25 p. c.....	6,501 60
Asafetida..... lbs..	79,097	8,982 00	20 p. c.....	1,796 40

FREE OF DUTY—Continued.

Quantity, value, rate, and amount of duties received for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1875.

Articles.	Quantity.	Value.	Present rate of duty.	Amount of duty received in 1875.
Balsams	.....	$23 00	30 p. c.....	$6 90
Barytes:
Sulphate of ..... lbs..	2,117,854	17,995 00	½ c. p. lb...	10,589 29
Nitrate of.....	.....	5,881 00	20 p. c.....	1,176 20
Beeswax ..... lbs..	30,459	8,009 00	20 p. c.....	1,601 80
Benzoates.....	.....	.....	30 p. c.....	.....
Black of bone, or ivory-drop black	.....	.....	25 p. c ...	.....
Bladders, manufactures of	.....	863 00	30 p. c.....	258 90
Books, in other than the English, Greek, and Latin languages.	Not given separately.	.....	25 p. c	.....
Borax, refined..... lbs..	5,153	1,224 15	10 cts. p. lb	515 30
Brimstone, in rolls or refined..cwt..	.....	.....	$10 p. ton..	.....
Brick	.....	3,277 57	20 p. c.....	655 51
Fire-brick	.....	50,325 42	20 p. c.....	10,065 09
Roofing-tile	.....	45,359 68	20 p. c.....	9,071 93
Bulbous roots, not otherwise provided for.....	.....	60,661 71	30 p. c.....	18,198 51
Calomel..... lbs..	2,424	2,817 25	30 p. c.....	845 17
Camphor, refined..... lbs..	30,236	6,462 00	5 cts. p. lb.	1,511 80
Chloroform ..... lbs..	27	18 00	$1 p. lb . .	27 00
Cobalt, oxide of... ..... lbs..	678	2,604 00	20 p. c. ...	520 00
Coke..... tons..	934	9,648 00	25 p. c.	2,412 80
Copperas, green vitriol, or sulphate of iron..... lbs..	138,473	1,171 00	½ c. p. lb...	692 37
Copper ore, including matte... lbs..	16,714	2,982 00	3 c. p. lb...	501 42
regulus of..... lbs..	12,518	2,076 00	4 c. p. lb...	500 72
Crayons, of all kinds.....	.....	6,664 00	30 p. c.....	1,999 20
Dried pulp.....	.....	.....	20 p. c.....	.....
Finishing powder.....	.....	.....	20 p. c.....	.....
Fish skins	.....	.....	20 p. c.....	.....
Frankfort black, and Berlin, Chinese, fig, and wash blue, dry.....	.....	.....	20 p. c.....	.....
Glass, window, painted or stained, imported by and for the use of philosophical, educational, literary, scientific, or religious associations, and not for sale	.....	.....	40 p. c.....	.....
Grease, all, not specified	.....	92,362 50	10 c. p. lb. & 20 p. c.	10,814 55
Gum substitute or burnt starch, lbs..	616,052	35,085 00	10 p. c.....	3,608 50
Hair, curled, used for beds or mattresses.....	.....	58,882 00	30 p. c	17,664 60

FREE OF DUTY—Continued.

Quantity, value, rate, and amount of duties received for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1875.

Articles.	Quantity.	Value.	Present rate of duty.	Amount of duty received in 1875.
Hair of hogs	3,800	$57 00	1 c. p. lb...	$38 00
Lemon juice	Not given separately.		10 p. c.
Magnesia:
Carbonate of lbs..	186,106	17,543 00	6 c. p. lb...	11,166 36
Calcined lbs..	22,251	7,492 00	12 c. p. lb..	2,670 12
Mineral and bituminous substances in a crude state, not otherwise provided for, except chromate of iron		18,891 17	20 p. c.	3,778 23
Mineral kermes			10 p. c
Oil:
Cod-liver, crude gals..	14,027	7,734 00	20 p. c.	1,546 80
Cod-liver, medicinal		16,960 36	40 p. c.	6,784 14
Paints:
Blanc-fixe, enameled white, satin-white, lime-white, and all combinations of barytes with acids or water lbs..	145,728	4,899 00	3 c. p. lb...	4,371 84
Carmine lake, dry or liquid
Indigo extracts lbs..	446,227	59,778 00	10 p. c.	5,977 80
Indigo carmine			20 p. c.
Iron liquor			10 p. c.
Lamp-black			20 p. c.
Paper size		32 00	20 p. c.	6 40
Paving-stones		2,016 90	10 p. c.	201 69
Pitch		60 00	20 p. c.	12 00
Plants:
Fruit, shade, lawn, and ornamental trees, shrubs, plants, and flower-seeds, not otherwise provided for		73,743 65	20 p. c.	14,748 73
Garden seeds, and all seeds for agricultural and horticultural purposes, not otherwise provided for		325,465 54	20 p. c.	65,093 10
Polishing powder of all descriptions		10,113 00	25 p. c.	2,528 25
Red precipitate			20 p. c.
Resins, gum, not otherwise provided for		9 00	20 p. c.	1 80
Resin lbs..	10,334	648 80	20 p. c.	129 76
Rochelle salts			5 c. p. lb..
Roman cement		261,741 10	20 p. c.	52,348 22
Salts:
Epsom lbs..	21,593	364 00	1 c. p. lb...	215 93
Glauber lbs..	71,593	2,256 00	½ c. p. lb...	357 97
Santonine lbs..	101	474 00	$3 p. lb....	303 00
Sponges		110,449 45	10 p. c.	22,088 09
Starch:
of potatoes or corn lbs..	636,029	22,180 0	1 c. p. lb. & 20 p. c.	10,796 29
of any other material lbs..	5,953	485 35	3 cts. p. lb. & 20 p. c.	275 66
Strychnine, salts of oz..	1	5 00	$1 p. oz..	1 00
Sulphur, flowers of lbs..	39,929	891 00	$20 p. ton & 15 p. c.	490 24
Tallow lbs..	49,537	4,414 50	1 c. p. lb...	495 37
Tannin, (see Acid, tannic)			$2 p. lb....
Tar bbls..	425.50	2,501 35	20 p. c.	500 27
Tartar emetic lbs..	1,776	682 00	15 cts. p. lb	266 40
Provided, That alcohol, to be exclusively used for the manufacture of ethers, chloroforms, and the vegetable alkaloids, made free of duty by this act, may be withdrawn from bond free of the specific internal-revenue tax per gallon in quantities not exceeding one thousand gallons at any one time, under such rules, regulations, and bonds as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe.
Total				434,170 80

RECAPITULATION.

	Average ad valorem rate of duty.		Percentage of decrease.
	Duties received in 1875.	Proposed bill.
Cotton, manufactures of	37.38	30.69	17.9
Iron and other metals, and manufactures of	36.26	24 11	33.51
Wool, and woolen manufactures	55.86	40.99	26.62
Average percentage of decrease on dutiable articles			20.58

Estimated decrease of duty under the proposed tariff bill, No. 3132:

Decrease of duty from the actual receipts of the fiscal year 1875		$12,182,454 50
Add amount of duties not collected during eight months and three days under the provisions, less 10 per cent., namely:
Cotton goods	$702,315 31
Iron and steel	581,932 06
Wool and woolens	2,859,153 16
Lead	54,588 72
Copper	2,783 44
Other articles	16,902 83
		4,217,675 50
Total decrease		16,400,130 00
Increase of duties, estimated on the basis of imports of 1875:
Block tin	$345,757 44
Cigars and cigarettes	44,122 11
Leaf, unmanufactured, &c	376,979 88
Opium	188,324 01
Champagne, quart	579,856 56
		1,535,040 00
Net decrease on basis of imports of 1875		14,865,090 00

By the bill as originally introduced, it will be found that the duties upon luxuries of life, upon which, by every principle of common sense and human justice taxation should fall as the most fitted for this necessary infliction, were, with one exception, invariably lightened. On the items of dress and piece silks, ribbons, and velvets it was proposed to reduce the duty from 60 to 40 per cent.—a decrease in the revenue upon those items alone, and to that extent a direct loss to the national revennes from a source the best fitted to supply it, of $2,894,411.32. True, as an understood compromise by which the bill has been reported, they are here restored to present rates, but still leaving the enormous deficiency in revenue above recorded. On the item of kid gloves there is a loss of over $2,000,000, and the change from an ad valorem to a specific duty works in a remarkable manner and to an absurd extent to the detriment of those only able to buy an inferior glove. For example, a glove costing $12 per dozen has a duty imposed thereon of $4, making the total cost $16, or equal to a duty of 33⅓ per cent.; while one costing $24 per dozen with the added duty of $4, making $28 per dozen, pays but a duty of 16⅔ per cent.; a manifest injustice and discrimination in favor of the quality best able to pay the higher duty. And so with other descriptions of the article. The very thought that the first business measure proposed by a democratic House, in these troublous times, should be aimed at the ruin of domestic manufacturing is startling.

And this naturally suggests the question of the effects of protection. Has it enlarged the sphere of home production and cheapened the price to the consumer? I affirm that it has done both. The figures I have already referred to illustrate the one, and the following extract from the forthcoming annual report of the secretary of the American Iron and Steel Association are convincing evidences of the latter:

The price of domestic cottons, (heavy sheetings,) of the kind first made in this country at Waltham, Massachusetts, was as follows for a series of years after protection was extended to its manufacture: 1816, 30 cents a yard; 1819, 21 cents; 1826, 13 cents; 1829, 8½ cents; 1843, 6½ cents. English calicoes, made in Manchester, once sold in this country at from 25 to 40 cents a yard. The printing of American calicoes was not successful until after the passage of the tariff of 1824, because not sufficiently protected. From that year the prices by the package of Merrimack prints, equal to the best Manchester, have ranged as follows: 1825, 23 cents per yard; 1830, 16½ cents; 1835, 16 cents; 1840, 12 cents; 1845, 11 cents: 1850, 9¼ cents; 1855, 9 cents; 1875, 8 cents. Domestic brown drillings were first made about 1828 and sold at 15½ cents a yard by the package. In 1860 the price had fallen to 7½ and 9 cents. The domestic manufacture of fine lawns was introduced under the stimulus afforded by the tariff of 1842, and they were first sold in 1847. Similar goods, imported from England in 1846, were sold at from 28 to 30 cents. Both foreign and American lawns were sold in 1847 at from 12 to 15 cents. American lawns subsequently sold as low as 9 cents a yard, and foreign lawns were driven from the market.

The history of a celebrated manufactory of saws in this country presents a striking example of the cheapening effects of protective duties. During the revolutionary war, and for many years afterward, saws were not made here. All our saws came from abroad, and we paid for them just what foreigners were pleased to charge us. In 1840 an American mechanic, Henry Disston, commenced the manufacture of saws in Philadelphia in a small way. At that time English saws, with the name of the maker marked upon them, sold in our markets at prices ranging from $15.75 to $19 a dozen. Mr. Disston was obliged to sell his saws for less money, as his goods were unknown, while the English saws had a reputation; but after the Disston saw became known and its reputation was established, the English saws were gradually driven out of our markets and prices were still further reduced to consumers. In 1876 Henry Disston & Sons are sending saws to England, warranted equal to the best saws made in that country, and selling them at $10.50 a dozen, fully 50 per cent. less than the price Englishmen charged us in 1840. When Mr. Disston commenced business, inferior saws of foreign manufacture were sold in this country at $4.50 a dozen, and he could not make a saw for less than $7 a dozen; but now Henry Disston & Sons ship common saws to South America at $4.50. The exports of their goods in 1875 amounted to fully $100,000. But for protection, Henry Disston and his sons never would have been in a position to compete successfully in this country with foreign makers of saws; they never would have been able to find a market in other lands in one year for one hundred thousand dollars' worth of their products; this country never would have had as cheap saws as are now supplied to it; and all the benefits resulting from the employment of the labor of the country in the manufacture of saws never would have had an existence.

Before axes were made in this country, except by country blacksmiths, English axes cost our farmers and others from $2 to $4 each. By the tariff of 1828 a protective duty of 35 per cent. was levied upon imported axes. Under this protection the Collins Company, of Hartford, introduced labor-saving machinery, much of which was invented, patented, and constructed by themselves. In 1836 foreign and home-made axes were selling side by side in the American market at $15 to $16 per dozen, at which time foreign producers withdrew their competition, abandoning the entire market to the American manufacturers. Then home rivalry and improved methods continued the decline in prices. Axes were selling in 1838 at $13 to $15.25 per dozen; in 1840, at $13 to $14; in 1843, at $11 to $12; in 1845, at $10.50 to $11; in 1849, at $8 to $10. In 1876 the price of the best American axes in the market is $9.50 per dozen in currency, and the country exports large quantities to foreign markets. English writers admit the superior excellence of American axes.

I append hereto a table showing the manufactures of silk in 1860, both in the United States and the following States separately.

Statement showing the manufactures of silk in 1860.

States.	Materials.					Products.
	Raw silk.	Silk yarn.	Chemicals.	Other materials.	All materials.	Silk goods.	Silk ribbon.	Machine-silk.	Spool-silk.	Silk thread.	All other products.	All products.
	Pounds.	Pounds.	Dollars.	Dollars.	Dollars.	Yards.	Yards.	Pounds.	Pounds.	Pounds.	Dollars.	Dollars.
The United States	684,488	48,456	209,224	853,796	7,817,559	1,926,422	3,224,264	370,031	127,590	19,000	3,980,357	12,210,662
Connecticut	175,839	.....	81,674	407,727	2,049,834	636,282	447,664	145,702	36,790	.....	.....	3,314,845
Massachusetts	101,650	.....	46,500	23,900	937,000	.....	160,000	82,800	68,900	.....	.....	1,402,500
New Hampshire	2,000	.....	350	.....	14,350	.....	.....	2,000	.....	.....	.....	25,000
New Jersey	259,727	22,440	43,800	90,555	2,678,161	352,100	1,294,600	55,529	13,400	.....	2,182,784	3,998,964
New York	111,843	.....	.....	24,805	1,211,385	.....	22,000	77,500	7,500	.....	644,573	1,826,073
Pennsylvania	32,429	26,016	36,700	306,664	919,024	38,040	1,300,000	6,500	.....	19,000	1,053,000	1,632,900
Vermont	1,000	.....	200	145	7,805	.....	.....	.....	1,000	.....	.....	10,380

I also append the following table exhibiting the details of this industry for the year 1874, which shows its wonderful growth, and gives unanswerable promise of its future:

Value of products classified by articles manufactured in the year ending December 31, 1874.

	Pounds.	Value.
Tram } Organzine }	375,659	$2,911,055
Spun silk	140,000	800,000
Fringe silk	18,845	109,270
Floss silk	6,300	43,000
Sewing silk	82,857	917,809
Machine twist	414,285	4,848,839
Dress silks	.....	1,400,000
Millinery and necktie silks	.....	1,163,961
Handkerchiefs	.....	313,516
Foulards	.....	500,000
Ribbons	.....	2,776,836
Braids and bindings	.....	308,790
Laces	.....	103,000
Veils and veiling	.....	33,706
Military trimmings	.....	68,000
Upholstery trimmings	.....	340,000
Ladies' dress trimmings	.....	3,444,700
Total value of products January 1 to December 31, 1874	.....	20,082,482

	Pounds.	Value.
Reeled silks consumed	897,946	$8,829,973
Spun silks consumed	140,000	800,000
Total silk threads	1,037,946	9,629,973	9,629,973
Consumed in sewings and twist	497,142	5,766,648
Consumed in weaving	540,804	3,863,325	10,452,509

It has been the policy of nearly all of our tariff bills heretofore, and a wise and beneficent policy, as the most superficial review of the facts and figures will show, to levy high duties on what are termed the luxuries of life. And, in this connection, it may be remarked that a high duty, increasing the cost and repressing the ability to yield to the temptation of a luxurious living, in my opinion, has a strong reactionary moral influence over the habits and character of a people. It tends to frugality in life. By a system of social polity, those on a higher plane, who cannot afford to indulge in excessive expenses of living, cast, by their example, a healthful social glow over the lives of those around them. It is easy and natural to follow in the walk of those who excel us in the so-called favorable circumstances of life. If they are necessitated to avoid overindulgence, it is a strong support to us. So, too, many have deemed a high rate of duty upon articles of this description of vast benefit to the wealth of a nation. Every dollar of luxurious value brought into the country from abroad must be paid for in the sweat of domestic labor and production; hence the fewer in number and value the articles of foreign manufacture imported not necessary to the benefit and comfort of the home purchaser, the less the country is drained to pay for the same.

Under the present tariff the value of silks and the manufactures thereof imported, including braids, laces, fringes, galloons, dress and piece goods, ribbons, velvets, and all other manufactures of silk, amounted to $24,516,415.60, and the amount of duty collected was $14,037,998.14. The original bill proposed, and the amendments to the bill before the House which I understand are be offered, will propose, to reduce this duty to the sum of $3,733,109 on the same amount of imports—about one-fourth the present sum realized, or a reduction of nearly 75 per cent. The manufacture of silk, it will be perceived, is a new and growing industry in our country, and needs and is justly entitled to a full measure of protection. Under that hitherto accorded it has thriven apace. Why lessen it? Why strike the tax from the overflowing plenty of the rich to visit it upon the very sustenance of the poor?

Now, when suffering under the nervous reactionary prostration of war, a fluctuating currency, the shrinking timidity of capital, 33⅓ per cent. of duty is struck from the work of the competing millions of European labor, grooved down into a life systematized to the more imperious domination of capital over labor, and worked with all the ceaseless activity of machinery. The same remarks are applicable to the manufacture of cotton and wool. Under the beneficent providence of God, this vast area of territory, which seems to have been especially marked out for the home of the oppressed peoples of all the earth, is prolific in the abundance of its productions. Under the legislation of the past, the manufacturing capacity of the country has increased from $115,681,774, in 1860, to $177,489,739 in 1870 in goods of cotton composition, while those of wool have risen in value at the enormous rate of from $61,895,217 to $155,405,358 in the same series of years. I append tables exhibiting the particulars of this wonderful development.

Statement showing the manufactures of cotton and woolen goods in 1860.

Manufactures.	Quantity.	Value.
Cotton goods:
sheetings, shirtings, printing cloths, &c	yds.. 1,148,252,406
yarn and thread	lbs.. 47,241,603	$115,681,774
bats, wicking, and wadding	lbs.. 12,967,956
Woolen goods:
cloth	yds.. 124,897,862
yarn	lbs.. 6,401,206
shawls	no.. 616,400	61,895,217
blankets	prs.. 296,874

Statement showing the manufactures of cotton goods in 1870.

Cotton goods.	Quantity or value.
Materials:
cotton	lbs.. 398,308,257
cotton-yarn	lbs.. 6,222,189
cotton-waste	lbs.. 5,234,260
mill supplies	$10,910,672
all materials	$111,736,936
Products:
sheetings, shirtings, and twilled goods	yds.. 478,204,513
lawns and fine muslins	yds.. 34,533,462
print, cloth	yds.. 489,250,053
ya n, not woven	lbs.. 30,301,087
spool thread	dozs.. 11,560,241
warp	yds.. 73,018,045
bats, wicking, and wadding	lbs.. 11,118,127
table-cloths, quilts, and counterpanes	no.. 493,892
seamless bags	no.. 2,767,060
cordage, lines, and twines	lbs.. 5,057,454
flannel	yds.. 8,390,050

Statement showing the manufactures of cotton goods in 1870.—Continued.

Cotton goods.	Quantity or value.
Products—Continued.
thread ..... lbs..	906,068
ginghams and checks ..... yds..	39,275,244
cotton-waste ..... lbs..	7,921,449
tape and webbing ..... lbs..	484,400
seamless bags ..... lbs..	405,585
cassimeres, cottonades, and jeans ..... yds..	13,940,895
other products ..... lbs..	10,811,028

All products, 349,314,592 pounds, $177,489,739.

Statement showing the manufactures of woolen goods in 1870.

Woolen goods.	Quantity or value.
Materials:
cotton ..... lbs..	17,571,929
shoddy ..... do..	19,372,062
warp cotton ..... do..	1,312,560
warp ..... do..	140,733
wool, domestic ..... do..	154,767,095
wool, foreign ..... do..	17,311,824
yarn, cotton ..... do..	3,263,949
yarn, woolen ..... do..	2,573,419
chemicals and dye-stuffs	$5,833,346
all other materials	$5,670,250
all materials	$96,432,601
Products:
blankets ..... prs..	2,000,439
blankets, horse ..... No..	58,552
beavers ..... yds..	261,208
cloth, cassimeres, and doeskins ..... do..	63,340,612
cloth, felted ..... do..	1,941,865
cloths, negro ..... do..	1,932,382
cottonade ..... do ..	75,000
coverlets ..... No..	226,744
flannels ..... yds..	58,965,286
frocking ..... do..	75,000
hosiery ..... doz..	21,460
jeans ..... yds..	24,489,985
kerseys ..... do..	5,506,902
linseys ..... do..	14,130,274
repellants ..... do..	2,663,767
robes, carriage ..... No..	22,500
rolls ..... lbs..	8,683,069
satinets ..... yds..	14,072,559
shawls ..... No..	2,312,761
skirts, balmoral ..... yds..	280,000
skirts, balmoral	$1,217,800
tweeds and twills ..... yds..	2,853,458
warp ..... lbs..	122,000
yarn ..... do..	14,156,237
yarn, hosiery ..... do..	223,000
yarn, shoddy ..... do..	1,569,000
goods not specified ..... do..	162,000
miscellaneous articles	$3,251,368
Value of total products	155,405,358

This has only been accomplished by the development of labor, brought about by the investment of capital seeking thus, as it ever does, new and enlarged channels of profit. Remove your duties, and capital, finding no longer the attractive lure of gain, departs therewith; labor is left not only unemployed, but is losing, by an inverse ratio, that great quality of its worth, the smoothness, finish, and adaptability which come from the improvement of time and action. And yet, by the strange reasoning of this bill, all of this development is wrong and suicidal, and a blow is to be struck at the source of it to the extent of a reduction of over $1,700,000 on cotton manufactures alone. Again, sir, in iron, another blow is aimed at the industries and industrial classes of the country, and with nearly all of the furnaces out of blast, a reduction in duty is proposed of nearly 30 per cent., or $2 per ton. I beg to call attention to the following statement, showing the rates of duties upon the following descriptions of iron under the several tariff acts from July 4, 1819, to March 3, 1875: [See next page.]

In addition to this statement, and to be compared and studied with it, is the following statement showing the production of pig-iron of all kinds in the United States from 1854 to 1875, inclusive, in tons of 2,000 pounds each:

Years.	Tons.	Years.	Tons.
1854	736,218	1865	931,582
1855	784,178	1866	1,350,943
1856	883,137	1867	1,461,626
1857	798,157	1868	1,603,000
1858	705,094	1869	1,916,641
1859	840,627	1870	2,050,000
1860	919,770	1871	1,900,000
1861	731,544	1872	2,854,558
1862	788,662	1873	2,868,278
1863	947,604	1874	2,689,413
1864	1,135,497	1875, (estimated)	2,068,696

Thus it will be seen there has been an increase of nearly 400 per cent. in the product of pig-iron of all kinds from 1854 up to 1873, while the estimated loss for the year 1875 reaches nearly 800,000 tons, as compared with 1873, from the depression following the crisis of the latter year. And yet this is the chosen time to strike the reckless blow proposed in this bill. Herewith is also appended a table exhibiting the production of railroad iron in the United States from 1854 to 1872, inclusive, in tons of 2,000 pounds each:

Years.	Tons.	Years.	Tons.
1854	108,016	1865	356,293
1855	138,674	1866	430,778
1856	180,018	1867	462,108
1857	161,918	1868	506,714
1858	163,712	1869	593,586
1859	195,454	1870	620,000
1860	205,038	1871	775,000
1861	189,818	1872	850,000
1862	213,912	1873	890,077
1863	275,768	1874	729,413
1864	335,369	1875	.....

Here it will be seen that, under the fostering influence of protection, there has been an advance in production of nearly 800 per cent. in eighteen years. But, sir, let us turn, if we would obtain a correct idea of the magnitude of this branch of industry, to the official figures. We find that in 1870 the manufacture of iron amounted, in the value of products, to the large sum of $346,952,694, divided as follows:

Manufactures of iron in 1870.
[From the census reports.]

Iron, pig	$69,640,498
Iron, castings, (not specified)	76,453,353
Iron, stoves, heaters, and hollow ware	23,389,665
Iron, blooms	7,647,054
Iron, forged and rolled	128,062,627
Iron, anchors and cable chains	634,200
Iron, bolts, nuts, washers, and rivets	7,191,151
Iron, nails and spikes, cut and wrought	24,823,996
Iron, pipe, wrought	7,369,194
Iron, railing, wrought	1,268,756
Iron, ship-building and marine engines	472,000
Total	346,952,694

And how do we find protection work here? Let us see. Three years ago, or before the present tariff went into operation, Sheffield, England, exported to the United States cutlery and steel to the amount of £1,700,000. In 1875 this amount had shrunk to the sum of £690,000. If, now, we turn to our domestic exports, we will find that in former years we exported neither iron nor steel to Great Britain in any appreciable quantities or to any considerable extent. But, in 1875, the value of iron and the domestic manufactures thereof exported to Great Britain reached the sum of $11,002,892, and during the same year the value of steel and the manufactures thereof exported to the same country reached the sum of $7,232,686. Indeed, the results of protection are admirably exhibited in this branch of industry which has thereby been brought to a perfection which now enables us to compete with the first markets of the world. The New York Herald of April 5, of this year, contained the following in its foreign news:

LONDON, April 4, 1876.

The American consul at Sheffield has furnished the Liverpool Courier official statistics of the local trade with the United States for the quarter ending March 31, 1876, showing a total of $585,000, against $2,275,000 for the first quarter of 1873.

LIKELY TO COME OVER.

The Liverpool Courier says it is rumored that a great Sheffield concern is about to transfer its plant to the United States.

Can we have an illustration more unanswerable?

Now, sir, in addition to the decrease of $2 per ton on pig-iron, the proposition goes further and includes not only the raw material, but a reduction of from 25 to 40 per cent. on the manufactured article. This will cause a loss of nearly two millions of dollars in revenue from this one item alone.

As a practical illustration and fair sample of the manner in which this bill has been put together, how little attention seems to have been paid to any interest or welfare but that of other nations, I desire the Clerk may read the memorial I send to his desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A memorial to the Committee of Ways and Means on the subject of duty on wire-rope.

SIR: The capital now invested in wire-rope works in the United States amounts to about $3,000,000, the manufactories being located in the eastern, western, and Pacific States. The firms now engaged in this business invested their capital and commenced at a time when there was but little demand for wire-rope, and the use of the article was mainly developed by the manufacturers themselves. Not less than seven-eighths of all the wire-rope in this country is made of imported iron and wire, on which there is a duty. It is manifest that under the most favorable circumstances the cost to the American manufacturer must be at least as much more than the foreign as the value of transportation of the raw material; that the existing legislation, which imposes a duty on the raw material and admits free the manufactured article, is hostile to home interests, discriminating without reason in favor of foreign manufacturers. The cost of a home manufacturer is increased, in addition to the transportation, the amount of the impost.

The reason that American wire-rope manufacturers were enabled to do business and extend their works was that the trade was not of sufficient importance and magnitude to warrant foreign manufacturers in using any exertion to make sales in this country. This, however, is now changed, as the wire-rope trade has assumed considerable importance, and importers are using every exertion to take the trade which has wholly been built up by Americans, who now have their capital invested, which will be lost unless some relief is afforded. It would seem but equitable and just that a duty should be imposed on the manufactured rope; it now pays no duty, except as wire.

For comparison below are mentioned a few articles, with the duty on the raw material, as also the duty on the manufactured article. Each of these articles requires about the same amount of labor between the raw material and the finished product as wire-rope does:

Duty on raw material.	On manufactured article.
Hemp and manila, $25 per ton.	Tarred cordage, 3 cents per pound.
Hemp and manila, $25 per ton.	Untarred cordage, 2½ to 3½ cents per pound.
Iron rods for chain, 1¼ cents per pound.	Chain, less than ¼ inch, 2½ to 3½ cents per pound.
Wood-screws, 2 cents per pound and 15 per cent. and 3½ cents and 15 per cent.	Wood-screws, 8 cents to 11 cents per pound.
Iron for bolts, 1¼ and 1½ cents per pound.	Bolts, 2½ cents per pound.
Wire covered with silk, cotton, &c., 5 cents per pound over wire duty.

From the foregoing it appears that the general rule is that where the raw material is taxed a much heavier impost is levied on the manufactured article, and yet by the existing legislation in reference to this matter the rule is reversed. We therefore respectfully request the attention of your committee to this subject, and suggest that there be imposed on wire-rope, (both round and flat,) wire-cables, and wire-strands a duty in addition to that imposed on the wire of which they are made.

Respectfully submitted by JOHN A. ROEBLING SONS' CO.,
HAZARD MANUFACTURING CO., &c.

Hon. W. R. MORRISON, Chairman.

Statement showing the rates of duties upon the following descriptions of iron under the several tariff acts from July 4, 1789, to March 3, 1875.

Under the act of—	Pig-iron classified as—		Iron, more advanced than pig, and described as—
	An unenumerated article.	Pig-iron.	Rolled or hammered.	Rolled or hammered for band-iron.	In bars, blooms, bolts, loops, rods, slabs, or other form.	Bars, rolled or hammered, n. e. p., including flats under 1 and not over 7 in. wide, not under ¼ not over 2 in. thick, and rounds not under ¼ nor over 4 in. in diameter, and squares not under ¼ nor over 4 in. square.	Bars and flats, not less than 1 nor more than 7 in. wide, ¼ to 2 in. thick, value under $50 per ton.	Bars and flats, not less than 1 nor more than 7 in. wide, ¼ to 2 in. thick, value over $50 per ton.	Bars, rollered or hammered, comprising flats less than 7 in. wide, rounds less than ¼ or more than 4 in. in diameter, and squares less than ¼ or more than 4 in. square.	Bars, including flats under 1 and not over 6 in. wide, not under ⅛ nor over 2 in. thick, and rounds not under ¾ nor over 2 in. diameter, and squares not under ¾ nor over 2 in. square.*	Bars, including flats under ⅛ and not over 2 in. thick, and not under 1 nor over 6 in. wide, rounds under ¾ nor over 2 in. diameter, and squares less than ¾ nor more than 2 in. square.*	Rolled or hammered, not otherwise provided for.	Round, or square, or braziers' rods 3-16 to of 10-16 in. diameter.	Bars or bolts, not manufactured in whole or part by rolling	Bars or bolts, wholly or part by rolling.	For railroads and inclined planes.
						Ton.	Ton.	Ton.	Ton.
July 4, 1789	5 %		7½ %
August 10, 1790	5 %		7½ %
March 2 and 3, 1791	5 %		7½ %
May 2, 1792	7½ %		10 %
June 5 and 7, 1794	10 %		15 %
January 29, 1795	10 %		15 %
March 3, 1797	12½ %		15 %
July 8, 1797	12½ %		15 %
May 13, 1800	12½ %		15 %
Mar. 26 and 27, 1804	15 %		17½ %
March 3, 1807	15 %		17½ %
March 4, 1808	15 %		17½ %
July 1, 1812	30 %		35 %
February 25, 1813	30 %		35 %
July 29, 1813	30 %		35 %
March 3, 1815	30 %		35 %
February 5, 1816	30 %		35 %
April 27, 1816	$10 00 per ton.	cwt. 50 c.		30 %												cwt. 45 c.	cwt. $1 50
April 20, 1818		cwt. 50 c.		30 %												cwt. 75 c.	cwt. 1 50
March 3, 1819		cwt. 50 c.		30 %												cwt. 75 c.	cwt. 1 50
May 22, 1824		cwt. 50 c.		lb. 3 c.												lb. 3 c	cwt. 90 c.	cwt. 1 50
February 11, 1825		cwt. 50 c.		lb. 3 c.												lb. 3 c	cwt. 90 c.	cwt. 1 50
May 19, 1828	$12 50 per ton.	cwt. 62½ c.		lb. 3 c.												lb. 3½ c	lb. 1 c.	ton 37 00
May 24, 1828		cwt. 62½ c		lb. 3 c.												lb. 3½ c	lb. 1 c.	ton 37 00
May 20, 1830		cwt. 62½ c.		lb. 3 c.												lb. 3½ c	lb. 1 c	ton 37 00
May 29, 1830		cwt. 62½ c.		lb. 3 c.												lb. 3½ c	lb. 1 c.	ton 37 00
July 13, 1832	$10 00 per ton.	cwt. 50 c.		lb. 3 c												lb 3 c	cwt. 90 c.	ton 30 00
July 14, 1832		cwt. 50 c.		lb. 3 c.												lb. 3 c	cwt. 90 c.	ton 30 00
Under operation act March 2, 1833—
July 4, 1836		cwt. 50 c.		lb. 3 c.												lb. 3 c	cwt. 90 c.	ton 30 00
Sept. 11, 1841		cwt. 50 c.		lb. 3 c.												lb. 3 c	cwt. 90 c.	ton 30 00
as in force June 30, 1842		cwt. 50 c.		lb. 3 c.												lb. 3 c	cwt. 90 c.	ton 30 00
August 30, 1842		ton $9 00		lb. 2½ c												lb. 2½ c	ton $17	ton 25 00
July 30, 1846		30 %			30 %
March 3, 1857		24 %			24 %
March 2, 1861		ton $6 00			ton $15	$15 00								ton $20 00
Aug. 5, 1861; Dec. 24, 1861		ton 6 00			ton 15	15 00								ton 20 00
July 14, 1862; Mar. 3, 1863		ton 6 00					$17 00	$18 00	$20 00					ton 25 00
June 30, 1864; Mar. 3, 1865; Mar. 16, 1866		ton 9 00								lb. 1 c. or *	lb. 1½ c. or *	lb. 1¼ c.
May 16, 1866; June 1, 1866		ton 9 00								lb. 1 c. or *	lb. 1½ c. or *	lb. 1¼ c.
July 28, 1866; Mar. 2 and 22, 1867		ton 9 00								lb. 1 c. or *	lb. 1½ c. or *	lb. 1¼ c.
Mar. 25, 26, 29, 1867; Feb. 3, 1868		ton 9 00								lb. 1 c. or *	lb. 1½ c. or *	lb. 1¼ c.
July 20, 1868; Feb. 19, 24, 1869		ton 9 00								lb. 1 c. or *	lb. 1½ c. or *	lb. 1¼ c.
July 14, Dec. 22, 1870		ton 7 00								lb. 1 c. or *	lb. 1½ c. or *	lb. 1¼ c.
June 6, 1872		ton 6 30								lb. 9-10 c. or *	lb. .0135 c. or *	lb. .01125 c.
March 3, 1875		ton 7 00								lb. 1 c. or *	lb. 1½ c. or *	lb. 1¼ c.

* Under the act of June 30, 1864, and subsequent acts, it is provided that certain descriptions of iron shall pay not less than 35 per cent.
† To March 3, 1865, then 70 cents.

Mr. FREEMAN. And yet this industry has pleaded in vain.

So, too, in the question of drugs and chemicals. What more important to the self-sustaining welfare of a nation than the ability to provide, in the hour of trial and need, these vital elements of strength? I desire to have read extracts from the letter of a highly intelligent gentleman, who knows whereof he writes, and which I send to the Clerk's desk for that purpose.

The Clerk read as follows:

532 WALNUT STREET, PHILADELPHIA,
April 11, 1876.

DEAR SIR: I am sure that you do not need any urging to oppose the Morrison tariff with its free list. This is composed almost entirely of drugs and chemicals, perhaps more largely represented in Philadelphia than in any other city of the United States. The passage of the Morrison bill would be simply absolute destruction to this industry, thus costing this city an enormous capital and the profitable labor of thousands of workingmen, only to give an additional market to foreign producers and fresh profits to their agents and the speculators in New York, who alone have devised this tariff and are urging its passage through the committee and Congress. Leave American chemicals where they now are, subject to a duty only large enough to discriminate in favor of American wages against those of foreign countries. It is of enormous importance that we should maintain our independent supply of drugs, and capital has for fifty years been devoted to the chemical industry, until now $50,000,000 depend upon the skill and science of our manufacturers. Their productions equal those of any part of the world, and cost the consumer little more, while giving a guarantee of purity far greater than that of foreign chemicals sent here to get rid of them in home markets. All this is to be destroyed by the proposed free list, and only for the benefit of foreign producers living in countries that actually forbid or deny the introduction of American chemicals. The difference of profit will always inure to the speculators in New York, while the consumer will never know what he is getting nor how much it will cost.

Yours truly,

J. G. ROSENGARTEN.

Hon. CHAPMAN FREEMAN, M. C.

Mr. FREEMAN. In this connection, and most forcibly illustrating the absolute insanity of such action upon this subject as is proposed in this bill, I desire an editorial from the Philadelphia Evening Bulletin of April 10, 1876, which I send to the Clerk's desk, may be read. There are doubtless many on this floor who can appreciate its truth from sad experience.

The Clerk read as follows:

One of the articles that have been placed upon the free list in the tariff bill constructed by the Ways and Means Committee in Congress is sulphate of quinine. This important drug is manufactured by only three firms in this country, two of them having their establishments in Philadelphia. Against the proposed extinction of the present duty of 20 per cent. the manufacturers have protested, and this protest has provoked from the free-trade journals, the Chicago Tribune especially, strong expressions of indignation that the "monopolists" should dare to ask for the continuance of a duty upon "an article which is indispensable to the sick." The Tribune asserts that the petitioners are "interested in maintaining high prices;" that the people will be largely the gainers by withdrawal of the duty; that it is a case of forty millions of Americans against three firms; and that, while the latter are demanding that the Government shall maintain a duty which will enable them to get more for the commodity than it is worth, the former are yearning to be permitted to obtain the drug for precisely its real value.

That this agitation and misrepresentation are simply a part of the free-traders' scheme for breaking down the whole system of protection to American industry is easily discernible. It can be shown in the clearest manner that the statements made in that behalf are unworthy of confidence, whether they are offered as facts or as theories. The proposition that American manufacturers use the advantage given to them by the tariff to maintain their prices far above foreign rates is proved to be false by a single fact. In 1871, when the duty upon quinine was 45 per cent., an ounce of English quinine cost to import $3.03 an ounce. During that year the best American quinine, which is equal in quality to the finest made anywhere, was sold at prices ranging from $2.30 to $2.50. The American makers, instead of taking advantage of the high price of the English article and raising their rates, maintained the latter at such figures as to afford them a reasonable profit. English quinine now is much lower than that made here, but the reason for this extreme and unusual temporary decline is to be found rather in the extraordinary depression of business than in any other cause. The free-traders complain that the protective system produces extortion when protected quinine sells for $2.20 currency, the present price, but they do not explain why free British quinine was not extortionate when it demanded $2.75 currency in England in 1873. The fact is that American quinine sells now, and has frequently sold in the past, for rates very much lower than those that have prevailed in Europe.

This undeniable truth knocks the foremost argument of the free-traders to pieces; but there is very much more to be said upon the protective side of the subject. The duty is the only barrier that shuts out competition upon the cut-throat principle. While it remains, the American manufacturer can conduct his business and regulate his prices upon fair principles. If the duty were removed, nobody who has any knowledge of the methods of the British free-traders doubts that they would sink millions in the effort to destroy our home manufacture utterly. And when that is achieved and the Englishman becomes the monopolist instead of the American, who is so foolish as to believe that the latter will not use his supreme control of the market for the purpose of demanding fancy prices? And what will there be to protect the suffering people, for whose interests the free-traders are now so very solicitous, from his rapacity and greed?

If "forty millions" of Americans need quinine, it is a matter of the first importance that they should be supplied from home; not only that fair competition may regulate the price, but that the supply may be maintained in times of war. The southern confederacy paid fearful prices for quinine during the blockade, and it resorted to desperate measures to obtain the drug. Not an ounce was made in the South, and incalculable suffering resulted from the scarcity of the imported article. If our manufactories are destroyed, this entire nation will be placed in a precisely similar position in the event of a war with England or France, and it may be too late then to begin anew the process of building the industry from its foundations. The man who considers it foolish to anticipate such a catastrophe may as well condemn the maintenance of an Army organization or of ships of war as an unnecessary bit of extravagance.

France takes good care to protect herself against such an emergency. She does not impose a duty upon American quinine; she absolutely prohibits it from entering her ports. British free trade is not permitted to destroy such an important industry. But French manufacturers would be very glad if our Government should give them a chance to find a market wherein their protected quinine could compete with ours unprotected. They and the British dealers alone would profit by the removal of the American duty. Our Government would lose a handsome revenue from imported quinine; the people would have to pay more for it and there would be absolutely no gain of any kind to an American citizen from a change which is now being urged in an American Congress. Our manufacturers have vast capital invested, they make large contributions to the internal revenue, they pay heavy duties upon various articles which they import for use in their laboratories; they give employment at good wages to hundreds of skilled workmen, and they sell their drug often at lower rates than the foreign article commands, even though the latter is produced by laborers who have pauper wages. These things deserve consideration. It would be an outrage for Congress to smite down this important interest at one reckless blow. It is deplorable that a tariff bill should be intrusted to a Ways and Means Committee which knows only that certain democratic theorists want free trade, and which goes blundering through the list of protected articles amending and striking out without clear perception of the vast importance of its action or familiarity with the nature of the delicate interests that will be affected by it. We trust that the friends of protection will make as sturdy a fight over the quinine duty as they will over the duty upon iron, endeavoring to throw a few glimmering rays of light respecting the subject into the brains of the statesmen who are playing directly into the hands of foreign manufacturers.

Mr. FREEMAN. But what may be, nay, what must be, the inevitable loss to the producer, the manufacturer, the progressive industry of the nation by such a course of mutation, vacillation, and uncertainty! Where is the promise of the future? What is the outlook for that success in the long years to come for which capital and enterprise go hand in hand and struggle through difficulties and discouragements with zealous dependence and hope? What becomes of confidence, or that reasonable business anticipation with which commercial interests look to the future, where all is doubt and change—and distrust engendered thereby? Sir, in this respect we have much to learn. How can a young country like our own, notwithstanding all the blessings of its wonderful fertility in energy and the elements of wealth, aspire to commercial equality with its older rivals, unless legislation and public policy are founded upon something more substantial than ever-changing opinions and are guided by a higher order of intelligence in purpose and a broader uniformity of character.

Another striking illustration of the minuteness with which it is desired to guard the pauper labor of Europe in this bill is to be found in the item of bricks, which are placed on the free list. At the present rate a duty of from 20 to 35 per cent. is levied upon this article, which is one entering into and forming a great branch of American labor. In the city of Philadelphia alone there are a large number of men and boys employed in the manufacture of this article, which, once upon the free list, can be and will be brought in ballast wherever a port can be reached, to the detriment of home labor and, in fact, to the utter ruin of it in that regard. I invite attention to the following table exhibiting the condition of this industry in the various wards of that city in 1870:

Wards.*	Number of establishments.	Capital (real and personal) invested in the business.	Steam-power.	Number of horse-power.	Number of machines.	Average number of hands employed.		Total amount paid in wages during year.	Value of machines.	Production, (including all jobbing and repairing.)
						Males above 16 years.	Females above 15 years.			Kind.	Quantities.	Value.
Fifth	1	$55,000	1	20	11	20	.....	$17,000	$8,915	Common and pressed	5,000,000	$40,000
Nineteenth	5	29,000	.....	10	124	80	26	31,400	15,000	.....do	8,500,000	99,100
Twentieth	11	91,000	1	41	48	202	55	98,659	28,959	.....do	19,440,000	181,000
Twenty-third	4	74,000	1	26	44	69	20	41,440	8,630	.....do	5,431,800	68,918
Twenty-fourth	6	159,500	4	96	92	208	75	119,800	29,735	.....do	23,050,000	290,800
Twenty-fifth	11	188,200	.....	35	87	280	110	106,870	34,964	.....do	25,589,000	316,748
Twenty-sixth	21	1,033,000	7	287	349	1,124	25	602,260	184,680	.....do	90,680,000	1,118,040
Twenty-seventh	2	55,000	.....	6	25	57	12	26,888	5,000	.....	3,400,000	29,200
Twenty-eighth	19	134,300	1	45	150	282	92	113,400	46,486	.....	23,300,000	238,650
Totals	81	1,819,000	15	565	932	2,331	415	1,157,717	362,369	.....	204,390,800	2,682,456

* Wards 1 to 4 and 6 to 18, no returns. Ward 5 represents a company working in the twenty-eighth ward.

RECAPITULATION.

Number of establishments		81
Capital		$1,819,000
Steam-engines		15
Horse-power		565
Number of machines		932
Number of men	2,331
Number of boys	415
Total men and boys		2,746
Wages paid		$1,157,717
Cost of raw material		302,369
Number of bricks made	M..	204,390
Value of product		$2,382,456

At the present time the most reliable and competent authority places the value of the production at over $3,000,000, employing over three thousand men and boys, and paying $1,250,000 in wages. I append, for the information of this committee, a statement of the rates of duty on bricks from August 10, 1790, to the present time, and to which I desire to call especial attention:

Rates of duty on bricks from August 10, 1790, to the present time.

Acts of Congress.	Rates of duty.
	Per cent.
August 10, 1790, and March 2 and 3, 1791	10
May 2, 1792	10
June 5 and 7, 1794, and January 29, 1795	15
March 3, 1797, July 8, 1797, and May 13, 1800	15
March 26 and 27, 1804, March 3, 1807, and March 4, 1808	17½
July 1, 1812, February 25, 1813, July 29, 1813, March 3, 1815, and February 5, 1816	35
July 13, 1832, and July 14, 1832	15
March 2, 1833	.....
July 4, 1836	15
September 11, 1841	20
As in force June 30, 1842	20
August 30, 1842	25
March 2, 1861, (present rate)	20

It will thus appear that this is the first time in the history of the country, from 1790 up to the present hour, that it has been proposed to have this article added to the free list. Now, sir, let us look for a moment at the facts in connection with this branch of American industry; at what is its character and how great its extent. I have the honor to represent a district in which this industry is of very great importance; indeed it becomes so everywhere where the soil is suitable and circumstances bring men together in municipalities. It has been, like all else that pertains to progress and development, a matter of nurture and gradual expansion. From a small and insignificant beginning, measured by the narrow and scanty wants of a frugal people, rude and simple in manners and few comparatively in their numbers, it has grown into an enterprise wherein capital seeks employment to the extent of millions of dollars and yields profitable labor to tens of thousands of willing and eager hands. In Philadelphia alone, in 1870, there were eighty-nine brick-yards, employing three thousand and eighty hands, the wages of whom, during the working season, amounted to $1,228,715. The amount of capital invested was $2,294,500, the value of the material was $701,134, and the value of the product was $3,112,906. If we turn to the State in which that city is situated, (and it is but an illustration of the condition of that industry everywhere where the circumstances of location are the same,) we find that in the same year the products reached the sum of $6,071,209, while the capital invested was $4,559,783 and the amount paid out in wages was $2,337,691. The number of common brick made was 428,640,000. Taking the estimate of the same year for the United States, we find the number of bricks made was 2,801,832,000 and the value of the same amounted to $27,414,681. There is not the slightest doubt that in 1875 these figures were very largely increased.

Now, sir, take the extent of coast and the number of ports into consideration, and it will at once be seen what a blow is here directly aimed at the domestic labor finding employment in this vast branch of native industry. Foreign labor being so much cheaper than our own can take this form, and, wherever carrying upon the water can be done by taking the shape of ballast, our own labor is to that extent crippled and destroyed. This is pre-eminently a case where a duty is proper for its protective character. In 1875 the value of bricks imported into the United States amounted to $114,363.79, upon which a duty of $25,182.88 was collected. This is, comparatively, a small amount, but sufficient to illustrate the suicidal character of the proposition as a principle.

But, sir, this bill of "simplification" did not originally end here. It struck again and in another direction, and one involving the welfare and prosperity of a different section of our country, in proposing to put the article of bituminous coal on the free list. And I refer to this because I understand it is proposed to still reach these original propositions by amendments to the amended bill. Under the present tariff the duty on bituminous coal, culm, and slack thereof and coke, was seventy-five cents per ton on the former and 40 and 25 per cent. ad valorem on the latter two, relatively. In 1875 the value of bituminous coal, culm, and slack thereof, and coke imported reached, notwithstanding the above duty, the sum of $1,809,506.41, and the amount of duty collected thereon reached the sum of $332,905.76. The soft coal produced in the western part of Pennsylvania, like the anthracite, is in some respects a specialty, being used to a great extent for the purpose of manufacturing gas. These particular qualities of coal have been made incidental to the great State wherein they are largely found, and not coming into collision or competition with the older markets of the world do not need and do not ask protection.

The State, therefore, which in part I have the honor to represent here cannot be charged with any selfish motives in protesting against the suggestion of this uncalled-for and most injudicious change. She protests, however, in the name of the general welfare and on behalf of the common good. More conspicuously her sister-States of Maryland and West Virginia, and especially the former, have a deep interest in this article of production

I have here an article from the New York Bulletin of February 19, 1875, which gives a clear statement of the magnitude of the production throughout the States and of course the large employment of labor therein, which I shall send to the Clerk's desk and ask to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

PRODUCTION OF BITUMINOUS COAL IN 1874.

From the returns received from the Eastern, Middle, and Western States, it appears that the production of bituminous coal has nearly equaled during the past year that of anthracite coal and that there is a steady increase of the production of this coal which will soon place it above that of anthracite, which has doubtless passed its maximum production. The production of bituminous coal in Pennsylvania for the past year is placed at 9,731,540 net tons and 1,624,379 tons of coke. Maryland produced 2,410,895 tons; Missouri, 725,399 tons; Tennessee, 81,948 tons; the Kanawha region, 140,217 tons; Alabama, 48,319 tons; Illinois, 784,950 tons, and various other places, 1,000,000—making a grand total of 16,547,617 tons. This leaves out of the calculation the vast bituminous coal-fields of the Territories, of which those of Wyoming alone bid fair to outrival those of Pennsylvania, from which already the country from the Missouri River to San Francisco is largely supplied.

Mr. FREEMAN. The coal product of West Virginia in 1873 was 1,000,000 tons. The product of the Cumberland coal-field in Maryland for the last three years has been as follows:

	Tons.
1873	2,674,100
1874	2,410,895
1875	2,342,772

The product of Ohio in 1875 was 4,868,252 tons and the number of persons employed 13,469, of whom 12,096 were employed under ground and 1,373 above ground.

In this connection I beg to add the following statement, showing the duty on coal from July 4, 1789, up to the present:

DUTY ON COAL—ALL KINDS OF COAL.

Act of July 4, 1789, two cents per bushel.
Acts of August 10, 1790, and March 2 and 3, 1791, three cents per bushel.
Act of May 2, 1792, four and a half cents per bushel.
Acts of June 5 and 7, 1794, and January 29, 1795, five cents per bushel.
Acts of July 1, 1812, February 25, 1813, July 29, 1813, March 3, 1815, and February 5, 1816, ten cents per bushel.
Acts of April 27, 1816, April 20, 1818, and March 3, 1819, five cents per bushel.
Acts of May 22, 1824, and February 11, 1825, six cents per bushel.
Act of August 30, 1842, $1.75 per ton.
Act of March 2, 1861, (bituminous only,) $1 per ton.
Acts of July 14, 1862, and March 3, 1863, $1.10 per ton.
Acts of June 30, 1864, March 3, 1865, March 16, 1866, May 16, 1866, and June 1, 1866, $1.25 per ton.
Act of 1874, (present rate,) 75 cents per ton.

ALL OTHER NOT OTHERWISE PROVIDED FOR.

Act of July 30, 1846, 30 per cent.
Act of March 3, 1857, 24 per cent.
Act of March 2, 1861, 50 cents per ton.
Acts of July 14, 1862, and March 3, 1863, 60 cents per ton.
Acts of June 30, 1864, March 3, 1865, March 16, 1866, May 16, 1866, and June 1, 1866, 40 cents per ton.
Anthracite in 1870 made free.

CULM OF COAL AND COKE.

Act of July 30, 1846, 30 per cent.
Act of March 3, 1857, 24 per cent.
Act of March 2, 1861, 25 per cent.
Acts of July 14, 1862, and March 3, 1863, 30 per cent.
Acts of June 30, 1864, March 3, 1865, March 16, 1866, May 16, 1866, and June 1, 1866, 25 per cent.

Thus, while the apparent amount of revenue lost to the Treasury in this instance, should this item be restored to the free list, also seems comparatively small, (although the present condition of the latter doubtless adds to its acceptability,) yet let us pause to ask what would be the result of the adoption of this free clause upon the mining labor of these States. Let us set aside the question of capital and look only at the broad humanitarian doctrine of providing for one's own household. It is a practical sealing-up of the great caves of wealth, and tearing away from the reach of yearning, eager, hungering toil the privilege of honest work. It is a ghastly elimination of the mandate permitting man to live by the sweat of his brow; for he is forced to a relentless and unavailing competition, under circumstances of a character which he cannot change or alleviate, and yet under which it is not in the nature of things that he should continue to exist. And what is to be the effect upon the manufacturing interests in regard to this free coal? It would be clearly a matter of unjust discrimination against manufacturing interests in the various sections of the country. In those manufacturing districts adjacent to the coal-fields of Canada and within reach of foreign coal it not only acts as a restriction of the market for home coal, but places those sections at an unjust and inexpedient advantage as regards more distant markets. It is therefore to that extent legislation that becomes special in its substance and in antagonism to the general welfare. The present tariff was framed after a thorough examination and study of the wants of our people, at a time when the peculiar necessity of the case rendered it vastly important that more than due care should be given to the subject. War had produced an abnormal and unnatural condition of things, and facts and figures, it was essential, should undergo an exhaustive examination. Home industries had been largely stimulated by a civil strife which had illustrated, far more clearly than the most precise rules of theory can ever do, the mighty power born of, nursed, and developed into rich maturity by the beneficent laws of a wise system of protection. And yet a proportionate element of relief was called for and was due upon articles of import, as far as regards duty thereon, proportionate with the growth and strength and ability for competition developed by that very process of stimulation. Accordingly we find that a very large increase was made in that tariff bill of articles added to the free list. Its value in the year 1875 was estimated at the sum of $167,255,004.42, a sum which will be found, upon comparison, to exceed the total amount of customs duties collected in the same year by $12,701,021.87.

Nothwithstanding this care, and the extent of intelligent examination given, what was the result? The year 1874, long before it closed, developed the fact that there was likely to be a deficit in the necessary and expected amount of revenue, and a corresponding inability on the part of the Government to meet its liabilities. As a consequence it was necessary to pass an additional tariff measure, and such a one, known as the little tariff bill, was accordingly framed during the second session of the Forty-third Congress, and finally became a law. With what reason, or upon what process of justification, then, can a present increase in the free list be made? An increase which I believe it is admitted, and if I am in error I can be corrected, will amount to $3,000,000 in round numbers, but which, should business revive, will of course be extensively increased. Is this the time, when the nation, not yet one hundred years old, is groaning under its vast load of suddenly accumulated debt; when the Treasury needs every proper assistance to the replenishment of its gaping coffers; when doubt and uncertainty are clouding the perspective of the commercial future; when the uttermost corners of the country are teeming with unemployed labor and private capital is languishing in nervous timidity? Is this the time, I ask, to gaily brush aside every element of recuperation and defense, as a nation, and stalk, like one blinded with sleep, into the possible embrace of a condition of national bankruptcy and ruin? Sir, it is a serious question and one deserving of the greatest consideration of every thinking mind. In fact the bill under consideration, in its original form, plainly admitted as much. Under its terms the deficiency thus mapped out with such apparent ease and indifference to the private interests of capital and labor, and public interests and general welfare was proposed to be supplied and recuperated from the already emptied coffers of the poor. From those who have not it was proposed in a sort of round about but thoroughly practical way to take away even that they have. And how was this to be done? Sir, it was proposed by the original bill, and I understand is still to be proposed by an amendment to this, to re-impose duties upon tea and coffee; upon the former of fifteen cents per pound, and on the latter of three cents per pound. The friends of this bill estimated that from this source they could raise a duty of $19,204,400. It has always been held by free-traders that all articles we cannot produce should be put on the free list. That we can get along very well without this unjust tax has been demonstrated by the operations of the United States Treasury under the present tariff. Here is the only real luxury allowed the poor man's table taxed to raise the revenue lost by the reduction on the rich man's luxuries. It is only a a wonder that champagne and high-priced wines, which never cross the thresholds of the poor, are not put on the free list. Sir, I desire to raise my voice in earnest opposition to this proposition. Though the tax has been stricken out, it is understood that it is to be pressed as an amendment to the bill.

The following article, taken from the columns of the American Grocer of February 5, 1876, very clearly indicates the secret sources of its strength. It is headed, with conspicuous aptness, "The unjust tax;" and I send it to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The tax of three cents a pound on coffee proposed in the tariff bill before the Committee of Ways and Means fully justifies our warnings and predictions in former numbers of the American Grocer, and shows the skill, ability, and power of the combination which has been able during the past three years, in despite of the law of supply and demand, to increase and maintain the price of coffees throughout the world to nearly double their intrinsic value.

Almost brought to grief by the accumulated production which their high prices had stimulated; with heavy loads to carry and drooping prices to sell at, they now invoke the aid of Government in their behalf, and the latter proposes to tax the entire population of this country with a sum sufficient to repay the present combination for its losses and enable them for a year at least to pocket the tax.

In our issue of November 20, in an article headed "A new bonanza," we gave notice that a strong movement would be made at the coming session of Congress to get a duty on tea and coffee, and showed that this duty, which for a long time would yield nothing to the Government, from the large stock of coffee in hand which would evade duty, would constitute a simple donation from the pockets of the consumer of from three to four million dollars to go into the hands of the operators. We gave at the same time the figures on which we made this estimate.

We now give our calculations on a more recent basis:

	Tons.
Stock of all kinds in first and second hands on February 1	38,025
Imports to July 1—same as last year	60,691
Probable supply to July 1	98,716
Distribution to July 1—same as last year	56,028
Probable stock on July 1	42,688

or 95,621,120 pounds, which, with three cents duty, amounts to $2,868,633, gold.

For a few weeks past the visible supply has been slowly decreasing, owing to the large stock here having compelled importers to cease buying at Rio; but at the same time, while the visible supply here has decreased, the stocks at Rio have increased under larger receipts this year than at the same time last year; and as soon as it becomes a fixed fact that the duty is to be levied to take effect July 1, that surplus will be transferred here for the operators to avail themselves of the duty.

In support of our position we may quote from the remarks made to a Times reporter by Mr. A. A. Low, one of the largest and oldest established tea importers in the city, that all duties on tea and coffee fell directly and to their full extent on the consumer, and if the tariff should be replaced the price would certainly advance by fully the amount of the tax. If there should be a tariff imposed which should go into effect immediately it would be productive of a profit to those who had a large stock on hand, but it was not proposed that this should be enforced until July, and then the supply would be in excess of the demand. A "consumer" likewise expresses his opinion in the Times that by July 1 the speculators in tea and coffee will have imported all the available supplies into the country, not only from the producing countries but from Europe; so that instead of any revenue accruing to the Government for at least a year the tax would be paid by the people to these speculators in the shape of enhanced prices.

Mr. FREEMAN. Now should this prove to be a proper statement of the case, and I see no reason to doubt it from the plain and forcible manner in which it is made, we shall lose for a year at least the customs duties to the extent of the sum intended to be raised from this source. Indeed, I have been informed by a gentleman who not very long since occupied a high place in the counsels of the Government, that if this tax is levied it will put $100,000 in the pockets of the firm of which he is a member. It seems as if one of the inevitable results of the passage of this bill, should it become a law, will be the revival of the income tax as a necessity for the creation of the proper revenue to meet the requirements of the Treasury; and there are several bills, I believe, now before the Committee of Ways and Means for this purpose. It is very certain that should the reasoning on facts already referred to be sound, there must eventuate a large deficiency in the annual income. The total receipts of the Government for 1875 were $288,000,051.10, and the expenses for carrying on the same were $274,623,392.84, leaving a margin of only $13,376,658.26. Should the collection of the duty on tea and coffee fail for the first year after the passage of the bill there would be a loss to the Treasury of over $19,000,000 of funds absolutely necessary for its solvency. I am entirely opposed to the imposition of this tax; and especially in connection with the reductions alluded to, as founded upon no element of justice and upon no satisfactory principle.

But still another and most clearly defined source of objection to this bill is that it is discriminating and sectional. While the duties on raw wool are decreased to the extent of 15 per cent. and the competition started with increased vigor against the West, in favor of Canada and Europe, the duties on tobacco, raised chiefly in the South, are increased as follows: on cigars and cigarettes, $1 per pound; on tobacco in leaf, unmanufactured and not stemmed, five cents per pound. So, too, while the protective duties on the cotton manufactures of New England, and on the iron and steel productions of Pennsylvania, are reduced to such a point as will enable the cheap labor of Europe to successfully compete with our domestic industries, the highly protective duties on the sugars of the South are not disturbed, but retained at the same rate as that prescribed by the present tariff. I fail to appreciate the force or necessity for this discrimination.

Such was this bill as originally introduced. But, sir, bad as it was in the first place, as I have endeavored to show, it is, if anything, as an attempt at tariff legislation in its present shape, infinitely worse. It has absolutely no theory. It is neither free trade, nor protection, nor revenue. Whatever pretense of principle it originally contained has been skillfully eliminated, and it stands a strange "what-is-it," as a sort of suggestion to the imagination of a "who-is-it" for its author.

But, further than this, the bill in its present shape means repudiation. It is an absolute deprivation of revenue absolutely necessary to the Government. The last report of the Secretary of the Treasury will show that the Government pressingly needs an increase of revenue. This bill does not propose to raise that revenue by any other methods. It points to no means whereby the great loss of income is to be recuperated. It cuts down the only means whereby the obligations of the Government can possibly be met. In short, this is a bill, proposed by a democratic committee, to stop the wheels of Government and cripple it in the liquidation of its honest obligations.

Why, sir, where is the revenue to come from to make up the certain deficiency with tea and coffee free? Nearly $12,000,000 clipped off, like a dead twig from a bush, from the necessary supplies for carrying on the Government? It is worse than bad, for it is better to act upon a bad principle, with good intentions to mold, and guide, and restrain, than to act, as this bill proposes, upon no principle whatever. The motive can only be conjectured. Some hidden impulse that appears only on the face of this long free list with a strange suggestiveness has been the source of its construction. True, even the committee has been driven to restore the duties upon certain articles and omit the duties upon tea and coffee in order for the bill to reach the House for consideration; but the long list of duties proposed to be removed, the evident intent to have this supplied by the tea and coffee of the poor, and the utter indifference to even an affectation of principle, gives to the whole matter the permeating fragrance of a job. I shall ask the Clerk to read an article from the Iron and Steel Bulletin, which is somewhat suggestive of the birthplace of this bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE MORRISON TARIFF BILL POPULAR IN ENGLAND.

The British Trade Journal, a London magazine of wide circulation, is "published on the first of each month in one issue for all countries," as its title-page represents. It will be remembered that Mr. MORRISON introduced his tariff bill on Monday, the 31st day of January last. His action took the country by surprise, and even his own committee, which had not been consulted in the preparation of such a bill. But it did not take the free traders in England by surprise. They knew that the Morrison tariff bill was coming. We will not say that they had a hand in its preparation, but we think they had And here is the reason for our opinion. The British Trade Journal, in its issue for February 1, so dated on the title-page, and received at this office February 15, contained the following announcement, among other news paragraphs, in the middle of the magazine, one day after Mr. MORRISON presented his bill in the House:

"THE FREE-TRADE MOVEMENT IN AMERICA.—Although the protectionist party in the United States is incomparably the strongest and most influential, yet there is an important section of the people who are not wedded to that economical heresy. There is reason to believe that free-trade principles will continue to gain fresh support every day, and that they will ultimately prevail we cannot doubt. We note that a new tariff bill making a large reduction in the tariff, increasing the free list, abolishing combined rates, and fixing specific duties, equal to 25 or 30 per cent. ad valorem, is to be introduced into the House of Representatives. Whether it becomes law or not—and the probability is that the bill, if even it passed the lower House and Senate, would be vetoed by President Grant—it at all events shows that the free-trade party is healthily active."

How did this English editor, who is so jubilant over the progress (!) of free-trade principles in this country, know so long in advance of all Americans and Congressmen and the Committee of Ways and Means itself that a free-trade tariff bill was to be introduced into the House of Representatives? How did he know its exact provisions so definitely and minutely that he could publish them to "all countries" before the people most interested could obtain even a hint of their character? Can Mr. MORRISON tell? Was his bill made for him in England, as a certain schedule of duties was once made for Mr. Wells? We suggest that Mr. MORRISON be interrogated on this point. And we suggest that Mr. Wells, Mr. Moore, and some other Englishmen who had the misfortune to be born in this country be interrogated also, by an "investigating committee" if necessary. If our tariff laws are to be made to order for us in England, the American people have a right to know it. And if Mr. MORRISON knows that the bill which bears his name was so made, the people have a right to know that.

Mr. FREEMAN. I see nothing in this tariff bill to recommend it, and much to call for its condemnation. I believe, if it becomes a law, the importer with a stock of goods on hand will be ruined; the manufacturer who has been staggering under the heavy load of war's evil reactionary influence will find the remnant of his business destroyed; the depressed mechanic who has struggled through these dark times with only hope to cheer, will find the death of that hope in the long outlook of idle months to come; tradesmen will be bankrupted; and unskilled labor, now scouring the surface of the habitable quarters of the country in an almost fruitless search for work, may prepare for literal beggary. I can find in this bill, Mr. Chairman, no redeeming trait, and I shall vote most cheerfully for its defeat.

Finance and Taxation.

SPEECH OF HON. C. W. MILLIKEN,

OF KENTUCKY,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

June 2, 1876.

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the bill (H. R. No. 3132) to revise and simplify existing laws imposing duties on imports and to reduce taxation—

Mr. MILLIKEN said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I do not propose to confine my remarks on this occasion to any one particular subject that is now pending before Congress or the country, but to allude briefly to several matters which are of themselves so necessarily interwoven one with the other that the consideration of one of them leads to the consideration of the others. I wish first to look at the question of finance for a moment, as there has not been a question since the foundation of the Government affecting the several interests of the country which has received so universal consideration as this. From the highest statesman and shrewdest financier to the humblest mechanic and day-laborer in all the land has this matter been examined and re-examined, investigated and re-investigated, until theory is well-nigh exhausted. It cannot be expected, therefore, that I will be able to solve the mystery or even advance a new or original thought on the subject. But I have in common with others my own views for ultimate relief, to some extent at least, if not permanent relief. The very first step in this direction in my opinion is economy. We cannot expend money and keep clear of debt unless we have the money. To have the money the people must be taxed to raise it. To make extravagant appropriations and pay high salaries the people must be taxed to get the money to meet the obligations of the Government thus entered into. A rich, happy, prosperous people makes a rich, happy, and prosperous government, while the reverse is equally true; that is to say, a government which taxes, oppresses, and impoverishes its people must necessarily sooner or later become poor and oppressed in its turn. A government or a nation is but a family upon a larger scale. The prosperity of one member of the family carries with it the prosperity of all the other members of the same family to a greater or less degree. If all are prosperous the family as a unit is prosperous; and so of a government or nation. Suppose a sensible, prudent, and judicious man, the head of a family, should discover that his annual expenses exceeded his income, what remedy would most likely present itself for relief? That of economy, of course; the cutting off of all superfluous expenditures of money for mere luxuries and living strictly within the reasonable, necessary wants of life. This will bring about the desired end beyond question, with the proper energy thrown into his productive resources. Why will not the same line of conduct pursued by a nation or people produce a like result? Certainly no good reason to the contrary can be alleged.

In view of these patent facts and in view of the universal demand for relief coming from the poorer and working classes of our people, the democratic members of this Congress are determined to open up the avenues of retrenchment and reform in every department of the Government, that those who are the greatest sufferers and who are bearing the greatest and heaviest burdens of the crisis that is upon us may see and know we are not only honest in our effort to relieve them, but that we are in earnest. It is believed by a majority of the Committee on Appropriations that the aggregate appropriations of last year can be reduced at least $30,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, without the slightest interference with the necessary and healthful working of any one or more of the various departments of the Government. Whether it can be done or not, the amount proposed to be saved is worth the effort. If it be practicable to carry on the Government with a reduction of $30,000,000 of money this year and continue it at the same rate for ten years, including the interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum upon each thirty millions thus saved, we will have saved at the expiration of that time of principal and interest thereon a sum nearly equal to one-fourth part of the entire public debt of the United States, or a sum approximating $500,000,000. This process of itself will ultimately pay off and discharge the entire debt with the aid of the present rate of liquidation. But the inquiry still exists, can the expenses be reduced thirty millions without injury to the vigorous and healthful administration of the Government? Let us see.

In 1855 the net ordinary expenses of the Government under democratic rule, exclusive of pensions and interest on the public debt, were in—

1856	$62,476,298
1857	64,630,763
1858	71,110,669
1859	65,133,727
1860	58,955,953

making a total expenditure for the last six years under democratic rule of $318,191,043.

The last six years of expenditures under the present administration foot up quite differently. The net ordinary expenses of the Government for the year 1870, exclusive of pensions and the interest on the public debt, were $136,081,305. For the year—

1871	$131,419,126
1872	124,668,453
1873	151,129,210
1874	149,580,570
1875	142,073,632

making a total cost for the last six years of the present administration of $834,952,296.

Therefore the net ordinary expenses of the Government for each of the last six years cost the people more than 150 per cent. more than did either of the last six years under democratic rule. Why is it and what is it for? No other reason, sir, can be given than that of extravagance and reckless expenditure of the hard earnings of the hard-laboring and overburdened people. The War, Navy, Indian, and miscellaneous appropriations constitute the principal items of these expenditures.

The War expenditures from the year 1855 to 1866, inclusive, were $116,053,432, or an average per year of $19,342,239. That of the last past six years ending June 30, 1875, were $266,905,228, or an average per year of $44,484,271. That of the Navy from the year 1855 to 1860, inclusive, $80,301,508, or an average of $13,383,584. The expenditures of the Navy for the last past six years were $138,408,537, or an average per year of $23,068.89. The Indian expenditures from the year 1855 to 1860, inclusive, were $21,231,588, or an average of $3,538,598. For the same purpose the republicans have expended during the last past six fiscal years $40,835,488, or an average of $6,805,914. The miscellaneous expenses for the years 1855 to 1860, inclusive, were $151,625,501, or an average per year of $25,437,583. That of the last six fiscal years were $387,744,542, or an average of $64,624,090.

I grant that the pension-list for the last six years legitimately exceeds that of the last six years under democratic rule, as does also the interest upon the public debt; and it will be remembered that in these tables I have left out these two items altogether. Yet the net ordinary expenses of the Government as administered by republicans more than doubles that of the expenses under democratic rule. These are the respective sums regularly appropriated by republican Senates and Houses of Representatives for the items and purposes named. What became of this money? Was the Army two and a half times larger during the last six years than during the years from 1855 to 1860, or the Navy twice as large during the same years? Has the Government grown with such magical rapidity in fifteen years that the miscellaneous expenses to carry it on must be more than doubled? Such is not true in point of fact in either case. Or have the various Indian tribes increased in the same time to so unparalleled an extent that they too cost us more than 100 per cent. more under this republican administration than under democratic rule?

Sir, it is a notorious fact that the number of Indians are and have been for years decreasing rather than increasing in numbers. It is time to put a stop to all unnecessary appropriations and expenditures of money.

This, sir, is the first step to specie resumption. This is the first step to revival of trade and commerce, and the first step to that general relief not only sought after but prayed for throughout the length and breadth of our entire Republic with the fervency of a soul sick of sin.

When the bloody shirt shall cease to paralyze reason and dethrone deliberate judgment; when plunderers shall be driven from high places and reason shall once again assert her dominion over the actions of men, and honesty and good faith shall be the governors and rulers of men, then do we expect to be trusted in place and power and to carry the Government in its administration back to economy and expend the people's money only for just, legitimate, and necessary purposes.

The war is over. Let us turn our attention to the civic wants of mankind, and let the past bury the dead past. This, sir, is another step in the direction of prosperity and specie resumption.

But I am wandering too far from the purpose in view. Mr. Chairman, the effort should be made to reduce the cost of this Government and to relieve the general stagnation that pervades all branches of industry which is so keenly felt throughout every avenue of business. To reduce the expenses of the Government $30,000,000 per year is no trivial consideration to a people depressed in spirit and oppressed with taxation, who are out of both bread and labor at the same time, not only willing to work but actually begging for it. Yet, sir, have we seen during this session of Congress and in this endeavor to reduce the expenses of the country a constant and persistent effort on the part of the other side of this House to defeat the ends sought. Notwithstanding, gentlemen, your opposition to this line of economy, the expenses have been reduced in the bills which have passed this branch of Congress to an amount which in the aggregate will exceed $30,000,000. These reductions, sir, in the other end of this building where the republican party have a majority have met with the same opposition they did by the republicans of this House. Conference committees from the two Houses have been appointed to adjust the differences but the result of the conferences has been without a satisfactory understanding and without agreement.

Sir, the eyes of 45,000,000 of interested and anxious people are upon us. They will hold that man and that party responsible directly to themselves who put obstructions in the road to reform in the administrative services of this Government.

To vote for a bill reducing expenses on its final passage upon a call of the yeas and nays will not be satisfactory to the people when they learn you have resisted its passage paragraph by paragraph during its pendency in the Committee of the Whole. Commerce, trade, and labor everywhere are without employment and without price, with no prospect of revival in sight. A reduction of expenditures, therefore, is of the greatest necessity, as one of the means by which these employments may be revived and confidence restored. But something additional must be done.

On the 14th of January, 1875, Congress passed an act proposing to resume specie payments on the 1st of January, 1879. The inquiry is, can this be done? Is it safe and right to attempt to do it by the force of arbitrary enactments of law which knows no deviations or mitigations, in poverty or affluence? How stand the figures? In 1874 we exported the value of $18,876,698 of merchandise more than we imported. With this single exception our importations have exceeded our exportations every year since 1862. Last year our imports exceeded our exports to the value of $19,563,725. With these figures before us how can any sane man calculate specie resumption in two and a half years without absolute bankruptcy to the entire debtor class of our people, who are at least 80 per cent. of the business class of our population. But I do not believe it can be accomplished by force of direct law to that end, as I further believe the facts and figures show.

There was at the end of the last month, May, but $66,624,766.37 in coin in the Treasury. The annual gold and silver products of our mines amount to about $63,000,000.

The gold and silver bullion and specie imported and exported from the United States for the last six years are as follows:

	Imported.	Exported.
1870	$26, 419, 179	$58, 155, 666
1871	21, 270, 024	98, 441, 989
1872	13, 743, 689	79, 877, 534
1873	21, 480, 937	84, 608, 574
1874	28, 454, 906	66, 630, 405
1875	20, 894, 217	92, 132, 142

These figures show an annual drain upon our coin resources from $31,000,000 to $76,000,000.

Here I beg leave to say for myself that I am and ever have been for specie resumption; nor do I believe our credit can ever be restored and maintained at home and abroad on any other basis than that of specie. The legal-tender note of the United States is not money; it is but a promise to pay the amount stipulated upon its face, without saying in what or when said amount will be paid. It is simply a note of the United States, like that of an individual, promising to pay, without saying in what or when. But it is certainly the cheapest medium of exchange in the shape of paper currency ever known in this or any other country. It is much superior to the currency of national banks; and yet the resumption act of 1875 withdraws $82,000,000 of this currency from circulation and substitutes in its place $100,000,000 of national-bank currency.

This resumption act of 1875 is certainly not wise, for arbitrary, forced resumption can never be accomplished without the most serious results to all classes other than the wealthier. From the passage of that act to this time the premium on gold in exchange for greenbacks or banking currency has been higher than the corresponding period immediately preceding its passage. For the reason that on the 1st day of January, 1879, greenbacks will be equal to gold, because on that day the plighted faith of the Government is pledged to exchange gold par for par for every dollar of greenbacks outstanding on that day; they are therefore equal to gold on that day. The money-changers, the men of wealth, capitalists and bankers, can and will regulate and fix at will the premium on gold as between it and greenbacks.

But how is it with national-banking currency? It is made payable on demand in lawful money, which means legal-tender notes. It therefore is made equal to gold the moment legal-tender notes are convertible into gold. Therefore, the banking association which has deposited with the Secretary of the Treasury $100,000 United States bonds, as required by law, is doing business to-day on a banking capital of $90,000, which, in the money-markets of the country, is worth in gold but $78,750, which, on the day fixed by law for resumption, will be worth in the same market its face value in gold, a net profit in gold on the present value of the $78,750 of 12½ per cent. or $11,250 of gold forced into its vaults by congressional legislation alone, and not by any act of the association.

This we have done for the capitalists and bankers of the country, while the masses, who are poor and sorely oppressed, are made still poorer and become more and more oppressed for the reason that legal-tender notes and national currency, being at a heavy discount, will be held there by the brokers and money-changers of the world with the view of buying it up at reduced figures with gold and holding it for its appreciating value on the maturity of the resumption act. I know of no better investment. This will lead of necessity to a stringency and scarcity of money never before known in this or any other country perhaps. Our own and foreign capitalists of all countries will avail themselves of this great congressional bonanza that will and of right should bring the severest condemnation upon those who have aided in the adoption and enforcement of such a law.

The plain duty of Congress then, to my mind, is to repeal the resumption act in toto, without hesitation and at once, and thereby cut off the speculation necessarily attaching to it, as well as at the same time stopping the contraction of the legal-tender volume of currency, which certainly is not too great. Then repeal the national-banking act of 1863, and all amendments thereto, to take effect at some not distant day in the future, so as not to materially injure those engaged in it or interfere with their rights under existing laws and contracts. For, while I am unwilling to be injured by a monopoly, I am unwilling to injure one which has come into existence under color and sanction of law, however erroneous that law may have been that gave it birth.

National banks are monopolies, and all laws in their interest and for their maintenance are legislation in the interest and support of monopolies, the statement of the honorable and efficient Comptroller of the Currency to the contrary notwithstanding. In his last annual report, page 15, he says:

> One of the principal objections urged against the national-banking system is that it is a monopoly; moreover, that it is a monopoly authorized and continued at the expense of the Government. The reverse of this is true, for the national system, so far from being a monopoly, has in fact uprooted the real banking monopoly which has existed in this country from the foundation of the Government to a late day.

Further on, and on the same and next page, he says:

> At the time of the organization of the national-banking system it had few friends among the shareholders of the then existing State banks. These were as a rule in the possession of a monopoly granted them by the State Legislatures, and the bitter opposition to the national system on the part of the officers and shareholders of State banks may be directly traced to that fact.

The honorable Comptroller of the Currency positively denies that the national-banking system is a monopoly, and at the same time, and in the same sentence, with equal earnestness, he asserts that the old State-banking system was a monopoly, and on page 16 of his report he defines what a monopoly is:

> A monopoly is a privilege; something so valuable that it commands a premium, and which its owner does not willingly surrender without a struggle.

Then the Comptroller quotes Mr. McCulloch as good authority; that he (McCulloch) was a large banker under the old State-bank system, doing a large and profitable business, bitterly opposed to the national-bank system, because its ultimate operations would force his bank into liquidation; and yet he quotes Mr. McCulloch as saying that the national-bank system grew into favor day by day; that it is vastly superior to the system it superseded, and the best system which has been or is likely to be devised.

Now, if the old State bank system was a monopoly, as the honorable Comptroller says, and a monopoly is a privilege and something commanding a premium, and Mr. McCulloch had possession of that something commanding a premium, why was he day by day, as he became more and more familiar with the national-banking system, converted to its advocacy? Certainly not because it was less profitable to him. Certainly not because the premium was less. This is unnatural and inconsistent with itself and with the history of mankind throughout all ages of the world, and especially is it inconsistent with the human nature of Mr. McCulloch.

On page 17 of that same report is a table exhibiting the various classes and amounts of the bonds deposited as banking security, their gold and currency value on the 1st day of November, 1875. The difference on that day being 16 per cent., at this rate will give $64,342,421 on the day fixed for resumption.

The maturity of the resumption act will close up this wide gap. Yet the Comptroller says it is not a monopoly. He concludes, from his figures given in that table, that the bankers are loaning their money on an average throughout the States at 8 per cent. and that the interest realized above that sum is 2½ per cent.

Class of bonds.	Par value.	Currency value.	Circulation issued.	Gold interest.	Currency value of interest.
Sixes of 1881	$82,781,050	$100,578,976	$74,502,945	$4,966,863	$5,761,561
Five-twenties of '65	7,056,600	8,256,169	6,350,899	423,396	491,139
Five-twenties of '65, (new)	6,536,650	7,811,297	5,882,985	392,199	454,951
Five-twenties of '67	10,282,100	12,467,046	9,253,890	616,926	715,634
Five-twenties of '68	2,981,000	3,629,367	2,682,900	178,860	207,478
Ten-forties of 1864	97,974,159	113,772,482	88,176,735	4,898,708	5,682,501
Fives of 1881	141,072,050	163,467,238	126,964,845	7,053,602	8,182,178
Pacific Railroad bonds	12,814,512	15,537,958	11,533,061	.....	768,870
Totals	361,498,112	425,840,533	325,348,260	18,530,554	22,264,312

This he calls profit, and this only. Well, call it what you will, when it is added to the 8 per cent. it makes an interest to the bank on its capital of 10½ per cent., which the people have to pay for the use of the currency furnished them by their Government. No man can afford to pay an annual interest of 10 per cent. on a borrowed capital invested in any legitimate business in this country, nor is it possible for the Government to furnish its citizens with a circulation that costs them that interest and at the same time maintain its and their active and healthy existence. The Government having the power, it is its bounden duty to furnish to the people the best and cheapest currency. In my opinion the legal-tender currency is the best medium of exchange practicable in this country at this time.

The report of the Secretary for the month of April last says that we have of this currency $370,527,876. This, when added to the available national-banking currency, $309,080,847, gives a paper currency of $679,680,723. To this may be added also the fractional currency, say $40,000,000, and you have the total circulation, amounting to $719,608,723. Estimating the present population of the United States at 45,000,000, this will give a fraction over $14 per capita—a greater amount per capita, except during the years 1854, 1855, 1856, 1857, and 1859, than has ever existed in this country before. Yet it is not too great in volume, for it is scarce, even at these figures.

Something, therefore, other than the scarcity of money, or that which represents money, is the cause or auxiliary to the present money depression. To solve this question will give the solution to our troubles, in my judgment. We find no scarcity of money in the great money centers of the country, and loans can be had to-day at from 2 to 2½ per cent. in all those localities. I would not deprive money and capital of employment. Its active profitable use should be encouraged by and through all proper means; but at the same time labor must have protection even against the insidious movements and oppressive tendency of capital. It is a lamentable fact that concentrated capital has always and will forever oppress the mechanic and day laborer who is dependent upon his muscle for subsistence for himself and family.

More lamentable than all else, however, is that we hear around this Capitol to-day, in private discussions of financial matters, that we must be cautious of the adoption of this or that measure for fear we may array the capitalists of the country against us in our political contest for office. My God! has it come to this, that honest American citizens, entertaining honest convictions, representing an honest constituency, must seal their lips and give no utterance to those convictions for fear capital will concentrate its force against them. It is better, sir, that lean, appalling hunger should constantly haunt the hearth-stones of every family in the land than that the just and honest convictions and judgments of the people's representatives should be silenced through fear of the influence of accumulated wealth, which, like great numbers of people, has the inherent power of self-protection. The great purpose and object of law are, or rather should be, to protect the weak who are not able to protect themselves, whether that weakness consists in paucity of wealth or numbers.

Now, sir, whatever may be said or whatever theory suggested for the restoration of general prosperity, in my opinion it can never be accomplished at all until the burdens of taxation are removed from the agricultural sections of the country, the occupants and tenants of which are generally poor, for when their resources fail there is failure everywhere and in every department of industry. Remove from them the heavy duty imposed under existing laws upon every article necessarily used in tilling the soil, from the reaper and mower down to the tack-hammer, a duty which ranges from 30 to 60 per cent. on their value, thereby drawing from that class of laborers on an average nearly one-half the value of their products before it is realized. Adjust your tariff duties on these articles solely to a revenue standard, and, while I am for free trade, I believe the agricultural section of the country will be content, at least until the public debt is paid or reduced to a comparatively nominal figure.

This will give them prosperity, prosperity will beget renewed energy, renewed energy will bring into their garners additional harvests, additional harvests will give additional exports, additional exports will bring into our ports gold in exchange; and thus we will be enabled to return in earnest to specie resumption, the only standard of values known to the world. And, sir, this is not the end of it.

We are not only taxed oppressively upon each and every article necessary to be used in production, but when the article is produced it is again taxed in an invidious and stealthy manner in the hands of the producer. You require the purchaser of the raw material, who buys directly from the producer, to purchase a license before purchasing our tobacco. This he adds to his debit account and deducts it from the price he pays to the producer. Through this one source you collected from the producer in 1874, $115,991.88. In 1875, the last fiscal year, you collected $92,228.33, the latter year falling off on account of the failure of the crop; and from the various taxes invidiously placed upon this product you collected the last fiscal year the enormous sum of $37,303,461.88.

Mr. Chairman, this internal-revenue taxation is most unjustly and iniquitously distributed. The State which I have the honor to represent in part paid into the Treasury last year $9,022,636.66. The States of Maine, Massachusetts, Michigan, New Hampshire, New Jersey, and Vermont together paid but $7,427,802.04. Kentucky paid $1,594,834.62 more than the whole of them together, or a sum equal to six dollars and eighty-three and a fraction cents per capita upon her entire population, while the people of the six Eastern States named do not pay on an averge exceeding $1.06 per capita, and when the tobacco-growing sections appeal to Congress for reduction of tariff duties upon the materials which are necessary in cultivating their crops they meet these States coming in solid phalanx and full force to oppose the reduction.

The result is the tobacco-growing States are poor and growing poorer day by day, and these six Eastern States are rich and unconditionally opposed to the repeal of the resumption act, because its enforcement will make them still richer, converting their greenbacks into gold or its equivalent in value.

Tobacco is no more a luxury than tea or coffee. The use of both is the result of habit, and not because of the nutritious elements contained in either. Tea and coffee that paid a revenue directly into the Treasury of about $20,000,000 per annum now enters our ports free of duty because a tariff would protect nobody, neither article being produced within our territories.

Why not restore the duties upon these articles where, or nearly where, it was before its repeal in 1872, and reduce it on articles necessary for agricultural purposes? This will distribute the burdens of the revenues for the support of the Government more generally throughout the States than a tax upon any other two articles would do, because both are used in all sections and by all classes. Nor will this make either tea or coffee a cent costlier, because the moment we take off the impost duties the same moment the governments growing them put on export duties, and they now are sold at higher prices in this country than before they were relieved of tariff duty on entering our ports.

Something must be done to revive industries at home and bring about prosperity there before you can safely force resumption by the simple enactment of law by which you command a man to pay gold who has not got it. In the year 1874 the gold value of our exports was $586,283,040; imports for the same year were $567,406,342 in gold value—a difference of $18,876,698. For last year our imports amounted to $533,005,436; our exports for the same time were $513,441,711—making a difference of $19,563,725.

Now, I put the question, Mr. Chairman, with a public debt of $2,213,616,217.38, our mercantile imports exceeding our exports from $18,000,000 to $20,000,000 per annum, a semi-annual gold interest on an average of about 5½ per cent. on $1,695,041,450 of the public debt, our export of gold and silver bullion and specie exceeding our imports on an average of $50,000,000, every branch of industry and employment everywhere wholly prostrate, will any gentleman tell us how it is possible to resume specie payments at the time now fixed by law?

Step by step have the creditors of our country enriched themselves off our unfortunate indebtedness. The 5.20 bonds were issued and put upon the market during the late civil war, and we received for them greenbacks which were worth from thirty-three and a third to fifty cents to the dollar. They bore 6 per cent. interest, with the privilege to the Government to redeem them at the expiration of five years. But on the 18th of March, 1869, when the war was over, the contract by which the holders came in possession of the bonds, complete in every sense, Congress, to explain the terms and conditions upon which the bonds were issued, never before in doubt or misunderstood, passed that celebrated act converting these several bonds into gold bonds.

Sir, we have had enough legislation in the interest of bond-holders. The honest yeomanry of the country are tired of it; honesty, good faith, and good conscience are tired of it.

It is now our duty to return in spirit and letter in our legislation to the purer days of our fathers, giving just, economical, and equal rights to all classes in all sections of the country whether rich or poor, and exclusive privileges to none, then and not till then may we expect resumption, practical healthful resumption to come.

Mr. Chairman, in all human probabilities this is the last time I shall ever address a Congress of the United States on this subject. I therefore in the name of my people make this appeal for their relief, and in the interests of the whole country.

Expatriation and Citizenship.

SPEECH OF HON. EDWARD C. KEHR,

OF MISSOURI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

June 8, 1876,

On the bill to carry into execution the provisions of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution, concerning citizenship, and to define certain rights of citizens of the United States in foreign countries.

Mr. KEHR. The conflict between the doctrine of perpetual allegiance and the right of expatriation constitutes the most important chapter in the history of American diplomacy. It is the sharp contest between two antagonistic ideas—the one binding the subject to the sovereign by an indissoluble tie and finding appropriate expression in the aphorism, "Once a subject, always a subject;" the other maintaining the right of the individual to renounce an existing allegiance, to select at will the country of domicile, and having chosen it to transfer to it his allegiance complete and entire. The former idea implies the subordination of the individual, the latter the freedom of the individual.

The American people in the very incipient stage of their history ranged themselves on the side of the freedom of the individual; for we find that the Declaration of Independence, among the "repeated injuries and usurpations" which it enumerates, charges the King of Great Britain with "obstructing the laws for naturalization of foreigners; refusing to pass others to encourage their migrations hither." And no sooner had the young Republic secured the right to ingraft into its Constitution the thought which made its Revolution successful, we find power granted to Congress "to establish an uniform rule of naturalization." To naturalize an individual presupposes the power of the individual to expatriate himself; that is, to divest himself of prior allegiance to the end that he may assume a new national affiliation. And yet from the time when the principle was thus announced until a very recent period in our history the logical consequences resulting from it were ignored even by our own Government.

As late as 1840, while Mr. Wheaton was the minister of the United States at Berlin, when called upon to interfere in behalf of an American citizen of German birth then in compulsory service in the Prussian army, he declined to do so, upon the ground that the "native domicile and natural character of the naturalized citizen revert" the moment he returns to the country of his birth. And such continued to be the view upon which the Government acted in all cases of a similar kind until 1859. To concede that an American citizen may be impressed into the military service of another country (though it be the country of his birth) is to concede that as against that country he is not an American citizen. It is a denial of his right, completely and effectually, to expatriate himself; it presupposes the continuance, notwithstanding such expatriation, of an allegiance imposed by birth dormant during the period of his absence, but liable to be called into full vigor at any time by the fact of his presence again under the roof of his fathers.

In 1858 and 1859 Mr. Wright, our minister at Berlin, in repeated and earnest appeals to the Department of State, called attention to the inability of American consuls or ministers to shield from impressment citizens of the United States born in Prussia; and when in July, 1859, Mr. Cass, in his ever-memorable letter of instructions to Mr. Wright, asserted that—

> The moment a foreigner becomes naturalized, his allegiance to his native country is severed forever; he experiences a new political birth. * * * Should he return to his native country, he returns as an American citizen and in no other character—a new epoch in our diplomatic history was ushered in, and the views which were thereafter to guide the Department of State in dealing with this subject were brought into harmony with the theory of the Government. Mr. Secretary Seward strenuously continued efforts in the same direction until, the public thought of the country having become fully crystallized, Congress gave it expression by its act of July 27, 1868, when it declared "the right of expatriation" to be "a natural and inherent right of all people, indispensable to the enjoyment of the rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness," and announced that "all naturalized citizens of the United States while in foreign countries are entitled to and shall receive from this Government the same protection of persons and property which is accorded to native-born citizens."

The nation went a step further, and for the twofold purpose of removing the rule of decision in the Dred Scott case, and of establishing a clear and comprehensive definition of citizenship, declared in the first clause of the first section of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution that—

> All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside.

Shortly afterward the Judiciary Committee of the Senate held the restricting phrase, "and subject to the jurisdiction thereof," in the amendment to exclude the Indian tribes; and the Supreme Court in the Slaughter-house cases construed it to exclude from the operation of the amendment the children of ministers, consuls, and citizens or subjects of foreign states born within the United States. We have it established, therefore, by constitutional enactment, judicially interpreted, that, first, all persons born in the United States, (except persons of the classes above named,) and secondly, all persons naturalized in the United States, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside.

Citizenship being thus fully and tersely defined in the Constitution, it cannot be necessary to repeat the definition in an act of Congress. If the definitions are synonymous, the latter cannot aid the former; but if the statutory definition contravenes the constitutional definition, the former must yield, for the latter is the supreme law of the land; hence the first ten lines of the second section of the pending bill are entirely superfluous, and should therefore be rejected. Of the remaining portion of the first clause and of the second and third clauses of the second section I shall speak hereafter. Indeed, as we are informed by the Constitution what citizenship is, it seems to me that the main scope of the pending bill should be limited to defining how citizenship may be lost, and I propose briefly to address myself to that feature of the bill. It designates four methods by either of which American citizenship may be extinguished. They are:

First. By naturalization elsewhere.

Second. By the acceptance of foreign service.

Third. By residence abroad for two years or more without registry.

Fourth. By treaty provisions concerning naturalized citizens.

The substitute offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Cox] is limited to the first and second of these methods, rejecting the others.

First. As we recognize the right of expatriation in the broadest and fullest sense, it follows that the right of every American citizen to denationalize himself by naturalization elsewhere must be unhesitatingly conceded. The individual in the exercise of a natural and inherent right of manhood may go from among us and incorporate himself in any other nation, and as soon as he does so he is an alien to us, without claim upon us or duty due us. This feature of the bill and substitute will, therefore, meet no opposition.

Second. The second class of persons to be affected are "citizens of the United States who in any foreign country enter into the civil, naval, or military service of any foreign prince or state or of any colony, district, or people foreign to the United States." The bill limits the loss of citizenship to, or rather suspends it during, the continuance of such service, whereas the substitute extinguishes citizenship altogether by the acceptance of the service. I believe the substitute to announce the correct doctrine. The "service" of any foreign power involves allegiance to such power; it is predicated upon an acknowledgment of fealty by oath or otherwise. Such allegiance and fidelity are inconsistent with the contemporaneous existence of allegiance and fidelity to any other government; the existence of the one necessarily excludes the other. Keeping in view the right of the individual to transfer his allegiance, not in part but altogether, and making it the corner-stone of my faith in this regard, I cannot admit the doctrine of a double allegiance, one present and potential, the other dormant and conditional, but as I treat American citizenship when acquired as absolute and exclusive, so I must regard American citizenship when lost as extinguished altogether. Nor is there any hardship in this view, as under the provisions of the substitute the person who by taking foreign service loses his American citizenship may regain it in the manner prescribed by law for the naturalization of aliens, and this is but carrying the idea to its logical results, namely, that the citizen, whether native-born or naturalized, may expatriate himself fully and absolutely, and having done so may be re-admitted to citizenship as an alien.

Third. Under the terms of this bill, citizens, native-born as well as naturalized, who shall be domiciled abroad continuously for two years shall not thereafter be regarded as citizens of the United States, unless they shall within that time register themselves as American citizens in the mode prescribed by the bill. Therefore, a residence abroad of two years continuously without registry works a forfeiture of citizenship.

Does this provision embody a correct principle? It is lawful for an American citizen to go abroad, and, if he secures a passport, he may be said to go with the consent of the Government, yet, if he remains abroad two years and omits to register, this bill, if it becomes a law, denationalizes him. It will be remembered that to acquire citizenship by means of naturalization it is necessary that the applicant shall have resided among us five years continuously; that he shall have declared his intention to become a citizen at least two years prior to his admission; that he shall, at the time of his admission, on oath renounce his former and assume his new allegiance, and shall, moreover, prove that he is of good moral character and is attached to the Constitution of the United States. The proceeding is in the nature of a judicial inquiry, and is entered of record in the court granting the application. Such are the conditions upon which citizenship may be acquired; yet, if an American citizen, whether native-born or naturalized, remains abroad two years and omits to register, he forfeits his citizenship by this simple act of omission. I fail to discover any just proportion between the difficulty of acquiring citizenship and the ease of losing it. In fact, this provision seems to be framed upon the idea that little value is to be attached to such citizenship, for that which is held by so frail a tenure can be of but little consequence.

Again, so far as I have been able to discover, this method of identifying the citizen when abroad, and of preserving or canceling his citizenship, is altogether novel. We have never tried it, nor do other nations employ it. We have many thousands of aliens living among us, yet the governments whose subjects they are do not "label" them after the manner here proposed. The fact that registry is not employed, although the occasion for it has existed as much heretofore as it does now, and to a greater extent even on the part of other and older nations than with us, is an indication that it has never yet commended itself to the favorable consideration of enlightened nations.

But we are told by the honorable gentleman [Mr. FAULKNER] who reported this bill from the Committee on Foreign Relations, and who is its chief advocate on this floor, that the requirement of registry is intended to apply mainly to three classes of persons, namely: to those who, having domiciled themselves in foreign countries, have carried their wealth or their talents there and have estranged themselves from us; to persons who hold fraudulent naturalization papers; and, lastly, to those who, in order to escape military duty, have made their home among us long enough to secure naturalization and have then returned to their native country to remain there the residue of their lives. It is much to be regretted that citizens living abroad escape all public duties, and it is highly desirable that a remedy should be found and applied if possible. But this bill furnishes no remedy. The man who goes abroad to shirk public duties will not hesitate to register. Indeed he will welcome the opportunity thus given to repel the presumption of national character arising from domicile and will gladly submit to the inconvenience of registering bi-annually if by so doing he secures more firmly the very immunity for which he has gone abroad. The effect, therefore, of the bill, whether so intended or not, is rather to favor absenteeism than to discountenance it.

The classes, therefore, at whom the bill is aimed will not be reached, whereas it will bear unjustly and heavily upon those who going abroad with the intention of returning shall through inadvertence or in ignorance of the law find themselves suddenly robbed of their citizenship without having acquired an equivalent elsewhere; for it does not follow that because we cast out the man who has been absent from us for two years, that any other country adopts him, and we shall thus have created a class of men who will wander over the face of the earth without any national character whatever.

But the subject is one which from its very nature we cannot regulate by statute. It belongs peculiarly and appropriately to the domain of international law—a code the scope of which we can neither enlarge nor curtail by any enactment of ours, but which in conjoint action with the nations of the world we may so develop as ultimately to reach the point we desire. In the mean time let it be regulated by treaty so as to secure us the same rights which we give. As we have large numbers of aliens in our midst, the inquiry how we may exact from them the performance of public duties, which shall in some degree compensate for the benefits of Government which they enjoy, is not without interest. To be in condition to deal with persons of this class without inviting complications, the way should be paved by treaty stipulations with the powers to whose protection they are entitled. Believing this clause of the bill to be erroneous in principle and ineffectual in practice, I shall have no hesitation in voting against it.

Fourth. The remaining class of persons who are to be deprived of citizenship by the bill are "naturalized citizens of the United States who may by the terms of any treaty be regarded as having resumed their original nationality." It will be perceived that the class of citizens here contemplated are "naturalized" citizens, not "native-born" citizens, and that the provision is that the naturalized citizen shall lose his citizenship in a contingency and for a cause that does not apply to the citizen of native birth, and a legislative sanction is asked for the inequality of rights thus recognized.

It may be asked in the first instance what need there is of declaring by statute that persons are not citizens who have lost their citizenship by treaty. As a treaty is by the Constitution part of the "supreme law of the land," its provisions are not only as effectually law as an act of Congress can make them, but the further obligation of national duty to the party contracted with is superadded, and thus their enforcement rendered doubly certain. If a naturalized citizen may by the terms of any treaty be regarded as having resumed his original nationality, he will be so regarded whether Congress passes this bill or not. As the treaty can derive no aid from the clause under consideration, and indeed needs none, this feature of the bill may well be rejected as superfluous and nugatory; and if objection to it were limited to this merely negative criticism, the further consideration of the subject might well be dismissed; but it has also a positive side, full of subtile poison, carrying with it most baneful effects. In order to reach its true meaning, it will be necessary to look at our treaty relations with some of the powers of continental Europe from whom we have received large accessions to our numbers, and for that purpose I will quote the fourth article of the treaty between the United States and North Germany, made February 28, 1868:

> If a German naturalized in America renews his residence in North Germany without the intent to return to America, he shall be held to have renounced his naturalization in the United States. Reciprocally, if an American naturalized in North Germany renews his residence in the United States without the intent to return to North Germany, he shall be held to have renounced his naturalization in North Germany. The intent not to return may be held to exist when the person naturalized in the one country resides more than two years in the other country.

And the same provision is found in the existing treaties with Bavaria, Denmark, Sweden and Norway, Würtemberg, and the Grand Duchy of Hesse.

It will be perceived that under the treaties a residence of two years does not ipso facto entail a loss of citizenship, but that such residence is but a fact from which an "intent not to return may be held to exist." The direction is not that such intent shall be held to exist, but simply that it may be held to exist, the government in whose dominion the naturalized citizen resides being vested with a discretion either to treat such residence as a renunciation of naturalization or not; and in practice but few cases have occurred in which the governments with whom these treaty relations exist have exercised the right to denationalize an American citizen unless indicia other than a bare residence of two years intervened to show an intentional renunciation of naturalization, and thus it is that, notwithstanding the treaty, a naturalized citizen may return to the country of his birth and protract his stay there very much beyond the period of two years without incurring the loss of his citizenship. But by this bill the bare fact of a two years' residence is made to work a forfeiture of citizenship; for, under the language employed, so soon as the "naturalized citizen may, by the terms of any treaty, be regarded as having resumed his original nationality," he shall cease to be an American citizen. We are no longer dealing with an option or a discretion; the language employed is not that the citizen shall be deemed lost to us whenever the power within whose jurisdiction he may be shall treat him as having renounced his naturalization; but we are confronted by an imperative injunction that so soon as he may under any treaty be regarded as having resumed his former nationality, (whether he has in fact so resumed it or not,) he shall no longer be regarded as an American citizen. The naturalized citizen is therefore inhibited by an unyielding and inflexible rule, under penalty of a forfeiture of citizenship, from residing in the land of his birth for a longer period than two years.

But to me there is another and a much graver objection to this provision of the bill. I allude again to the fact that it applies only to one class of citizens, and announces that the American by adoption is to be forsaken for a cause which does not apply to the American by birth. When this bill declares that "naturalized citizens," and they only, shall be abandoned by this Government after a residence of two years in the land of their birth, a comparison is instituted, a distinction is drawn between the native and the naturalized American; a cause found which denationalizes the one, while it does not reach the other; the right of the former is preserved, while the right of the latter is curtailed. If it be true, as the nation proclaimed on the 27th July, 1868, that "all naturalized citizens of the United States while in foreign countries are entitled to and shall receive from the Government the same protection of persons and property which is accorded to native-born citizens," then it cannot be true that a naturalized citizen forfeits his citizenship in a case in which the native-born citizen does not. If the consciousness of the nation, expressed in the Constitution, truly holds "all persons born or naturalized in the United States" to be citizens of the United States, it cannot be that a residence of two years anywhere on the face of the earth shall deprive one of citizenship where the other is permitted to retain it. Any measure therefore which recognizes a disparity of right between American citizens, denies and belies the thought of the nation as recorded in statute and Constitution.

That this disparity now exists by force of the treaties which I have mentioned I do not deny, but I insist that the legislative body of the nation shall not recognize this disparity as right in principle. To adopt this bill is to affirm that the treaties as a matter of right should be as they are. To reject it is to leave the treaties unaffected, but to preserve the principle to which the nation is committed. In making this point I must ask that the difference between what the diplomat in negotiating a treaty may concede to temporary expediency and what the law-maker may record as the solemn judgment of the nation upon a question of right shall be fully kept in view. Indeed my argument is based upon the presupposition that the distinction will be readily recognized and granted.

The law-maker cannot yield the principle; the diplomat may for the time being. The latter, in dealing with the question, finds that, while his own government holds the most advanced position, other nations concede but a partial relaxation of the ancient doctrine and still claim that naturalization elsewhere does not release a former subject who renews his residence within their jurisdiction from the performance of the duties which his original allegiance imposed. While these conflicting views are held by governments, men in great numbers, born in the one country and naturalized in the other, actuated by the manifold motives that impel human action, are clamoring for some adjustment which will enable them to return with safety, and if but for a brief period, to the homes of their childhood. In this emergency an expedient is sought and it is found in an international agreement by which the conflict of principle remains unsolved, but the necessities of the moment are measurably relieved. Regarded in this light, the adjustment secured by American diplomacy, in the treaties of which I have made mention, must be conceded to be a great triumph, securing substantial advantages to the class for whose benefit it was intended.

I am aware that these treaties have met with hostile criticism in many quarters. In Europe they are assailed upon the ground that they concede too much, whereas upon this side of the Atlantic it is claimed that they concede too little. In indulging the latter criticism it would be well to bear in mind that in reaching an adjustment dependent on mutual concession the test is not what it would be desirable to obtain, but what it is possible to get; and until the governments with whom these treaties exist can be prevailed upon to yield still more, we may congratulate ourselves upon having secured so much, trusting that at no distant day we may be permitted to go further in the right direction, as we have already done in our recent treaties with Austria and Great Britain, (1870.) But in order that we may be in condition to ask more, I deem it essential that our statute-book should contain no declaration waiving directly or inferentially the principle for which we contend. We propose to keep pace with advancing thought upon this subject. A nation of colonists, it behooves us to march in the van, not lag in the rear; and in its onward march I trust the nation may not stop to place of record a declaration inconsistent with the purpose which it proposes to accomplish.

Having thus alluded to the salient features of the bill, I shall devote the remainder of my time to its provisions concerning the national status of minors and married women. There are two classes of each of these with respect to whom the question may be raised; they are:

First. Children of alien parentage born within the United States.
Second. Children of American parentage born abroad.
And again:
First. Women having American citizenship who marry aliens.
Second. Alien women who marry American citizens.

The nations of continental Europe determine nationality primarily by descent, the child following the nationality of the parent; "and this," says an eminent authority whom I find quoted in Cockburn on Nationality, "must be acknowledged to be the right rule, seeing that nationality essentially springs from descent." The rule recognizes the family, the necessity of its control by the parent, and the ties of duty and affection which bind the child to it.

In marked contrast to this rule, England and the United States make the place of birth the sole criterion of the nationality of the person, and, notwithstanding its purely feudal origin, the rule was retained in England unimpaired until 1870, and is the law in the United States at the present day with a modification in two particulars which I shall presently name.

The conflict between these two tests of nationality leads to international disputes and controversies, often seriously threatening the peace of the world, and should be removed, so as to bring the laws of all nations into harmony upon the subject. The anomaly which ascribes a double nationality to the victim of the conflict between these tests will thus be done away with, and governments as well as individuals be relieved from embarrassments.

The place of birth is a mere accident. As a test of nationality its main value is that it constitutes a fact susceptible of ready proof. On the other hand, it is unsound in principle. We ourselves have found it improper to adhere to it with respect to the children of our citizens born abroad; England has modified it; all other states refuse to recognize it, and the foremost publicists of the world discard it.

On the 10th of February, 1855, we declared—

All children heretofore born or hereafter born out of the limits and jurisdiction of the United States, whose fathers were or may be at the time of their birth citizens thereof, to be citizens of the United States.

And as early as 1802 it was enacted as part of the naturalization laws that—

The children of persons who have been duly naturalized under any law of the United States, being under the age of twenty-one years at the time of the naturalization of their parents, shall, if dwelling in the United States, be considered as citizens thereof.

The latter provision, adopted thus early, recognizes that the minor, regardless of the place of birth, shall follow the nationality of the parent. And the act of 1855 puts us in the attitude of claiming the rule of descent, and not of birth, with respect to our own citizens resident abroad, and of denying it with respect to the citizens or subjects of other countries sojourning here; so that, if a child is born abroad whose father, at the time of its birth, is an American citizen, we claim it. If, on the other hand, a child is born here whose father, at the time of its birth, is not an American citizen, we claim it also. In the one case, we enforce the rule of descent; in the other, that of birth. And the palpable and indefensible contradiction in which we are involved seems never to have alarmed us.

In order to extend to others what we ask of them and to bring our system into harmony with that of the rest of the world, I submit that Congress should not hesitate to adopt descent as the rule in determining nationality, modifying or limiting its application, however, in view of the circumstances in which we are placed. It is a well-known fact that large numbers of aliens are domiciled among us who never become naturalized, but whose children, born upon the soil and purposing to remain permanently, become a part of our people. Under the existing test of nationality, they are American citizens, notwithstanding the alienage of the parent. Interest and convenience both dictate that as to this class of persons there should be no change in the law. Indeed, the fact that the alien parent remains permanently in the country of domicile and rears children there must be presumed conclusively to show not only an assent but an active desire on his part that the child shall have the nationality of the place of birth, for otherwise he would not remain and by remaining permit education and the associations of youth to impress upon his child a national character other than his own, and the presumption is equally conclusive that the child upon becoming of age shares that desire because gratitude, education, and early associations prompt that it should be so. In the case of this class of persons none of the complications can arise which render a change of the present rule desirable. It is only where the minor acquires a residence abroad that the conflict occurs, against which we are seeking to guard. Hence I have prepared and will in proper time submit, in lieu of the provision embraced in the second sentence of the first clause of the second section of the pending bill, the following amendment:

Children born in the United States who shall during minority become resident beyond the limits of the United States shall follow and have the citizenship of their father, and, in case of his death, of their mother. And the same rule shall apply to children born abroad of American parentage.

It is all-important that the doctrine of "double allegiance" should be done away with. I am unable to perceive how one and the same person can at the same time owe allegiance to two governments. While both may claim it, it can rightfully belong to but one. Yet until we make a change in the existing law we will constantly be exposed to entanglements of this kind.

Within a year past we have had a happy illustration of the doctrine of "double nationality." A person of foreign birth became naturalized in the United States in 1854, and while resident here and a citizen had a son born. Four years after the birth of the son the father, taking his family, including the son, with him, returned to the country of his origin, and, remaining there, re-acquired citizenship during the son's minority. Now, by the laws of all other nations except our own (including even England since 1870) the son would have followed the national status of the father. But by our law he remained an American citizen. Yet when this American citizen reached the age of twenty years he was conscripted into the army of the country in which he lived, and having claimed American protection, the highest law officer of this Government decided him to be "a native-born American citizen," and said: "There is no law of the United States under which his father or any other person can deprive him of his birthright. He can return to America at the age of twenty-one, and in due time, if the people elect, he can become President of the United States;" but also decided that the young man, in addition to his natural nationality, had an acquired nationality, and that by virtue of the latter he was rightfully conscripted. And thus it is that the future President of the United States is now bearing a Prussian musket, and is no doubt reflecting upon the value of double nationality. If he should return while the United States are engaged in a war he will be liable to be again conscripted, this time not by virtue of his acquired nationality, but by virtue of his natural nationality. If while in his present term of conscription we should happen to engage in a war with the country whose musket he bears, he is guilty of treason, for he is an American citizen bearing arms against his country. If, on the other hand, we conscript him, and engage in war with that power, he is no less guilty, because he bears arms against the country of his acquired nationality. And if the penalty of treason should be visited upon him in either country, he will have illustrated the true meaning of double nationality. His case demonstrates the absurdity of a doctrine of which it is possible to predicate such consequences.

While the Attorney-General's decision in the case alluded to is quite in accordance with what the law ought to be, and what by my amendment I submit it should be made, I cannot persuade myself that his decision is borne out by what the law is. No good reason can be assigned for a rule which in practice we have been compelled to abandon, and which, if attempted to be carried out, will lead to utterly indefensible results.

In regard to married women our legislation has been equally unfortunate, though involving far less important consequences. At the present day, in all countries except our own, a married woman is deemed to have the citizenship of her husband, her nationality on marriage being merged in his. He is the head of the family. As the exercise of political rights centers in him, the family manifests its influence in the State through him; he therefore impresses his nationality upon every member of the family. But by the laws of the United States, which in this instance again follow blindly the precept of the common law, an American woman retains her American citizenship notwithstanding her marriage to an alien; whereas by the act of February 10, 1855, an alien woman, by her marriage to a citizen of the United States, acquires the nationality of her husband. It is therefore the sense of our law that marriage does and does not confer on the wife the citizenship of the husband; and we have been content to permit it to announce this contradiction for more than twenty-one years past. The pending bill, which in this particular is a verbatim copy of the British statute of 1870, settles the principle correctly in declaring that—

A married woman shall be deemed to be a citizen or subject of the state of which her husband is for the time being a citizen or subject.

Its adoption will place us in harmony with the universal rule on the subject.

The principle that a woman may upon the termination of marriage resume her natural allegiance is also of universal recognition. And I apprehend that it is but an oversight in the bill limiting it to cases in which the marriage is terminated by the death of the husband; it should also embrace the termination of marriage by divorce, the idea being that as soon as the marriage relation ceases the woman must be at liberty to resume her former nationality.

I have but a further remark to add, and that is as to the process by which citizenship may be re-acquired by those who may have lost it by any of the methods named. Under our theory naturalization is a judicial proceeding, which, when consummated, carries with it the effect and sanction of a judgment. Such being the accepted doctrine of the country, I see no reason for deviating from it by permitting a declaration of citizenship to be filed with the Secretary of State, who is not a judicial officer, but I would vest the power in the tribunals now authorized to take proof of naturalization.

I have been compelled to dwell somewhat at length upon the leading features of the bill, and have no excuse to offer for doing so except the great importance of the subject and the sincere desire of having our law settled upon a correct and true foundation, hoping thus to eliminate its chaotic features and to bring it into unison with the accepted doctrines of the civilized world, thus evolving a law common to all nations which shall be just to individual rights and in the interest of peace between nations.

Texas Pacific Railroad.

SPEECH OF HON. E. Y. PARSONS,

OF KENTUCKY,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

June 14, 1876,

On the bill (H. R. No. 472) in relation to the Texas and Pacific Railroad.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Chairman, so much has been so ably said and written upon the subject-matter of the present bill, and so exhaustive have been the arguments advanced for and against its passage, that I undertake the discussion of its merits with hesitation; nevertheless, at the risk of a charge of repetition, feeling that the interests of the people whom I have the honor to represent are to some extent involved in this measure, I ask the indulgence of the House while I briefly state some reasons why I advocate the bill.

No measure has been brought before this Congress which should demand a more careful attention, for it comprehends the fundamental principles of our common prosperity.

Amnesty is its foundation, a liberal intercourse is its superstructure, a perfect union is its dome. Urging the construction of one of the chief elements of civilization, preserving the idea of community of interests between heretofore conflicting sections, and looking to a general prosperity in developing the wealth of the country, it may be truly denominated in its effects a trinity of production, enterprise, and union.

Roads, as a means of civilization, are unquestionably of advantage, whether they be the corduroys, causeways, turnpikes, or the steel tracks. Over them has passed the wealth of all nations. Through them, as so many great arteries, has flowed the life-blood of commerce. They are evidences of prosperity, and in their improvement a notable feature in the progress of people is exhibited.

The ancient cities of the world have been celebrated for their arts and their arms. The fame of their sculpture and their architecture has reached even unto us. Their conquests were glorious, their scholars cultured, their poets and orators, who are with us to-day, incomparable, and on the pages of history their works are emblazoned. They have erected monuments to the energy, industry, grace, love, valor, and enterprise of their respective cities.

Indebted, as we are, to their brilliant examples in literature and science for whatever of excellence we may have attained, we feel constrained to say that more enduring monuments than works of art, statuary, grouping, and painting remain for us to contemplate. The Appian Way will be remembered when the name of Cato is thought of only by the scholar, and the great roads of Rome will prove more lasting reminders of the success of her arts than the conquest of Gaul or the fame of Cæsar.

Splendid as were their achievements in arms, material improvements in the territory of conquests are better remembered than the battles of warriors, and causeways and roads are the enduring monuments to glory. Facilitating commerce, they destroy sloth in the mart; promoting intercourse, they abolish differences of opinion; and embracing sections, they establish harmony.

It is not supposed that any one would either advocate or oppose the passage of this bill from motives purely sectional; but it is earnestly thought and believed, although incidental benefit may result to certain portions, the measure itself is of advantage to the whole country. Its effect would be to restore activity to, and to re-energize to a large extent, our paralyzed industries.

But before proceeding to discuss the material points of the bill, an objection, that a subsidy is required by its provisions, may well be considered. It is urged that a democratic House cannot afford to pass any measure which even looks at such appropriations.

The doctrines of the democratic party are the only ones in whose practices safety is assured to the Government and prosperity to the States. To them I expect to yield a constant adherence, and in them I find nothing that should deter any one from giving a hearty support to any measure the result of which would be generally beneficial. If it were a debatable point, and not a concluded question by the Supreme Court of the United States, much might be said for and perhaps against the policy of lending Government aid to private corporations, and a constitutional inquiry might result. But the matters that would grow out of such discussion have all been settled, and a co-ordinate branch of this Government has recognized the progressive tendencies of the age, and from a constitutional stand-point has decided that our fundamental law does not inhibit the aid of the Government to such enterprises. It is only necessary to refer to the very recent decision in the case of the Union and Central Pacific to establish the truth of this statement. Times change and we change with them. The policies of the past age are unsuitable to the progress of the present. There is no branch of human ingenuity or industry that does not furnish proof of progressive change. The arts of both war and peace are a sufficient demonstration. Politics, dependent upon both, change with them, and a wise statesmanship takes advantage of the fact and improves the opportunity for a nation's benefit.

Time was when it might have been thought the aid of the Government toward the erection of a great national highway and the assumption of control of it would be an invasion of the rights of a State; but the Constitution is so clear upon the right of the Government to establish postal roads and to regulate commerce between the States, and so repeatedly has this been recognized, that the matter is now beyond dispute. The declaration of the law, which is held to be constitutional, giving the Government the control of rivers that run between States is equally applicable to the right claimed of supervision and control over these vast railroads. Supplanting as they do the old turnpike and in lieu of the stage-coach, furnishing magnificent trains of cars, with one continuous line from State to State, across the continent, they, in a notable measure, constitute the chief means of commercial intercourse between the States, and in connection with the postal system come directly under the authority of Congress. Viewed in this light, it is clear that legislation of this character, being both beneficial and remedial, even though the Government should be required to pay for the good which the people would receive, the people being the Government, falls within the line of precedent, and, as to its constitutionality, is res adjudicata. But, sir, we need no precedent for that which is right. Policies and precedents may be furnished in abundance; but the cry of subsidy ought not to intimidate.

The best minds, governing all nations, including our own, in their practices have demonstrated the fact that the prosperity of the country depends largely upon its roads and the facilities of intercourse between different sections, and even though subsidies and the direct aid of the state are granted, the resulting benefit to the general prosperity in their estimation has been more than sufficient to compensate for the outlay. Thus, in fostering enterprises of this kind, have they exhibited their wisdom. Another matter at the opening of this discussion may be noticed. The territory through which it is proposed to lay this road is an acquisition resulting from a war with Mexico. The discovery of gold upon the domains of a distinguished resident of that portion of the country, as an excitant to the cupidity of the American citizens, impelled large numbers of them to invade the territory in search of the modern Pactolus. The discord arising from such unwonted invasion, although it may not be considered as the whole cause of war, was, in connection with the Texas difficulties, a circumstance which contributed to increase the differences between the republics, which difficulties culminated in strife, the end of which was the treaty known as the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo. It is scarcely necessary to urge upon the attention of the House that, under the Constitution, a treaty duly ratified becomes a part of the supreme law of the land; no act of any State, either by court or legislature, can avail to invalidate the solemn compact entered into by conflicting nations. No State can set up its limited boundary against the authority conceded by the States to Congress, but in pursuance of treaty rights the authority of the Government is subject only to the revision of the judicial power of the United States.

By this treaty our Government undertook to protect all who should occupy the acquired territory. The obligation accrued the moment the treaty was signed and our banner waved in peaceful possession over the golden West. Protection does not mean the simple stationing of soldiers upon a frontier, planting a battery, or the erection of fortifications; it does not mean simply immunity from outrage by reason of the proud flag that floats above us, or the stalwart arm, the hissing shell, the loud-mouthed cannon, or the rattling musket; but it means peace as well as war, and the employment of all the remedial agencies necessary to restore a devastated country and to open up the avenues to prosperity and to wealth. To keep off injury violently menaced, and to furnish every facility to maintain private prosperity, together constitute protection. Obligated as we are by the treaty referred to, and pledged as we are in national faith to a strict adherence to its terms, together with the implications involved in them, how can we consistently refuse as States, and as a people, by every means in our power to maintain and to advance the prosperity of the annexed section?

This bill does not in any sense require a subsidy of the United States, but, on the contrary, constitutional as such a requisition is, in the light of recent decisions, it proposes to indemnify the United States for its guarantee by yielding to its almost uncontrolled possession a rich extent of land granted to the corporation by the State of Texas and to assure by further pledge, not only of the lands granted by the United States, but of all the earnings of the road, utter freedom from loss upon the proposed contract; furthermore, the indorsement of the Government by the express stipulation of the bill is not to be given, or rather, the bonds of the Government are not to be issued until the United States authorities are assured that a sufficient extent of the road to be paid for by the bond in the shape of advanced interest has been constructed, and that assurance is to be given by accredited officers of the Government. Never in the history of railroad construction has there been such a fair offer to our authorities to aid by credit simply in conferring a lasting benefit upon a prostrate section and to promote the material prosperity of the whole country. An additional feature in this bill may deserve comment. With very slight restriction, if any at all, the road is placed in the hands of the Government. The rates of transportation and of freight being exclusively in the control of Congress, thus render it utterly impossible for combinations to be made by which the passenger or the shipper would suffer extortion. All connecting roads are bound by the same stipulation, and as this grand transcontinental line will undoubtedly invite a large portion of the commerce of the East as well as the West, there is a constant assurance in this feature of a permanency of rates for freight and transportation.

The incalculable benefit resulting to the business world from such an arrangement would in itself be an insuperable argument for the passage of this bill. But as to the Government, there is another reason—and by the Government I mean the whole people of the United States, who pay the taxes and carry on the machinery of public affairs—and that is the free transportation of troops and supplies as well as the postal service. It is well known to gentlemen upon this floor, and is certainly matter of record open to the inspection of any one, that annually large amounts of money have been expended without any adequate return for the transportation of troops and supplies for the Indian country and to the Texas frontier; not as many, perhaps, in the latter instance as were necessary to protect that State from its unhappy troubles and the incursions of refractory neighbors, but still enough to constitute an item in the general bill of expenditures for the national defense.

The saving in the postal arrangements and service of the Government, although all matters mentioned are not absolutely free, constitute, with the others, an item in this, that all such service, as well as that just referred to, is to be rendered to the Government by this road practically free of charge. In other words, the Government will have, under the provisions of this bill, the right to free transportation of troops, supplies, and mails, until the interest for which the bonds are indorsed shall be paid into the national Treasury.

I do not give the statements of expenditures borne by the people in each of these branches of public service and defense, as statistics so complete have been published upon the subject, and as they are well known and understood; but there is assurance for saying that the saving to the Government—rates being under our control—will be large indeed, until all of the liability of the Government by reason of the bonds is discharged.

It is a well-known fact that a combination of causes, unnecessary to mention to the enlightened gentlemen who hear me, has resulted in depressing to a large extent the laborers of the country, and has thrown them out of employment. Thousands upon thousands of them to-day are almost without bread. Desolation sits brooding at their hearth-stones. Despair hovers over their roof. Starvation is their unwelcome guest. It is not to be wondered at, in view of their great sufferings, that the laboring-men of the country have been driven to the extreme even of arms to compel a sustenance which dearth of labor, prostrate industry, and hoarded capital refused. The wisdom of the Government can never be better exhibited than by the adoption of such legislative measures as not only protect the citizen in his rights, but afford every opportunity to the laboring classes for the exercise of their industry, thereby insuring their prosperity and consequent happiness and discharging the duty of a proper Government, which is to do the greatest good to the largest number. The laborers constitute by far the majority of the population. Capitalists, jobbers, and clerks, customs officers, and professional men combined, do not number the men whose toughened sinews have heretofore fought the battles and wrought the prosperity of the nation. To that class of people, worthy as they are, and as will doubtless be admitted, necessary to the advancement of the material interests of the country, due consideration should be given. If in their success they labored well, and that they did our mechanical and agricultural industries and arts are a fair evidence, in their misfortune it should be the wisdom of an enlightened policy, as far as possible, to relieve distress and to prevent calamity from overwhelming this class of our population.

How to achieve so desirable an end is an interesting problem, to solve which, considered in the light of financial and other difficulties which surround the administration of public affairs, is hard indeed. Yet it may be suggested, if not as a solution, at least as a measure which makes a figure in that result, that the adoption of this bill will afford to the laborers of the country an opportunity for the exercise of their industries, and it might be for the accumulation of property. Not only in one branch, which is the mere construction of the road, would the facilities for labor be increased, but in the vast iron industries of the country, which would be immediately called upon to furnish the iron and steel necessary for track construction. Forges that are now idle would be busy. Mechanics who are now without occupation would have suddenly restored to them the means of subsistence and probable prosperity. A new ambition would energize our laboring force, and with the compensation which is the meed of earnest effort would awake a spirit of progress, which, taking care of the present, still points to the future. It has been said, "Westward the course of empire takes its way." History proves it, and the assertion has all the force of a maxim. The foundation of empire is labor, and while the valor of the soldier may protect, the industry of the artisan builds and finishes. The pickax and the shovel have been, perhaps, of more advantage to the prosperity of this country than the sword. Giving to them, then, the opportunity which this bill affords for honest labor, local difficulties will disappear, and to a large extent the unemployed will receive employment, and riot, rout, and disorder all cease.

If there be one question which more than another is of vital interest to the American people at this juncture, it is the question of finance. With a country of almost exhaustless wealth; with a population eager to work; with unexplored resources and unused energies that are vast, we find ourselves some years after the close of a great civil commotion an embarrassed people. Many schemes have been suggested by gentlemen distinguished alike for their integrity and their intelligence, and put forth in an honest attempt to give relief to the money pressure of the South and West, and to settle if possible the financial matters of the country; but it seems that while contributing to the desired end no satisfactory result has been reached. Without pretending even so much as to suggest a line of policy in a matter which has puzzled the most acute intellects of the nation, I may urge upon the consideration of the House some facts in connection with this subject which I do not think will be disputed. Should this bill become a law, as has been before stated, a considerable amount of labor will be necessary. To pay that labor large sums of money will be required. Capital always seeks its most profitable investment. It neither rises nor sinks below its level, but commands its price.

Let the Government but comply with the provisions of this bill, by guaranteeing the payment of the interest under the stipulated restrictions, and scarcely a week will elapse after final approval before an army of laborers will be steadily at work on the proposed route, and the locked-up money of the East find free circulation. The East has controlled the money market, so to speak, of the whole country for a period of time. A system of financiering was adopted years ago which, however honestly intended, has proved extremely injurious to the best interests of the largest portion of the country. Our money became the subject of barter and sale, and from being a standard of value degenerated, under the practices then instituted and continued until now, into an article of commerce, to be bought and sold. In these speculations, by reason of superior advantages in offices and the disturbed condition of the West and South, the East became the recipient of nearly all the money of the United States; and it has since been hoarded. The consequence has been a depression in the business affairs of the South and West to an extent almost incalculable. With no medium of circulation in a comparative sense, or rather with no money to pay, they could neither buy and sell goods nor till the soil. The consequence was complete stagnation and prostration of every material industry. That state of things has continued until now; and while it may not be an absolute relief in this sense, the construction of this road, inviting, nay, almost compelling the capital of the East to unite with the South and West, would certainly contribute to the common prosperity by forcing money to its legitimate and proper union, which is with labor, and it may be safely said that not only our own but foreign capital would eagerly seek so profitable an investment.

The country through which this road will pass is not only peculiarly adapted to the continuous and uninterrupted transit across the continent, but is also rich in production. Free from the snows of the North, and lavishly blest by the bountiful hand of the Creator with all that is necessary for the wants and the luxuries of man, it offers an abundant opportunity for the increase of our agricultural interest, and mother earth, while giving us the corn, the wine, and the oil, is no less generous in that favored section in other industries, and from her open bosom she pours into our lap her vast mineral resources; her iron of commerce, her silver of trade, her gold of value.

The objections urged by some as to this proposed route being not feasible by reason of natural obstacles in the way are answered by the fact that in one notable instance obstacles of much greater magnitude have been overcome, and now one continuous line in the northern portion of the country exists. The patient and untiring skill of the engineer has been able to surmount these obstacles, and the ascending grade or lengthened tunnel furnished him the ready means of scaling the cloud-capped mountain or piercing its base. The ruggedness of the country serves but as an incentive to genius, and as the mathematical mind marks the line of transit across the lofty Sierras, the eye rests on "a grand animated spectacle of nature," with alternate hill and vale, pure streams, rich table-land, and wide-extended plain—a scene the promise of the future, when patient toil shall plant in the virgin soil and reap the rich reward of a full harvest, while steady contemplation opens those hills, "rock-ribbed and ancient as the sun," and in their strong embrace views more of wealth than was ever contained in the glittering caves of Golconda or Peru. Through this magnificent country, rich in all that pertains to material prosperity as well as beauty of landscape, it is proposed to run this road. One may well conceive what would be the immense advantage to the whole people of the United States in the matter of commerce as well as in the promotion of civilization by the advancement of this enterprise. As the road is gradually extended its progress will be attended with the usual concomitants, and in that rich country in a larger degree, owing to the depression of business and the distress of labor. The desert places will be made to blossom as the rose, the wilderness will be redeemed, and the fields yield their bounteous return to the patient hand of labor. For the cry of the panther, there will be the low of cattle; for the growl of the bear, the peaceful call of the plow-boy; for the silence of the wilderness, the busy hum of industry and art; and for the war-whoop of the savage, the "sound of the church-going bell;" while a whole section, energized, yea brought to life by reason of this great project, with silent voice joins in the pean of praise. Villages, towns, and cities will mark the places where desolation now reigns, and give their aid to the promotion of the prosperity of the whole country.

But this is not all. This vast road that, connecting the Atlantic with the Pacific and furnishing a ready facility for the transportation of home products to all sections, has yet another advantage to which it may be proper to allude. Across the peaceful bosom of the Pacific come ships from the East laden with the products of oriental industry. The islands of the sea send their mite to swell our commerce. Through a continuous line, uninterrupted by stress of weather, inducements could be offered for an increase of this commerce which would doubtless be entertained, and which would result in almost a perfect union of the business enterprises of the East and West. It is scarcely necessary to refer to the incalculable benefits which would accrue to all sections from this character of commerce. The road being a great public necessity, and its construction being a matter of time only, it may be properly said that now is the accepted time.

But it is urged that the impoverished condition of our national finances will not permit the assumption of liabilities even to the limited extent which is here asked, and that the Government would be doing a great wrong to its citizens to incur the risk of so large an expenditure as the guaranteed interest upon the bonds issuable under this act. With the promise, which cannot be disputed, that no private corporation or set of men can be found with sufficient capital and public spirit combined to carry out so great an enterprise, and that without governmental indorsement, against liability on which ample security is provided for in this bill, the road cannot be built, attention may be called to the fact that the national exchequer without distress to-day pays large sums for the support of similar enterprises, and the public domain yields largely of its territory for their maintenance. The cry of poverty ought not to be heard, or, if listened to at all, it should bring up before the mind thoughts which ought to die, reminiscences which should fade from memory, and acts which should be blotted from the page of history. At present we behold this anomaly in Government: One section of a common country prosperous, the other impoverished. The strong arm of protection and fostering care extended over the one, while the other, with a heavy burden of taxation and large payment to the revenues of the country, is without aid and suffered to languish. To those who say poverty, the answering voice of justice and equality may be lifted. A Government that was able with one stroke of the pen to destroy millions and by a single proclamation to disorganize an entire labor system; that, with the torch, could overwhelm in general conflagration cities and towns; that, with the raider, could trample down the growing grain and render vain the promise of a harvest, and, at the close, exact full payment and discharge of the very expenses incurred by itself in a war of subjugation, can certainly afford, being in possession of the spoils of conquest, after doing so much to destroy, to do some little to rebuild and to obliterate the traces of wrath and desolation which so vividly recall to memory the scenes and incidents of the most painful period of our history.

I am surprised that a determined opposition to this measure comes from certain sections where railroad facilities are great and their value certainly known. Not only for these reasons, sir, do I express this surprise, but for the further fact that, to a great extent, the very roads upon which their prosperity is to-day founded were built by subsidy, and, while the sections themselves may not have received direct return in revenue to the local treasury, the munificent land grants which first encouraged the enterprise procured for them an industrious population whose settlements have since grown into towns and cities and whose agricultural and mechanical industries have swelled the aggregate wealth and increased the general prosperity of their States. It certainly comes with an ill-grace from those whose sections have been benefited so greatly by state practices similar to this now sought to object even upon the ground of subsidy or of former failures of direct return of money expended. The efforts of their statesmen whose far-seeing wisdom inaugurated the policy of state aid in building up these immense lines of commerce, successful as they have been, are the best argument that can be used against their objections.

It may be that some idea of monopoly has taken possession of them, and, with a view to restrict trade coming from the extreme West to their own lines and routes, they oppose the construction of this road; that they are unwilling that there should be any competition in the transportation of freight and passengers to and fro across the continent, but that the people shall be subjected for their benefit to uncontrolled charges. I hope that I err in this, and I trust the gentlemen who are so earnest in opposition to this measure will reconsider, and, while they estimate the advantages derived from the connecting lines from the Atlantic to the Pacific in their own States, they will be sufficiently generous to say that the same advantages should be given to those who have not heretofore been so favored, and in a section which, from every consideration of commerce, production, and enterprise, so manifestly requires development.

If there be any sincerity in the oft-repeated asseverations made upon this floor during the present session of Congress that the disposition of the people is to forget past differences and in the practices of friendship and patriotism to perfect the Union of the States and if it be true that a general amnesty is desired, it may be said that in the construction of this road as proposed an important step will be taken in the direction of the consummation wished. The North, the East, the West, and the South will join not only in the profitable embrace of commerce, but in that intercourse which, familiarizing each with all, strengthens the bond which now unites them and verifies the assertion of peace and good-will. From the Atlantic to the Pacific and from the gulf to the lakes the effect of this great highway will be felt and its advantages realized. No better period can be imagined than the present for the encouragement of sentiments of union and no more fitting monument can be erected to mark the complete reconciliation of the sections.

Let the road be constructed as proposed by the bill, not with the funds of a gigantic monopoly or upon any compromise measure, nor yet at the absolute expense of the Government, but remaining under the governmental control as to rates, and freights and cheap transportation and rapid communication between the extremes of our country will be the result.

What more could be asked in a business point of view?

But, sir, the measure seems to me to be one which will not only confer lasting benefit upon the whole country in its various industries, but will contribute largely to the redemption from utter financial prostration of the largest portion of the country. It will revivify the South, energize the fainting body, and, as the blood of commerce flows through her depleted veins, industry and activity will gradually resume control, and a grateful prosperity will yield to all sections the tribute of a generous return. Revenues will be increased, and that region, now impoverished and sad, will be made happy in the enjoyment of wealth and enterprise.

Without causing statistics to be read, which have already been published and doubtless fully understood, I may say, finally, that for these reasons I advocate the passage of the bill: First. The immense advantage to the whole country by cheapening transportation and freight and relieving financial pressure. Second. The utter absence of anything like subsidy in the provisions of the bill. Third. The impossibility of combination against the passenger or shipper as to rates, the Government retaining control. Fourth. The discharge of treaty obligation, which is imperative law. Fifth. The profit to the Government in transportation of troops and supplies, and almost free postal service. Sixth. The increase of the mineral industries of the country and the large addition to our agricultural products. Seventh. The relief given to the laborers of the country, who will not only obtain employment, but, perhaps, wealth in the prosecution of the enterprise; and last, but not least, the adoption of this measure will not only be just but generous to a devastated section and a sure proof of sincerity upon the part of all whose protestations evince a desire for peace and harmony and a complete reconciliation.

The Tariff.

SPEECH OF HON. W. TOWNSEND,

OF PENNSYLVANIA.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

June 10, 1876,

On the bill (H. R. No. 3132) to revise and simplify existing laws imposing duties on imports and to reduce taxation.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, at a time like this, when many of the industries of the country are still suffering from the panic of 1873; when the iron and cotton and woolen mills are running on short time and with reduced forces; when workmen are yet standing around the streets of manufacturing villages unemployed and awaiting a revival of business to enable them to make a comfortable provision for their households, it is amazing that a committee of Congress should report favorably a bill whose certain influence would cause a still greater depression of manufactures.

The bill reported by the distinguished chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. MORRISON, of Illinois,] makes such an important reduction of duties on articles that we can manufacture at home, being 20 to 50 per cent. reduction, that if it should become a law it would open our ports to a flood of foreign commodities and deluge our marts with the scrapings of European warehouses.

As it stands to-day in the House, only partially acted on and with a hesitation on the part of the chairman to state positively whether or not he proposes to ask the House to take action on it, it is a standing menace to some of the most important industries of the country, and capitalists engaged in the glass, iron, cotton, woolen, and many other manufactures stand comparatively idle, afraid to make contracts lest the new tariff bill should become a law and prevent them from fulfilling their engagements. It hangs threateningly over them, apparently ready to fall and crush their industries, like the sword of Damocles, suspended by a single hair. It is another instance of that uncertainty of our national legislation, which is the great annoyance of business men of whatever character, and which periodically paralyzes the most valuable and most cherished industries of the nation. If our people could be certain of the steady maintenance of our legislation for a series of years, even if it were not of the most favorable character, they could accommodate themselves to it, and by ingenuity and skill and by perfecting their machinery, could render themselves and the nation prosperous.

Unfortunately, however, our legislation, whether concerning the tariff or currency, the public lands or the postal system, is vacillating and wavering, and capitalists hesitate to embark in enterprises that, under a more steady policy, they would readily undertake.

It is too true, as the gentleman from Illinois remarks in his opening sentences of his carefully prepared speech, advocating his bill, to which I listened with attention, that if it should become a law, "it will necessarily affect the trade, commerce, and industry of the whole country," and he might, in my judgment, have added "most disastrously, too."

I agree with him that "a measure of such magnitude ought to receive the most earnest and thoughtful consideration."

He is a believer in the system of direct taxation, saying, "though impracticable now to resort to it, that system is best because most equal which takes from the tax-payer his due proportion in the most direct manner." Such a system we were compelled to use during and after the late rebellion, with its horde of assessors, collectors, and their respective assistants and other officials, until the people would not permit the system to continue, but abolished it all save that small remnant which remains to collect duties on whisky, tobacco, and other minor articles.

With the disciples of free-trade clubs, and echoing the oft-refuted doctrines of free-trade writers, he asserts that "protection, therefore, other than that incidental to revenue, is spoliation, because it takes the earnings of the labor of one person or class of persons, and gives these earnings to other persons or more favored classes."

Under his view of the case, he, with all other Congressmen, is guilty of obtaining the same kind of benefits of which he complains of manufacturers for receiving, for the Government takes from the earnings of the people and pays his salary as a member of Congress therewith. It may be said that he renders an equivalent therefor, but the same answer is equally applicable to the manufacturer. Indeed, it may be more justly said that the manufacturer renders a greater equivalent, for under protective tariffs he has reduced the price of foreign commodities to the consumer, which had to come into competition with his own. In common with other free-trade writers he also hesitates not to assert that "the cost of all domestic products is therefore increased by the imposition of tariff taxes on foreign imports."

As a protective tariff is called by a large portion of the democratic party "spoliation" and by another portion "robbery," I desire to read a few brief extracts from the writings of the fathers of the Republic to show in what esteem the protective principle was held by them. They had suffered under the taxation of the mother-country; they had been denied the privilege of contributing to their own necessities by the labor of their hands and the ingenuity of their intellects, and of them it was said by their rulers "they should not make a hobnail."

After the independence of the colonies was secured the confederation was on the eve of dissolution because of a want of power to secure equal commercial rights to the colonies because of their diverse and antagonistic legislation. As soon as the Constitution was adopted, Madison brought before Congress a bill wherein the preamble set forth that "whereas it is necessary for the support of Government, for the discharge of the debts of the United States, and for the encouragement and protection of manufactures, that duties be laid on goods, wares, and merchandise imported, be it enacted," &c.

Washington signed the bill on the 4th of July, 1789.

Here, then, at the very dawn of our constitutional Government was a distinct and emphatic annunciation and affirmance of the principle of protection.

Following down the line of Presidents we find in their messages and other writings the same principle fully and unhesitatingly maintained, for they had not as yet found out the new-fangled democratic doctrine that protection was "robbery."

Washington, in one of his messages, said:

The advancement of agriculture, commerce, and manufactures by all proper means will not, I trust, need recommendation; but I cannot forbear intimating to you the expediency of giving effectual encouragement as well to the introduction of new and useful inventions from abroad as to the exertions of skill and genius in producing them at home.

In Jefferson's second annual message, he recommends protection in the following words:

To cultivate peace and maintain commerce and navigation in all their lawful enterprises as nurseries of navigation and for the nurture of man, and to protect the manufactures adapted to our circumstances, these, fellow-citizens, are the landmarks by which we are to guide ourselves in all our proceedings.

In his eighth annual message he recommends not only protection but prohibition, in this language, namely:

The situation into which we have been forced has impelled us to apply a portion of our industry and capital to national manufactures and improvements. The extent of conversion is daily increasing and little doubt remains that the establishments formed and forming will, under the auspices of cheaper materials and subsistence, the freedom of labor from taxation with us, and of protecting duties and prohibitions, become permanent.

In his letter to Benjamin Austin, in 1816, he sets forth his belief in the necessity of encouraging domestic manufactures, thus:

He, therefore, who is now against domestic manufactures must be for reducing us either to a dependence upon that nation or be clothed in skins and live like wild beasts in dens and caverns. I am proud to say that I am not one of these. Experience has taught me that manufactures are now as necessary to our independence as to our comfort.

Madison, too, in his message of 1809, adopting the sentiments of Jefferson on the subject of protection, said, in speaking of the duty of Congress:

It will be worthy at the same time, of their just and provident care, to make such further alterations in the laws as will more especially protect and foster the several branches of manufacture which have been recently instituted by the laudable exertion of our citizens.

Monroe, in his inaugural address, shows the value of protection to manufactures to the producers of raw materials. He says:

Our manufactures will likewise require the systematic and fostering care of the Government. Possessing as we do all the raw materials, the fruit of our own soil and industry, we ought not to depend in the degree we have done on supplies from other countries. * * * Equally important is it to provide at home a market for our raw materials, as by extending the competition it will enhance the price and protect the cultivator against the casualties incident to foreign markets.

Probably the strongest enunciation of the necessity for the encouragement of American manufactures and the doctrine of protection so much denounced by modern democrats is to be found in General Jackson's letter to Dr. Coleman in 1824, and in his second annual message in 1830.

In the former, which may be found in Parton's Life of Jackson, volume 3, page 35, from which I read, he shows, among other things, the value of manufactures to the farmer. After speaking of the vast amount of raw material we possess, he says:

Draw from agriculture its superabundant labor; employ it in mechanism and manufactures, thereby creating a home market for your breadstuffs, distributing labor to the most profitable account, and benefits to the country will result. Take from agriculture in the United States 600,000 men, women, and children, and you will at once give a market for more breadstuffs than all Europe now furnishes us with. In short, we have been too long subject to the policy of British merchants. It is time we should become a little more Americanized, and, instead of feeding paupers and laborers of England, feed our own, or else in a short time, by continuing our present policy, we shall be paupers ourselves.

In the message he lays down the doctrine of protection thus, and it is worthy of the most serious attention:

The power to impose duties upon imports originally belonged to the several States. The right to adjust these duties, with a view to the encouragement of domestic branches of industry, is so completely identical with that power that it is difficult to suppose the existence of the one without the other.

The States have delegated their whole authority over imports to the General Government, without limitation or restriction, saving the very inconsiderable reservation relating to the inspection laws. This authority having thus passed from the States, the right to exercise it for the purpose of protection does not exist in them; and, consequently, if it be not possessed by the General Government, it must be extinct.

Our political system would thus present the anomaly of a people stripped of the right to foster their own industry and to counteract the most selfish and destructive policy which might be adopted by foreign nations.

This surely cannot be the case; this indispensable power thus surrendered by the States must be within the scope of authority on the subject expressly delegated to Congress. In this conclusion I am confirmed as well by the opinions of Presidents Washington, Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe, who have each repeatedly recommended this right under the Constitution, as by the uniform practice of Congress, the continued acquiescence of the States, and the general understanding of the people.

The Society of Tammany, in its purer days and before it had become a mere political club, was in 1819 exceedingly patriotic, and recommended to the societies of the order the propriety "of refraining from every species of useless extravagance in our mode of living, especially in furniture, dress, the table, ostentatious equipage, and expensive amusements."

It also

Resolved, That we will discountenance the importation and use in our families of every species of foreign manufacture or production which can or may be reasonably substituted by the fabrics or productions of the United States.

These are rather amusing sentiments when read with the recollections of the "useless extravagance" and "ostentatious equipages" of Tweed, Connolly, and other sachems of Tammany fresh in our minds. Yet it will show that the leaders of the New York democracy were at one time in favor of the encouragement of American industry, even to the extent of avoiding the use of all foreign manufactures.

I might add sentiments to the same effect, of statesmen of later times, such as Clay, Webster, Niles, Benton, Van Buren, Carey, Baird, and the late democratic candidate for president, Horace Greely, but time will not allow.

I have read these extracts to show that in the earlier and better days of the Republic its leading statesmen were unreservedly in favor of the doctrine of protection to American manufactures, and that among them Jefferson was even in favor of actual prohibition.

The theory that a protective tariff is "spoliation" and "robbery" is of more modern origin.

Southern statesmen could not but see that under the higher duties of the tariff of 1824 the Northern States were increasing their wealth and prosperity, arising from the preference given to them in the home market by that tariff, and that the diversified industries encouraged thereby were rapidly diffusing an enlarged prosperity among all classes of northern people.

Confining themselves to the cultivation of four staples only, cotton, rice, sugar, and tobacco, and depending much on a foreign market for the first-named, their industrial progress was not so rapid as that of their enterprising northern neighbors, and they imbibed the idea, which was encouraged by their statesmen, that the tariff, while enriching the North, was impoverishing them.

Hence arose the tariff agitation of 1832-'33, which ended in a compromise tariff of a descending grade of duties which ran down to the low figure of about 20 per cent. in 1842. It had in the mean time done its pernicious work, for it had let in a flood of foreign goods and shut up our manufactories and workshops and given the control of our market to the operatives of Europe. Cheaper labor and cheaper and more abundant foreign capital were too potent to be resisted by the dearer labor and scantier capital of our country.

Here were visibly and painfully shown the evils arising from the abandonment of the Jeffersonian and Jacksonian doctrines of protection.

A whig Congress, however, in 1842, by a more protective tariff, snatched the country from the brink of ruin. It was framed on the principles enunciated by the fathers, and as if by magic wrought a wonderful change. It opened the cotton and woolen manufactories, it lighted the fires in the furnaces and forges, it gave to the farmer a better market for his produce, and in a short time by internal competition it lowered the prices of textile fabrics and of iron far below those which had been imposed on us when English manufacturers had obtained control of our market.

So beneficial was it, and so encouraging to our industries, and withal so popular, that when the presidential campaign of 1844 was in progress the democratic party availed themselves of its popularity and emblazoned on their banners the hypocritical political war cry of "Polk, Dallas, and the tariff of 1842." They knew it was acceptable to the masses, and claimed for their candidate Polk that he was "a better tariff man than Henry Clay."

Having by that sign conquered, they were not long in throwing off the mask, and with it renouncing the old-fashioned patriotic American doctrines of protection to our people, and signalized their hypocrisy in the Walker tariff of 1846, reducing the average rates of duty about 25 per cent., or, according to the statement of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. MORRISON,] from an average of 32¼ per cent. to 24 per cent. Not content with the prostration this reduction caused, in 1857 they reduced it to an average of about 19 per cent., at which figure it substantially remained until the advent of a republican administration in 1861.

These free-trade tariffs in the mean time had done their perfect work. They had prostrated business, closed manufactories, discharged workmen, embarrassed the Government, and occasioned general distress. So low had they run the revenues of the Government that the closing months of James Buchanan's administration revealed an empty Treasury, and a credit so bad that his Secretary of the Treasury could not obtain the trifling loan of $10,000,000 on better terms than $90 for a hundred-dollar bond.

Democratic free trade and low duties had brought us down to that humiliating condition, and although the national debt was but $90,000,000, our credit was 10 per cent. below par. To-day, with a debt of $2,103,000,000, the credit of the nation, under republican management, is 22 per cent. above par, and its bonds eagerly sought in all the money markets of the world.

Now, Mr. Speaker, having shown that the best men of the early days of the Republic strongly favored the protective policy, and that a departure from it in the low tariffs of democratic administrations brought on national distress, I desire to say a few words explanatory of the operation of a protective tariff. By the word "protection" I do not mean that the goods of foreign nations should be entirely excluded from our ports, but I mean that such duties should be laid upon imports as will put our people, who pay high rates of interest and high wages, on an equality with those nations where money is plenty, interest cheap, and wages low. It is a well-known fact that interest in this country averages from 6 to 7 per cent. per annum, while in France and England 3 to 4 per cent. is considered a fair return for the use of money. Thus, in the first place, the European manufacturer can hire twice as much money by the year as the American operator can for an equal amount of interest.

As to the wages of labor, the English manufacturer has a similar advantage over the American.

From that excellent and carefully prepared work recently published by Mr. Edward Young, chief of the Bureau of Statistics, entitled Labor in Europe and America, I obtain the following statement of weekly wages paid to similar classes of operatives in England and the United States:

Statement of weekly wages in rolling-mills, 1874.

Workmen.	Pennsylvania.	Middleborough, England.
Puddlers	$21 15	$10 50
Top and bottom rollers	27 50	6 05
Rail-mill rollers	40 00	21 05
Merchant-mill rollers	36 83	12 10
Machinists	15 56	8 59
Engineers	15 24	8 47
Laborers	8 58	4 65
Blacksmiths	13 49	6 00
Iron-molders	14 00	6 77
Pattern-makers	14 69	7 01

Statement of weekly wages in ship-building, 1874.

Workmen.	Cramp & Sons, Philadelphia.	John Elder & Co., Glasgow, Scotland.
Machinists, best	$18 00	$7 50
Machinists, ordinary	15 00	6 70
Pattern-makers	16 50	7 72
Engine-fitters	16 00	6 88
Blacksmiths	16 50	7 26
Riveters and calkers	13 50	7 00
Fitters	17 00	7 18
Laborers	9 00	4 10
Carters	10 00	5 80

Statement of weekly wages in cotton works.

Workmen.	Pennsylvania.	Manchester, England.
Carding:
Overseer	$15 25	$10 89
Drawing-frame tenders	4 20	2 66
Speeder tenders	4 72	3 14
Grinders	7 25	5 32
Strippers	7 92	5 32
Spinning:
Overseer	15 25	14 52

Statement of weekly wages in woolen mills.

Workmen.	General average of the woolen mills of the United States.	Dewsbury, England.
Wool-sorters	$10 94	$6 29
Wool-washers	8 21	4 36
Dyers	10 50	5 08
Spinners	8 85	7 26
Warpers and beamers	8 81	5 08
Weavers	7 41	4 84
Burlers	4 98	2 96
Dressers, or giggers	8 11	4 84
Press-tenders	8 91	5 32

The proportion is much the same in all other classes of mechanical industry.

From this it will be seen that the American manufacturer pays about 100 per cent. more for the use of capital and the hire of labor than the English manufacturer does. In some of the continental cities the wages are much lower.

It would be in vain for the American manufacturer to strive against such odds without some protection, and if free trade should prevail, our manufactories would close, our workmen be turned adrift to enter into competition with the farmer, and our country would be impoverished to pay for the commodities imported from abroad.

The earlier statesmen of the Republic understood and appreciated all this, and hence it was that they advocated protective tariffs, and even went so far as to suggest a prohibition to the importation of those articles which we can manufacture at home.

To place our people, therefore, at a less disadvantage than they would be under free trade, it has been the policy of the Government under patriotic administrations, while laying a tariff from which to derive revenue, so to adjust it as to give to our manufacturers a fair and equal chance (and they have never asked more) with foreign manufacturers, the difference in the hire of capital and labor being considered. Such a tariff is due from the Government to the citizen as fully as allegiance and service are due from the citizen to the Government, and yet it has not been fixed at as high figures as the case might warrant; for while American labor and capital are twice as dear as European labor and capital, our duties have only ranged from 20 to 50 per cent. on those articles of imported manufacture which compete with us and which we might as readily manufacture here. To make up the difference against us, we have had to rely on the superior skill and ingenuity of our workmen and improved machinery, and this difference has been a great spur to our inventive faculties.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] says:

Conceding the right of labor to its earnings and the right of property, it is difficult to see how the freedom of exchange of either, how the right of the citizen to buy, sell, and exchange may be interfered with and taxed in the interest of and for the protection of other and more favored classes of citizens.

Protection therefore, other than that incidental to revenue, is spoliation, because it takes the earnings of labor of one person or class of persons and gives these earnings to other persons or more favored classes.

He also says, as I have stated before:

That the cost of all domestic products is therefore increased by the imposition of tariff taxes on foreign imports.

These three sentences contain the whole shibboleth of modern democracy, which declares therefore that—

First. Free trade is right and proper for this country;

Second. That a tariff should be laid for revenue only; and Third. That protection is spoliation, meaning robbery, of the consumer of protected manufactured articles for the benefit of the manufacturer, and that the cost of all domestic products is enhanced by a duty on imports.

In all these propositions the old-time democracy, such as Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, and Jackson were so unfortunate as to differ with the new-light democracy, for they saw the necessity of protection for the sake of protection, and advocated it in their messages and other writings, as I have already shown.

The gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. MORRISON,] in order to show the value of free trade in England, quotes with commendation from Noble's History of Fiscal Legislation, as follows:

It has been shown upon unquestionable evidence that the policy of free trade, which it was confidently predicted would ruin agriculture, annihilate rent, destroy manufactures, pauperize labor, and render impossible the collection of the national revenue, has rendered agriculture prosperous, largely augmented rent, vastly extended manufactures and employment, increased the wages of labor, and while securing the collection of an increased revenue, has by improving the value of property lessened the burdens of taxation.

If all this be true under the free-trade policy of England, then her people ought to be better off than the spoliated and robbed people of the United States. A nation's true prosperity is best shown in the condition of the masses, in the equal diffusion of wealth, and not in the poverty of the many and the aggrandizement of the few.

If we then compare the situation of the great body of the people in Great Britain and in the United States, we do not find the condition of things as roseate as Mr. Noble states. Let us see. Peel's system of free trade began in 1842 or 1843; it was enlarged gradually by taking off duties from time to time until it reached its present status about 1860, leaving only about twenty-six kinds of articles dutiable.

In 1860 the number of paupers in England was 851,000, in 1865 it was 971,433, in 1871 it was 1,081,926, thus increasing during all that period of free trade. It has since decreased somewhat.

The population of free trade England and Wales in 1871 was, as is set down in Whitaker's Almanac, 22,712,266 and the paupers at the figures I have just stated, being 1 pauper to every 21 persons, or nearly 5 per cent. of the whole population; and which are supported by the English nation at a cost of about $75 per head, or $81,000,000.

On the other hand, the late census of 1870 shows that in protectionist United States the population was 38,558,371 and the paupers for that year were only 116,102, or one in every 332 persons or three-tenths of 1 per cent. of the whole, and supported at an annual expense of $10,930,429, being about $94 per head, or fifteen times as many paupers in England in proportion to the population as there are in the United States, and what is more remarkable is that the most of these English paupers are to be found in the unprotected manufacturing counties.

Hence it is, unfortunately too true, as admitted by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] in his speech, that "the consuming power of the masses of Great Britain is small compared to that of the people of our country, and it must be remembered that it is the multitude who pay tariff taxes, not the few who own property." Yet, small as is the consuming power of the masses of Great Britain, they paid "tariff taxes" to the amount of $100,000,000 and internal taxes collected by paying officials to the amount of $230,000.000 and other taxes besides, aggregating in all $390,000,000, during their last fiscal year.

The internal tax that the laboring poor of England paid last year for malt and spirituous liquors was $110,000,000, leaving out the various kinds of liquors imported and mostly used by the higher classes, which amounted to $35,000,000 more, while on tobacco and snuff they paid $37,000,000. In the United States the whole income on spirituous and fermented liquors and tobacco amounted only to $98,000,000.

The annual expenditure to keep up the free-trade institutions of England is about $17 per head, including paupers, while the annual expenditure of protectionist United States is only about $5.25 per head.

England's free trade has laid her open to the manufactures of the world. France protects her own industry by stringent protective tariffs, as was ably shown a few days ago by my colleague from Philadelphia, [Mr. KELLEY,] and in 1873 she imported from England $85,000,000 of commodities and exported to England $215,000,000 worth of her productions, making a heavy balance of trade against her free-trade neighbor.

It was by her enlightened protective policy that France was enabled to pay the great fine of $1,000,000,000 imposed on her by Germany, for her exports had made her a creditor nation and she paid the greater part of the fine by drafts on England, Holland, Belgium, and even on Germany herself, and had to pay in hard cash only about $100,000,000 of her amercement.

These comparisons show very clearly the superiority of a protective over a free-trade policy.

The second proposition of the gentleman from Illinois is that tariffs should be laid for revenue only, and that there should be no protection except that which is incidental, in other words, accidental.

By this is meant that the Government should take care of itself and the people should take care of themselves; that a tariff of duties should be laid that will raise the most revenue in the easiest way; and if by any accident such a tariff should protect and encourage any branch of American industry it would be all very well, but if it did not, then so much the worse for that branch of industry.

In this policy, which is the policy of the modern democracy, there is no thought, no care for the interests of the laboring masses. They may struggle as best they can against the cheaper capital and labor of foreign countries, and if they support themselves in the competition it will be against the policy of the party, and not because of any protecting care.

If, however, by superior skill and ingenuity and the introduction of labor-saving machinery, they are able to sustain themselves and establish a business and become prosperous, the democratic cry goes up that they are monopolists and getting rich too fast, and that the duties on the articles they manufacture are a tax on the people, and that they must come down, and if that party be in power they are reduced accordingly, and the industry thus accidentally encouraged is destroyed.

But the main shibboleth of the modern democracy is that protection is "spoliation" or robbery of the consumer of protected manufactures, and that the cost of all domestic products is enhanced by a duty on imports. They contend that protection takes their property from one portion of the people and gives it to a more favored class.

It is a doctrine of comparatively modern origin, and as often as enunciated has been as often proved untrue.

It is a plausible assertion that the duty on an imported article is necessarily added to the cost, and therefore must be ultimately paid by the consumer. In making this assertion the advocate of free trade has an advantage, because to minds not conversant with the effect of competition at home in the manufacture of such commodities it may seem to be true.

It may happen to be true, but not always, in those cases where we do not produce or manufacture imported articles, that the consumer will have to pay the duty.

Even in those cases the foreign producer may have to pay the duty or lower his prices to an equivalent thereof in order to get his commodities into our market.

If it be true that a duty on such commodities has to be paid by the consumer, then the converse of the proposition ought to be true, that making such articles duty free gives the consumer the benefit of the amount of duty taken off by lowering the price that amount. Such, however, is not the case; for when we recently made coffee and tea duty free the price of each remained very nearly what it was before.

The Secretary of the Treasury in his last annual report, in speaking of the repeal of the duties on tea and coffee, says:

In his last annual report the Secretary expressed the opinion that the act admitting these articles to free entry had been without advantage to consumers in this country, but that the duty repealed had been added to the cost abroad. The repeal of the duty has been followed by increase of export duty in the countries of production, and this increase is paid by the consumer.

The late Commissioner Wells has shown that in England a decrease of the duty on tea brought no corresponding benefit to the consumer in reduction of price. Thus tea, under the British tariff, had its duty decreased 77 per cent. from between 1849 and 1866, yet the price increased 50 per cent. The explanation is that, there being practically but one tea-producing country, the trade was a monopoly, and the decrease of the duty was followed by an increase of price by the producer. Hence no benefit to the consumer.

Still less is it true that in the case of imported commodities, such as we can manufacture here, the consumer pays the duty.

Whenever by a judicious tariff a duty is laid upon cotton, silk, woolen, or iron manufactures imported sufficiently high to enable the home manufacturer to compete with the foreign manufacturer, then the consumer gets the benefit of the competition. When there is no competition at home with the foreign manufacturer, he puts what price he pleases on his articles and we have to pay that price with the duty added or go without the article. But when protection sufficient is given to our home manufacturers to embark their capital in any line of commodities made abroad, then there is competition between the home manufacturers and the foreign ones, and between the home manufacturers themselves. This duplicated competition evolves the invention of labor-saving machinery and the introduction of labor-saving processes, and by these means the cost of production is brought down to the lowest figure, to the great advantage of the consumer. The foreign manufacturer, if he introduces his wares into this country, has to sell them here at the price at which our own people can sell them, and can therefore only get for them such a price as with the duty added will be equivalent to the price in our market. He therefore may have to sell them at a figure that will afford him little or no profit at all, and hence the duty paid will really come out of his profits, and not be paid by the consumer.

There is no class of business men more keenly alive to their interests than the managers of railroads. They desire to buy their rails at the lowest figures possible, and yet it is but four or five years ago that ninety managers of railroads, lying all over the country from Boston to Saint Louis, presented their petition to Congress asking for a duty of $44.80 per ton on steel rails. Among other things they said:

Immediately before the construction of the first steel-rail manufactory in this country, foreign makers charged $150 per ton (equal then to $225 in currency) for steel rails. As American works were built, foreign skilled labor introduced, home labor instructed, and domestic irons, clays, ganister, and spiegel (after many and expensive trials) found to produce excellent rails, the price of the foreign article was gradually lowered, until now (1870) it stands at less than $79 per ton in gold, or $96.38 in currency.

They are now about $60 in currency, and iron rails that were then worth $75 to $90 are now worth only $42 to $45 in currency.

The memorial continues:

Now that several millions of dollars have been expended in machinery, furnaces, and experiments in perfecting the process of manufacture in this country, and numbers of our citizens are dependent upon it for support, the business is threatened with annihilation by the pressure of English and Prussian makers. We, as users of steel rails and transporters of the food and material for American manufacturers and their numerous employés and skilled laborers, do not desire to be dependent exclusively upon the foreign supply, and therefore join in asking that nstead of the present ad valorem duty a specific duty of two cents per pound be placed upon this article.

Congress considered their petition and placed a duty of 1½ cents per pound on steel rails with the effect on prices already stated.

The effect of protection on the production of steel rails has been marvelous. In 1867 we only manfactured 2,550 tons; 1868, 7,225 tons; in 1869, 9,650 tons; in 1870, 34,000 tons; in 1871, 38,250 tons; in 1872, 94,070 tons; in 1873, 129,015 tons; in 1874, 144,944 tons; in 1875, 290,863 tons, and we have now emancipated ourselves from dependence on England for a supply.

To show still further the beneficial effects of a protective tariff in the reduction of duties on all kinds of steel, I read from the "Protest of the American Iron and Steel Association" against the reduction in duties proposed by the bill of the gentleman from Illinois, submitted to the Committee of Ways and Means of the House on the 28th of March last. That protest, among other things, says—

That the proposed reduction of the duties on iron and steel would have the effect of increasing the importation of these commodities and still further depressing the domestic iron trade, we have not the slightest doubt. A concession to the foreign producer of $2 a ton on pig iron, $10 to $15 a ton on rolled iron, $5.68 a ton on iron rails, $13 a ton on steel rails, and from $11.40 to $24.64 a ton on steel would certainly operate as a most powerful incentive to induce him to increase his shipments to this country. It is no secret that the English iron trade is just now in a condition of prostration equaling that of our own. The cause of the prostration in this country is largely owing, as has been said, to the overstocking of our markets a few years ago with English iron; the cause of the prostration abroad is owing to the low prices in this country since the panic, which have prevented English iron-masters from continuing their shipments to this side. Now to reduce duties, as is proposed, would be a precious boon to our great rival. * * *

We beg to call your attention to some of the benefits which the country has derived from the duties which it is now proposed to reduce. Before the first steel-rail manufactory was established in this country, in 1867, foreign makers charged our railway companies $150 a ton in gold, and until American works were able to supply the home demand the price ranged above $100. To-day the price of best quality American steel rails is $60 in currency. Before the war, and before the period of inflated prices, the iron-rail mills of the country were unable to supply the home demand, and English makers charged our railway companies as high as $80 a ton in gold for inferior rails; now our own mills are equal to any home demand that may be made upon them, and their best rails are offered at $42 currency. Before the manufacture of best crucible cast steel had obtained a start in this country, English steel cost our tool-manufacturers from $50 to $100 a ton more than it now does, and American steel of equal quality is now sold at even a lower price than the English, and has almost driven it from the market. Two years ago a delegation representing English steel manufacturers presented in this committee-room an appeal for lower duties. At that time English steel of best quality was selling at Boston at 17 to 18 cents a pound in gold, and American steel of same quality at 15 to 15½ cents currency. A year ago the duties on steel were increased 10 per cent., and to-day English steel is quoted at Boston at 14 to 14½ cents a pound in gold and American steel at 14 to 15 cents currency. The duty on steel has therefore reduced the price of both the English and the American product to the American consumer, who ought to be and doubtless is now satisfied that his true friends are the American steel-manufacturers.

Permit us also to remark that, without the stimulus afforded by the present duties on iron and steel rails, this country could not have been able to supply the demand of its own railways. Capitalists would not have invested the large sums necessary to erect rolling-mills and converting establishments if the Government had withheld its encouragement. The railway companies would, therefore, without protective duties, have been at the mercy of the foreign makers before the panic, when the railway excitement in this country was at its height, and without those duties they would be at their mercy to-day.

That protest was unheeded and the result was the free-trade tariff bill of that committee.

The great extent of the iron and steel industry of the nation, which was in foreign times almost monopolized by foreign producers, is well shown by the valuable tables issued May 31, 1876, by the American Iron and Steel Association.

Statistics of pig-iron production.

PRODUCTION OF PIG-IRON (ALL KINDS) IN 1872, 1873, 1874, AND 1875, BY STATES.

States.	Number of completed stacks Dec. 31, 1873.	Number of completed stacks Dec. 31, 1874.	Number of completed stacks Dec. 31, 1875.	Number of stacks in blast Dec. 31, 1875.	Number of stacks out of blast Dec. 31, 1875.	Make of pig-iron in 1872, net tons.	Make of pig-iron in 1873, net tons.	Make of pig-iron in 1874, net tons.	Make of pig-iron in 1875, net tons.
Maine	1	1	1	1	.....	.....	780	1,661	2,046
Vermont	2	2	2	.....	2	2,000	3,100	3,450	2,400
Massachusetts	6	6	6	4	2	17,070	21,136	27,991	21,255
Connecticut	10	10	10	5	5	22,700	26,977	14,518	10,850
New York	53	58	57	26	31	291,155	296,818	326,721	266,431
New Jersey	16	17	18	6	12	103,858	102,341	90,150	64,069
Pennsylvania	262	266	278	118	160	1,401,497	1,389,573	1,213,133	960,884
Maryland	22	23	24	7	17	63,031	55,986	54,556	38,741
Virginia	35	38	34	8	26	21,445	26,475	29,451	29,985
North Carolina	8	8	8	.....	8	1,073	1,432	1,340	800
Georgia	8	10	12	5	7	2,945	7,501	9,786	16,503
Alabama	11	14	14	6	8	12,512	22,283	32,863	25,108
Texas	1	1	1	.....	1	619	280	1,012	.....
West Virginia	6	9	12	4	8	20,796	23,056	30,134	25,277
Kentucky	25	27	23	8	15	67,396	69,889	61,227	48,339
Tennessee	20	22	22	7	15	42,454	43,134	48,770	28,311
Ohio	88	93	100	54	46	399,743	406,029	425,001	415,893
Indiana	8	8	9	4	5	39,221	32,486	13,732	22,081
Illinois	10	10	12	3	9	78,627	55,796	37,946	49,762
Michigan	33	34	34	14	20	100,222	123,506	136,602	114,805
Wisconsin	13	14	14	6	8	65,036	74,148	50,792	62,139
Minnesota	.....	1	1	.....	1	.....	.....	.....	.....
Missouri	18	19	19	6	13	101,158	85,552	75,817	59,717
Oregon	1	1	1	1	.....	.....	.....	2,500	1,000
Utah	.....	1	1	.....	1	.....	.....	200	150
Total	657	693	713	293	420	2,854,558	2,868,278	2,689,413	2,266,581

Production of all rolled iron in the United States in 1874 and 1875.

States.	Bar, angle, bolt, rod, and hoop iron.		Plate and sheet iron.		Cut nails and spikes.		Iron and steel rails, all sizes.		Total rolled iron.
	1874.	1875.	1874.	1875.	1874.	1875.	1874.	1875.	1874.	1875.
	Net tons.	Net tons.	Net tons.	Net tons.	Net tons.	Net tons.	Net tons.	Net tons.	Net tons.	Net tons.
Maine	3,994	3,700	.....	.....	.....	350	14,650	4,050	18,644	8,100
New Hampshire	300	1,000	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	300	1,000
Vermont	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	10,400	6,204	10,400	6,204
Massachusetts	40,324	40,336	6,592	13,395	28,819	27,590	24,765	18,391	100,500	99,712
Rhode Island	7,170	6,648	.....	.....	3,446	2,936	.....	.....	10,616	9,584
Connecticut	11,921	9,618	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	11,921	9,618
New York	76,590	90,583	4,000	4,000	5,949	4,063	46,979	82,960	133,518	181,606
New Jersey	24,645	24,584	2,256	3,614	27,643	26,110	3,537	941	58,081	55,249
Pennsylvania	343,632	300,784	120,098	116,997	75,151	65,913	259,288	255,136	798,169	738,830
Delaware	6,860	9,316	4,958	5,936	.....	.....	.....	.....	11,818	15,252
Maryland	8,455	6,279	12,428	9,789	.....	.....	48,008	30,619	68,891	46,687
Virginia	11,086	12,744	.....	.....	5,602	6,099	.....	.....	16,688	18,843
Georgia	1,406	3,360	.....	.....	.....	465	8,061	6,500	9,467	10,325
Alabama	1,000	1,000	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	1,000	1,000
West Virginia	1,609	1,806	.....	300	54,201	51,788	522	406	56,332	54,299
Kentucky	18,239	13,936	5,120	7,000	5,121	7,174	6,068	5,851	34,548	33,961
Tennessee	1,573	1,005	.....	.....	660	490	13,693	12,250	15,926	13,745
Ohio	94,413	93,890	16,143	22,288	27,253	29,638	82,561	91,775	220,370	237,581
Indiana	7,376	11,465	.....	.....	7,514	9,299	20,617	23,309	35,507	44,073
Illinois	2,500	6,000	2,240	2,000	4,250	4,428	125,103	188,248	134,093	200,676
Michigan	4,207	.....	1,553	3,450	.....	.....	2,448	.....	8,208	3,450
Wisconsin	275	14,437	.....	.....	.....	.....	29,680	28,403	29,955	42,840
Missouri	10,870	10,144	1,500	4,000	.....	.....	24,017	17,396	36,387	31,540
Wyoming Territory	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	7,000	.....	7,000
Kansas	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	2,000	5,000	2,000	5,000
California	9,205	6,121	.....	.....	.....	.....	7,016	8,073	16,221	14,194
Total	687,650	668,755	176,888	192,769	245,609	236,343	729,413	792,512	1,839,560	1,890,379

These tables exhibit one of our greatest and most valuable industries, giving employment and maintenance to hundreds of thousands of workmen, and affording a home market to the farmer for the surplus products of his farm.

It shows that Illinois, the chairman's own State, is the second State in importance in the iron and steel rail manufacture, and while Pennsylvania, the first, fell back in her production from 259,288 tons in 1874 to 255,136 tons in 1875, Illinois advanced from 125,103 tons in 1874 to 188,248 in 1875, and yet the bill of the gentleman from Illinois would inflict a severe injury on the rapidly-growing development of one of the best interests of his State, cutting down the duty of $28 per ton on steel rails to $15 per ton, and on rails made partly of steel from $22.40 per ton to $15 per ton, which wholesale reduction would crush out the rail-making interest in his State that is so happily progressing now, and throw out of employment thousands of its citizens.

But it is not the iron interest alone that is benefited by the protective policy; all other interests feel its beneficent results.

Take the woolen manufacture, for instance. In that excellent pamphlet by David H. Mason, entitled How Western Farmers are Benefited by Protection, I find the following table, showing the advance of the woolen business in the last twenty years. It is compiled from the census reports, and therefore is accurate:

	1870.	1860.	1850.
Number of woolen mills	2,891	1,260	1,559
Sets of cards	8,366	3,209	.....
Hands employed	80,053	42,728	27,682
Capital invested	$98,824,531	$30,862,654	$28,118,650
Wages paid	$26,877,575	$9,610,254	.....
Wool consumed.....pounds..	172,078,919	81,608,468	70,862,829
Value of products	$155,405,358	$61,894,986	$43,207,545
Domestic wool crop .....pounds..	100,102,387	60,264,913	.....

This is an extraordinary development, and, although the manufacturers paid twice as much for wool and wages in 1874 as they did in 1860, yet they were enabled by improved machinery and processes to sell their products cheaper in the latter than in the former year.

It is true that before we started mousseline-delaine-mills the imported article sold at 50 cents a yard, but when in 1856 we commenced to compete with the English manufacturers the price came down to 25 cents a yard, and now, under the existing tariff, as appears by the latest quotations in New York, (June 7, 1876,) the price has come down to figures ranging from 22 cents to 11 cents per yard, according to style and quality. Alpacas have receded from 75 cents in 1857 to 25 cents, and woolen cloths that cost $1.25 in that year can now be had for 75 cents to 60 cents per yard.

In these operations, while the protected manufacturer made his reasonable profit, the consumer was advantaged by the great reduction in price, and thus a protective tariff benefited both producer and consumer.

Similar progress and similar benefits have also arisen from protection to cotton manufactures.

From the census tables I am able to glean the onward progress of the cotton business for the last forty-five years.

As the earlier census returns were not very minute, they are not so full of details as the later ones.

I find the results as follows:

	1830.	1840.	1850.	1860.	1870.
Looms	33,506	.....	.....	126,313	157,310
Spindles	1,246,503	2,284,631	3,633,693	5,235,727	7,132,415
Hands employed	67,600	72,119	92,236	122,028	135,369
Capital employed	$44,914,984	$51,102,359	$74,500,931	$98,585,269	$140,706,291
Wages paid	12,155,723	.....	.....	23,940,108	39,044,132
Value of materials used	.....	.....	37,778,014	57,285,534	111,736,936
Value of products	32,036,700	46,350,453	65,501,687	115,681,774	177,489,739
Value per hand	.....	.....	668	948	1,310

This table exhibits a marvelously rapid progress, which was followed by a gradual reduction of prices until the war, when a decreased supply of the raw material, an inflated currency, and an abnormal demand raised the cost and price of cotton goods, which, however, are now receding to their ante-bellum condition.

To reduce that industry would be to turn many operatives out of employment, the majority of whom are women and children, dependent upon it for their maintenance.

It is a well-remembered fact that the tariff of 1842 enabled cotton manufacturers to sell their shirtings at a figure as low and in some cases lower than the duty. Horace Greeley relates, in his Political Economy, that Henry Clay, in his Raleigh speech on the 17th of June, 1844, pleasantly exposed the fallacy of the free-trade assumption that the price of the article is enhanced by the amount of the duty thereon, by citing the discomfiture of a democratic canvasser before an election, who, seeing a poorly-dressed hearer in front of him, stopped the regular flow of his eloquence long enough to ask him, "My friend, do you know that these tariff monopolists make you pay six cents a yard more than you should for that shirt you have on?" "I suppose it must be so, since you say so," responded the surprised and scared auditor, "but I have no learning, and don't quite understand it, since I only paid five and a half cents a yard for it."

It was a practical answer to a free-trade fallacy.

It is insisted by the free-traders that a protective tariff takes away from the farmer a foreign market for his surplus produce; because, as he argues, if imports are excluded in any degree, the ability of the foreigner to purchase his produce is proportionately limited. But such is not the case. Foreign countries must have bread, and they will buy bread-stuffs wherever they can obtain them on the best terms. That our protective tariff has not diminished, but has actually increased exports of agricultural products, is a historical fact, as is shown from the table which I have taken from the bulletin of the Iron and Steel Association of May 10, 1875. It is as follows:

Coming now to our agricultural exports, we find by reference to elaborate tables prepared by Mr. David H. Mason from the commerce and navigation reports of the General Government, that they have been greater under the present protective policy than under the previous policy of partial free trade. Without entering into needless details, we compile from Mr. Mason's tables a statement of the exports of three leading agricultural staples, wheat, wheat flour, and Indian corn, in thirteen years under partial free trade and in thirteen years under protection.

Agricultural exports in twenty-six years.

LOW-DUTY PERIOD.

Fiscal years.	Bushels of wheat.	Barrels of flour.	Bushels of corn.
1849	1,527,534	2,108,013	13,257,309
1850	608,661	1,385,448	6,595,092
1851	1,026,725	2,202,335	3,426,811
1852	2,694,540	2,799,339	2,627,075
1853	3,890,141	2,920,918	2,274,909
1854	8,036,665	4,022,386	7,768,816
1855	798,884	1,204,540	7,807,585
1856	8,154,877	3,510,626	10,292,280
1857	14,570,331	3,712,053	7,565,318
1858	8,926,196	3,512,169	4,766,145
1859	3,002,016	2,431,824	1,719,998
1860	4,155,153	2,611,596	3,314,155
1861	31,238,057	4,323,756	10,678,244
Totals	88,629,780	36,745,003	82,033,737
Annual average	6,817,676	2,826,539	6,310,287

PROTECTIVE PERIOD.

Fiscal years.	Bushels of wheat.	Barrels of flour.	Bushels of corn.
1862	37,289,572	4,882,033	18,904,898
1863	36,160,414	4,390,055	16,119,476
1864	23,681,712	3,557,347	4,096,684
1865	9,937,152	2,604,542	2,812,726
1866	5,579,103	2,183,050	13,516,651
1867	6,146,411	1,300,106	14,889,823
1868	15,940,899	2,076,423	11,147,490
1869	17,557,836	2,431,873	7,047,197
1870	36,584,115	3,463,333	1,392,115
1871	34,304,906	3,653,841	9,826,309
1872	26,423,080	2,514,535	34,491,650
1873	39,204,285	2,562,086	38,541,930
1874	71,039,928	4,094,094	34,454,606
Totals	359,849,413	39,713,318	207,221,555
Annual average	27,680,724	3,054,871	15,940,120

This is a significant table and worthy of consideration by every farmer.

It is also insisted that he is injured by it, because according to free-trade logic the consumer always pays the duty. We formerly imported our axes at $15 the dozen, but to-day the Beattys of Chester, in my district, can undersell the foreign article at a much reduced price.

Before shovels were made in this country we paid $2 a piece for the foreign article, but the Ames manufactory can now afford them at seventy-five cents, and competes with the British manufacturer in the markets of the world.

By the decline in the price of iron and steel, the plow with which the farmer prepares his ground for seed, the wheat-drill with which he commits it to the ground, the reaper with which he cuts it, are all afforded him at reduced rates, and the cheapened steel or iron rails enable him to send his grain to market and sell it at a profit. It was but recently that western farmers had to spend a bushel of wheat to get another bushel to market, but now because of cheaper rail transportation they can send their grain to Liverpool at less cost than they formerly paid to send it to their county town. It is the railway, the offspring of protection, that brings the market to the farmer's door and pays him cash for his surplus produce. It is his best interest to have manufactories established at home to provide consumers for his breadstuffs, especially as India has lately entered the European market with her grain and will soon be a formidable competitor with the American agriculturist.

Locomotives and railroad cars, which we once imported, we now sell abroad, and in 1874 we sent one thousand and eighty-three to different countries, some to Mexico and South America, and some in competition with Great Britain in her provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Canada.

Mr. Disston, of Philadelphia, sends his saws to Sheffield in competition with the English manufacturer at his own home, and the New England mills send their cottons to Leeds and Manchester.

Even to the British colonies in the antipodes we export our commodities, and American furniture is regularly quoted in the price-current of the Melbourne Argus, a copy of which I lately received.

Thus it is that a protective tariff benefits all classes of citizens. The establishment of an iron, woolen, cotton, or any other manufactory gives employment at once to a large number of hands at remunerative wages. It enables the employés to obtain more of the comforts and luxuries of life for themselves and families and makes them consumers as well as producers. Around the manufactory rises up a town of grocers, millers, tailors, shoemakers, and all others necessary to supply the wants of the employés of the manufactory, and as the town must be fed, it gives a market to the farmers for many miles around.

The village of Phœnixville, in my district, is an instance of the value of a protective tariff. It has its rail mill, its angle-iron mill, and its bridge manufactory, and the latter has so far improved its machinery and patterns that it was enabled to obtain a contract for a great bridge over the Saint Lawrence, in Canada, in competition with the best bridge builders of Her Majesty Queen Victoria; and I need hardly add that its seven thousand operatives have regularly bought largely of the produce of the adjacent farmers, and within a few late years have thus quadrupled the value of their lands.

The city of Chester, in the same district, is a still more remarkable instance of Jefferson's protective doctrine. It has its cotten, woolen, and iron mills and its ship-yard. From an obscure village in 1850 it has arisen, with its suburbs, to be a city of 15,000 people under the influence of a protective tariff.

By the protected labor of its skilled operatives its cottons and woolens now compete with those of European manufacturers successfully. Its iron mills supply its ship-yard, and that ship-yard, under the able management of the great ship builder, John Roach, sends forth the largest steamships that were ever launched on this continent, and builds and repairs national vessels of war better, cheaper, and quicker than it can be done in the navy-yards of the nation.

The lands of the county in which it is situated, could command, when it was a village only $75 to $100 per acre, but their selling price now has advanced to $200 and up to $500 per acre.

These afford an example to the Southern States from which they might learn a valuable lesson; for with their great abundance of water-power, of coal and iron, of good ports and cheap labor, there is no good reason why they should export their great staple, cotton, at twelve to fourteen cents a pound in the raw state and buy it back for consumption in a manufactured condition at a dollar. By placing the producer alongside of the consumer, they would retain for themselves all intermediate profits now paid to others and soon double and treble the value of their plantations.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is also said by the gentleman from Illinois, as I before remarked, that a duty on imports adds to the price of all similar articles produced in this country. If that were true, the farmer cannot complain. He is protected on his beef and pork one cent per pound; on his hams and bacons, two cents per pound; on his cheese, four cents per pound; on his wheat, twenty cents per bushel; on his butter, four cents per pound; on his lard, two cents per pound; on his rye and barley, fifteen cents per bushel; on his Indian corn, ten cents per bushel; on his oats, ten cents per bushel, and on his potatoes, ten cents per bushel. If these articles are enhanced in price by the duty, as free-traders contend, then the farmers received in 1870 a bonus of nearly $300,000,000 on the agricultural products they raised that year.

At any rate, they were protected from the importation of Canada oats and barley, Bermuda potatoes, and the cheap wheat from Asiatic countries which I spoke of before.

Free trade is a creature born of the Cobden Club and the Manchester school and cradled in great commercial cities. It starts in commercial emporiums and by its plausible statements obtains lodgment in country places.

The importing merchant upholds it, because the freer the foreign commerce the more does his business and his profits expand. New York is consequently a free-trade city, and her Representatives but support the views of their constituents when advocating it. She is a city with strong foreign propensities and feelings, with close communion with European marts and lands. Her population of 942,292 as in 1870 had but 523,198 native-born; and of her whole population 769,558 have foreign-born fathers.

Cook County, of Illinois, including the great city of Chicago, the commercial metropolis of the Northwest, had a population in 1870 of 350,000. Of these 183,194 were natives and 166,772 foreign-born, and 268,063, or more than one-half, had foreign fathers and mothers. These descendants of foreigners of course had their sympathies with the old countries, and wanted trade as free as possible, and hence it is naturally to be expected that the Representatives of constituencies with free-trade proclivities should represent the views of their constituents.

In this connection let me say, Mr. Speaker, that the free-trade merchant is very inconsistent. To protect his commerce at home and abroad we have established a Navy; to allow his vessels unobstructed passage to our ports we improve our rivers and harbors; to point out their way in the darkness we erect light-houses on our coasts and along our rivers, and all this at an expense of nearly $30,000,000 per annum.

He has also an absolute monopoly of the coasting trade, with which no foreigner can interfere, and yet I have never heard a free-trade merchant or his representative complain of these exclusive privileges maintained for him at such a vast expense, or ask that the foreign ship owner might be allowed to compete with him for that coasting trade or heard him denounce his monopoly as spoliation or robbery.

When, thus protected himself, he shall make such complaint it will be time enough for him to complain of others who are also protected by a wise governmental policy.

I have endeavored to show that the doctrines of the fathers of the democratic party were entirely protective, while those of modern democracy are of a free-trade character; that duties laid on imports do not necessarily enhance the price to the consumer, but tend to give him the same or a similar article at a lower figure than before the duty was laid; and that a duty does not in addition add to the price of all similar products of domestic origin.

The best evidence of the truth of the principles of the fathers and of the value of protection is made most obvious to every eye in the great exposition now open in Philadelphia. There the raw materials and finished productions of our country compare favorably, side by side, with those of all the rest of the world. There protected machinery of all kinds, from the ponderous Corliss engine, moving like an intelligence and which is the motive power of all the minor machines of machinery hall, down to the smallest tape and bobbin weaver, and the matured products of our cotton, woolen, silk, glass, iron, copper, and silver, manifest the wondrous skill and ingenuity of the American people, happily developed under the beneficent influence of protective tariffs.

I desire to say, before I close, a few words concerning the effect of a revenue tariff, such as the bill before the House proposes, upon the resumption of specie payments.

The Government owes over $400,000,000 of depreciated currency. It has not provided for its payment. Every patriotic citizen wishes that it should pay that debt which it has promised to pay in gold. Congress has repeatedly pledged its faith that it should be done, and has at last fixed the time for such payment on January 1, 1879.

The bill of the committee would reduce the duties 30 to 50 per cent. below their present rates. In order, therefore, to obtain as much revenue as we now receive from the present tariff the importations would have to be increased accordingly, to make up the deficiency in revenue. But they are too great already. They have made us a debtor nation, and it is only within the last two years that our exports of commodities exceeded our imports. To adopt this bill would be to open the ports of our country to the sweepings of the manufactories of the world, and to throw us back to the unfortunate situation from which we are slowly emerging. It would indefinitely postpone specie payments by the accumulation of balances against us abroad, and by producing a drain of our specie to settle those balances.

The evils that exist already from excess of importations are sufficiently great, as I have already shown in a speech I made in this House on the 19th of February last, and from which I now beg leave to quote a few remarks, but the bill under consideration would aggravate them immensely. I then said:

Beginning with the war of the rebellion in 1861 and concluding with the fiscal year ending in 1875, we find that we imported of foreign merchandise $6,207,800,000, and of foreign specie $286,500,000, amounting in all to $6,494,300,000. To settle this indebtedness we exported of our own domestic merchandise only $4,817,700,000, and of foreign merchandise, $231,400,000. These sums did not balance accounts between us and foreign nations, and we added to them of our own specie $959,100,000, and of foreign specie $122,100,000; amounting in all to $6,130,300,000, leaving us still short $364,000.000 on the custom-house books.

As the amount of gold in the country in 1860 was estimated at $275,000,000, in 861 at $259,000,000, and is now estimated by the Director of the Mint at only $140,-00,000, it is evident that in settling with foreign nations we paid them every dollar of the gold we raised from the mines, and drew on our reserved fund for $135,000,-000 more. This was only the balance of trade as shown by the custom-house books, and not the balance of accounts as shown on the great national ledger when we made our annual settlement with the outside world. To this again must be added at least 5 per cent. for undervaluations on the imports, making at least twenty-five to thirty million dollars per annum. In addition we may safely add $5,000,000 for smuggled goods, for which we have to pay.

Before the war we carried three-fourths of our products to foreign countries in our own vessels and realized the freights thereon, which amounted to many millions; but now we have but one-third of the carrying trade of our own products, and hence have to pay to foreigners for carrying the remaining two-thirds of our commodities, which is another heavy item of our annual indebtedness, the amount of which I am unable to estimate. It is many millions.

To all these must be added the annual payment of $100,000,000 or more of interest on national, railroad, State, and municipal bonds, which does not appear on the custom-house books, and with these matters operating against us more or less during the period mentioned, we can readily understand how the immense indebtedness abroad has originated, and appreciate the fact that we are a greatly indebted nation.

If we should examine the Treasury reports alone, which show a custom-house balance in our favor for the last two years, we might conclude we are a creditor nation, but when we take into the calculation those circumstances above mentioned, which never show on the custom-house ledgers, we cannot but conclude that we have still to provide for an annual deficit of perhaps $100,000,000.

The facts and figures that I then gave are substantially the same to-day.

Instead, therefore, of increasing our importations and piling up a huge debt abroad, we should decrease them.

In the last half dozen years our imports were as follows:

Year.	Free.	Dutiable.
1869–'70	$46, 559, 965	$415, 817, 622
1870–'71	57, 857, 761	483, 635, 947
1871–'72	61, 010, 902	579, 327, 864
1872–'73	166, 296, 821	497, 320, 826
1873–'74	179, 936, 668	415, 924, 580
1874–'75	167, 180, 644	386, 725, 509

Immense amounts, for which we had to pay in gold or its equivalent.

Of breadstuffs, cotton manufactures, earthenware, glass, iron and steel, leather, tobacco and cigars, lumber, wool and woolen manufactures, and other articles, we annually import nearly two hundred million dollars' worth, which we could manufacture as well in our own country. We should so adjust our tariff as to give the market to the home producer and manufacturer of those articles, and increased duties, properly adjusted, and a reduction of expenses in the national Government, would supply the place of any diminution of revenue that might ensue from diminished importations.

By so doing we will keep our gold and silver among our own people and accumulate a fund sufficient in a short time to enable the Government and the banks to resume specie payments. If, on the other hand, we enact this bill into a law, our importations will immediately increase, our debt abroad will increase, all our gold and silver will be exported in payment of our debts, and its insufficiency will have to be supplied by an increased bonded indebtedness that will be an additional annual drain on us in payment of the interest and will eventually drive us into national bankruptcy.

While this state of affairs takes place in our foreign commerce, our internal affairs will become sadly deranged.

The cheaper labor and capital of Europe will enable the low-priced goods of foreign manufacturers to be thrown unchecked on our shores; our mills and manufactories will be closed or only drag out a sickly existence; their demand for coal will be so lessened that some collieries will have to be abandoned and the miners thrown out of employment; the tonnage on railroads will fall off and their ability to pay the interest on their bonded debt be so diminished as to drive some of them into bankruptcy; workmen of all classes will be driven from their homes to find employment in other occupations; they will enter into competition with the farmer, who will have lost his best customers with the closing of the manufactories; the prices of agricultural produce will fall because of the failure of the demand made by those business establishments and because of the competition with him produced by such failure; the whole frame-work of society will be disturbed, and, instead of prosperity and contentment, poverty and discontent will pervade the land.

This is no fancy picture. It is what has occurred to a greater or less degree heretofore under our low tariffs, and will occur again if the bill of the democratic committee should become a law.

That such a calamity may be averted must be the ardent desire of every well-wisher of his country's prosperity.

Silver Coin.

SPEECH OF HON. JOHN H. BAKER,

OF INDIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

June 10, 1876,

On the joint resolution providing for the issue of silver coin.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, the policy of this Government from the time of the administration of Washington to the second term of the present Executive has been steadily in the direction of recognizing the full legal-tender character of our silver coinage. It has been in the direction of a double system of coins, fabricated of silver and gold respectively, and each made a lawful tender in the payment of debts. On the 2d day of April, 1792, a bill entitled "An act establishing a mint and regulating the coins of the United States" passed into a law. This act met the approval of Alexander Hamilton, then Secretary of the Treasury, perhaps the greatest financial authority of his generation; and it received the most anxious and thoughtful consideration from the great statesmen of that day. In this act it was provided, in section 9, as follows:

SEC. 9. Dollars or units, each to be of the value of a Spanish milled dollar as the same is now current, are to be coined, and to contain 371 grains and 4-16 of a grain of pure, or 416 grains of standard, silver.

The amount of silver contained in the dollar or unit was fixed at the above quantity after careful inquiry and deliberation, and it remained as then fixed for the period of forty-five years. It is possible that the weight and fineness of the silver dollar as then established by law ought in consequence of the large and rapidly increasing production of silver bullion to be slightly changed. But clearly no great or radical change ought to be made either in the weight or fineness of our silver coinage.

The silver dollar authorized to be coined and issued pursuant to the above provision of law was made a full legal tender in payment of all public and private obligations. The sixteenth section of that act provided as follows:

SEC. 16. That all gold and silver coins which are struck and issued shall be a lawful tender in all payments whatsoever.

The full legal tenderability of the silver coinage in payment of all obligations whatsoever was then settled on what was believed to be sound financial principles, based upon profound and extensive research. That it was contemplated by the framers of the Constitution that silver coin should be a legal tender side by side with gold is made entirely manifest by the tenth section of article 1 of the Constitution. This section provides that "no State shall make anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts." While this provision of the Constitution only applies to the States, and does not forbid Congress to make anything except gold and silver coin a legal tender in payment of debts, still it seems manifest that it was contemplated by the fathers of the Republic who framed the Constitution that silver coins were to stand for all time as a full legal tender in the same manner and to the same extent as gold coins. Under this policy, for forty-five years in peace and war, the silver coinage remained a full legal tender, not only without injury, but to the manifest advantage of the country. It was the money of the people. It was in common use in nearly all the minor transactions of business life. Possessing the same legal-tender quality as gold, there was no occasion for gold brokers, and the fell brood of brokers and bullionists who now prey upon the people was fortunately unknown.

The next legislation affecting the silver coinage was enacted on the 18th of January, 1837. It was during the great financial crises of that period. The amount of silver in the dollar or unit was reduced 3½ grains by that law. The obvious purpose of this reduction was to give relief to the debtor class; and perhaps for the further reason that it would, by cheapening the cost of producing silver coins and reducing the intrinsic value of the dollar or unit, naturally cause silver to flow into the country for coinage. That this law had this effect is abundantly established by the history of those times. The country evidently recovered from the financial crash which swept over it much sooner than it would if no steps had been taken to arrest the flow of the precious metals abroad. Not only did our silver remain at home, but large amounts of foreign silver coin found its way into the channels of commerce in the United States. The provisions of the act of January 18, 1837, on this subject are as follows:

SEC. 9. The silver dollar shall be of the weight of 412½ grains standard, to be nine hundred parts of pure metal and one hundred parts of alloy; and that dollars, half dollars, and quarter dollars, dimes, and half dimes, shall be legal tenders of payment, according to their nominal value, for any sums whatever."

SEC. 11. Coins of silver heretofore issued at the Mint shall continue to be a legal tender.

It will thus be seen that though the intrinsic value of the silver coinage as mere bullion was appreciably diminished by law, it was still maintained as a full legal tender. Nor was there any distinction in the legal tenderability of the fractional or subsidiary silver coins and the coined dollar? These fractional or subsidiary silver coins continued to be of the same fineness and relative weight as the dollar or unit. The fractional or subsidiary silver coins were first debased and partially demonetized by the act of February 21, 1853. Doubtless this debasement of the fractional silver coins was occasioned by the scarcity of small change and the demand of the public for more silver coins to carry on the business of the country. This legislation contains a valuable hint, in this, that it shows that the statesmen of that day recognized the duty of giving needed relief to the financial stringency at the risk of an expansion of the volume of the circulating medium. The same thing, as we have seen, had been done in 1837, and in neither case did any injurious consequences result to either business or credit. It is the part of wise statesmanship now, so far as safely can be done, to shape our legislation so as to retain, as far as practicable, in our own country the gold and silver bullion produced from our mines.

This act of 1853 provides in its first two sections, which alone relate to the subject under consideration, as follows:

SECTION 1. That from and after June 1, 1853, the weight of the half dollar or piece of fifty cents shall be 192 grains, and the quarter dollar, or piece of twenty-five cents, dime, and half dime shall be respectively one-half, one-fifth, and one-tenth of the weight of said half dollar.

SEC. 2. That the silver coins issued in conformity with the above section shall be legal tenders in payment of debts for all sums not exceeding $5.

This is the entire legislation on the subject of silver coinage from the adoption of our present Constitution down to the act of February 12, 1873. This legislation establishes the following propositions:

First. That during the period of eighty-one years from April 2, 1792, to February 12, 1873, we had a silver dollar or unit which was made by law a full legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private.

Second. That during the first forty-five years of this period the dollar or unit contained 416 grains of standard silver.

Third. That during the great financial crisis of 1836-'37 the Government reduced the weight of the dollar or unit to 412½ grains of standard silver, nine-tenths fine.

Fourth. That from April 2, 1792, to February 21, 1853, the fractional or subsidiary silver coins were fabricated from silver of the same fineness as the dollar, and of the same relative weight in proportion to their nominal value; and that the fractional silver coins during all this period were a legal tender the same as the coined silver dollar.

Fifth. That in 1853 the weight of the half dollar, which had been theretofore of the weight of 206¼ grains of standard silver, nine-tenths fine, was reduced to 192 grains.

Thus a dollar in nominal value of the fractional or subsidiary silver coins under this law contained 28½ grains less of standard silver than the coined silver dollar. Hence the fractional or subsidiary silver coins are actually worth nearly 7 per cent. less than the silver-dollar coins. The wisdom and honesty of so largely debasing the fractional or subsidiary silver coinage are certainly questionable. Still, as long as such fractional coinage remains a legal tender to the amount of $5, its debasement in intrinsic value does not essentially impair its utility as a circulating medium if the full legal-tender silver dollar is preserved. The people have long used this debased fractional or subsidiary silver coinage, have carried on the business of the country with it, have entered into innumerable commercial engagements, and no emergency has arisen which would seem to require at this time any change in the weight or fineness of the fractional or subsidiary silver coinage. I am, however, free to say that, in my judgment, the practice of debasing any portion of our silver coins is, as an original proposition, unjust and indefensible. It would be wise, it seems to me, in due time to reverse the action of the Government taken in 1853 in this regard, and bring back the subsidiary coins to the same relative weight and fineness as the silver-dollar coin.

During all the time intervening between April 2, 1792, and February 12, 1873, the silver dollar or unit remained a legal tender in the payment of all public and private debts and obligations. It could be lawfully tendered to public as well as to private creditors. If there were wisdom and justice in creating the legal-tender silver coinage, or in its maintenance during the long period of eighty-one years and down to a very recent day, there would certainly seem to be neither wisdom nor justice in now substantially demonetizing it. I say substantially demonetizing the silver coinage, because when its legal tenderability is limited to payments in the sum of $5 or under it can fulfill no function in commercial transactions, except that of mere small change. It loses the real function of money as medium for the purchase of commodities and the payment of debts—a function which has been maintained for our silver coinage by the wisdom of at least three successive generations of our countrymen. With industry prostrate, with an unparalleled stringency in the money market, with a public debt of enormous magnitude, and private and municipal debts of even greater proportions, and with gold, like the red arterial blood flowing in a ceaseless stream from the country, it seems to me that no man can vindicate the policy of even partially demonetizing the silver coinage. I do not therefore see the wisdom or even justice of the legislation of 1873, which struck out of existence the old legal-tender silver dollar or unit. It is true that no large amount of the full legal-tender dollars authorized to be coined by the foregoing laws was ever struck by the mint and put into circulation. But it cannot be doubted that if we had coined all of the silver dollars which could have been kept afloat by the business of the country, we should have suffered much less from the multiplication and consequent failures of unsound banks chartered by State authority. This act of 1873 is entitled "An act revising and amending the laws relative to the mints and assay offices and coinage of the United States." It destroyed the whole of our financial system so far as our silver coinage is concerned. It inaugurated a new scheme of silver coinage. It provides as follows:

SEC. 15. That the silver coins of the United States shall be a trade-dollar, a half dollar or a piece of fifty cents, a quarter of a dollar or a piece of twenty-five cents, and a dime or a piece of ten cents; the weight of the trade-dollar shall be 420 grains troy of standard silver; the weight of the half dollar shall be 12 grains, the quarter dollar 6 grains, the ten-cent piece shall be one-fifth the weight of the half dollar.

The gram is declared to be equal to 15.432 grains. The half dollar therefore weighs 185.184 grains, being 6.816 grains less in weight than the debased subsidiary coins authorized by the act of February 21, 1853. The policy of issuing a trade-dollar, which is not a legal tender, and abrogating the coinage of the legal-tender silver dollar, can find, I think, no justification except upon the theory of the bullionists, whose cause was so ably argued by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HEWITT,] that the only full legal tender in this country should be gold. To demand gold as the only legal tender is simply to place the labor of the country in the hands of the capitalists. The demand that nothing except gold shall be a legal tender is to ask a thing now practically impossible.

The productive industries of the country, fostered by a financial policy which shall restore confidence and give remunerative employment to the laborers of the country who are now in vain seeking it, must repair the waste and destruction of war. Then only can we hope to return to a gold-coin currency and maintain it. If we were to listen to the voice of the bullionist and by the sale of bonds purchase sufficient gold to resume, it can hardly be doubted that with the enormous drain upon us in the shape of interest upon the national, state, municipal, corporate, and private debts of the country, with a large balance of trade against us, we would soon become involved in the throes of financial embarrassment and distress compared with which all our past experience would seem light. Believing the attempt to resume specie payments in 1879 utterly impracticable, I regard the present resumption act a useless menace to the business of the country, paralyzing every industry and prostrating every trade, throwing thousands of the best and most skillful laborers and artisans of the country out of productive employment.

It is not, however, my purpose to speak of the resumption act. I want, however, to declare my belief in our legal-tender notes as one of the best currencies ever devised, and I hope to see them maintained until prosperity shall gladden our land. I am inclined to believe the true policy of the country while maintaining our legal-tenders, now that the Government has undertaken to furnish the people with silver coins and that the amount of the production of silver bullion in this country and the price it now commands in the market will enable us to do it, is to procure the bullion and coin all the silver money that the business of the country seems to demand. I am free to say that I entertained, and still entertain, grave doubts as to the policy at this time of attempting to purchase silver bullion by the sale of gold-bearing bonds and coin such bullion to take the place of the fractional currency. It seemed, and yet seems doubtful whether $40,000,000 of silver coins in circulation are so much more valuable to the business of the country than a like amount of paper fractional currency as to repay the people for the annual burden of the interest at 5 per cent. on forty millions of gold-bearing bonds which must be sold to procure the bullion for coinage.

But the policy, wise or unwise, has been inaugurated. There now seems to be no middle course. We have plunged into the stream and cannot stop in midcurrent. Either let us have all the silver coins we can use or none. Hence, I am now disposed to support any measure which seems to be wisely matured having in view the supplying the people with all the silver coins which can be utilized in the trade and business of the country. The policy of confining its legal-tender quality to sums of $5 and under is in conflict with our whole national history and experience prior to 1873. It seems to me unwise and calculated to impair the usefulness of this species of coin as a circulating medium. It is certainly in the interest of the capitalist as against the laborer. By the law of the land the silver dollar used to be a legal tender, not only in payment of the poor man's daily labor, but of the bondholder's and capitalist's debt. By the policy of the present legislation, the present silver coinage is made good enough to pay the laborer for his day's work, but it is not good enough to pay the rich man's obligations held by him either against his neighbor or his Government. This is an unjust discrimination. I believe it will also prove a mischievous one.

I could wish to see the present bills so amended as to make the silver dollar a legal tender for all sums, or, if that were not practicable, to see it made a legal tender in payment of $100 in any one payment. This wish, however, it seems hopeless to indulge. It has been determined, if we are to have silver coins at all, that they shall not be a legal tender in payment of more than $5 in any one payment. The interest of the gold bullionists seems to be too strong with the majority of this House to tolerate the use of silver coins except for small change in sums of $5 and under. While I shall vote for the silver bills, I shall do it regretfully, impressed as I am with the belief that the wisdom and experience of our country for eighty years have demonstrated the fact that the silver dollar can be safely employed as a full legal tender. I do it regretfully because by refusing to make the silver dollar a full legal tender Congress declares that a debased silver currency is good enough for labor, but capital must have its dues in gold. Sooner would I see gold go to the laborer.

These observations, hastily made, are intended merely to explain the votes which I shall be called on to give on the pending measure. While these measures are not what I could wish, I shall vote for one of them as the best I can obtain. The other I shall oppose.

I especially object to that portion of the bill authorizing the issue of ten millions of silver coin in exchange for a like amount of legal-tender notes as substantially locking up that amount of legal-tenders. The bill is wrong in that it provides for the re-issue of the legal-tender notes only upon the receipt from dues at the Treasury of a like amount of fractional currency and the re-issue of the legal-tenders upon the destruction of the $10,000,000 of fractional currency received from dues. It is apparent that the sum of ten millions of fraction currency will not be received from dues at the Treasury for many years. This currency is only receivable for small change and must come in slowly. The bill, then, looks, in my judgment, to a contractional of the legal-tender circulation to the amount of $10,000,000. I cannot consent in the present stringency of the money market to lock up permanently so large a sum of money. If an amendment had been allowed so that the legal-tenders received in exchange for the silver could be used as received at the Treasury I would gladly vote for the bill. But the gag is applied and no amendment allowed. I regret that the Committee on Banking and Currency have determined to give no relief to the want for small change now existing except at the expense of a contraction of the legal-tender circulation to the large amount of $10,000,000. To fly from the evils arising from a want of small change to the greater evil arising from so large a contraction of our legal-tender circulation is neither wise nor fair. I regret that the majority will give no relief to the people's distress for small change except at the expense of so deadly a thrust at our legal-tender circulation.

Commercial Relations with Canada.

SPEECH OF HON. GEORGE W. CATE,

OF WISCONSIN,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

June 15, 1876,

On the joint resolution (H. R. No. 14) authorizing the appointment of commissioners to ascertain on what terms a mutually beneficial treaty of commerce with Canada can be arranged.

Mr. CATE. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York [Mr. WARD] was eloquent and enthusiastic over the vast possessions known as the Dominion of Canada lying north of the United States, and thinks that the people of this country fail to appreciate the practical value of that immense region of country. It is perhaps too true that the great majority of our people have but an imperfect idea of the extent of the British possessions north of us, and but a faint conception of its great and varied resources. It is rich in fertile lands, in timber and lumber productions, in mineral wealth, in its fisheries and valuable peltry, and in agricultural products it is already a rival of our own country. Its inland seas, its navigable rivers, the finest on the globe, its harbors sufficient to accommodate the shipping of the whole world safe from storms and tempests, endow it with all the elements of an empire; and it must be confessed that there is much in the present and future of that immense region, stretching from ocean to ocean and hundreds of miles to the region of eternal snows at the north, to excite our admiration and cupidity; and were we now considering a question involving the acquisition of that country, we should take pleasure, as it would be a duty, to go more at length into its present situation and probable future. But this is not a question of purchase or acquisition; if it were, I doubt not some means would be found by the thrifty and enterprising statesmen of this country to secure it, let the price be what it may. Notwithstanding by far the larger portion of the territory in question is less valuable than Alaska because less accessible, isolated from all the world, with none to disturb its unending solitudes, still there is an empire in extent, capable of a great and varied and valuable production; indeed, its productions are already valuable and creditable to the industry and enterprise of its people. But in the character and magnitude of its productions lies the very obstacle in the way of reciprocal relations, if by that is meant free trade between this country and that. That is a dry question of business, to be settled wholly upon economical principles as applied to our own people, irrespective of the interests of the Canadian people. Undoubtedly it will be largely to the benefit and advantage of the Canadian provinces to have such commercial relations with the United States as will permit the free and unrestricted use of our channels of transportation to our own markets for their products; but it must be borne in mind that they constitute an independent foreign power, with no claims upon us except such as by the laws of nations one nation is bound to accord to another, and that the first and paramount duty of every government is to its own people. And this obligation is acknowledged and applied to-day in the tariff and revenue laws and regulations of every civilized nation on the globe.

For the protection of our own people against a foreign competition our Government has always imposed restrictions, by way of duties, upon the productions of other countries, designed to put our own people upon an equality with the producers of other countries, and neutralize advantages in price of labor and material, and therefore in cost of production. We once tried reciprocal relations with Canada. It did not prove satisfactory to our people, the entire agricultural population joining in demanding that the treaty should not be renewed; and it was the generally received opinion of the country that the treaty was highly injurious to that interest; that the benefits were all on one side—in favor of Canada. I can well understand that free trade is much to be desired between countries requiring the surplus products of its neighbor, but why it should be considered advantageous between countries producing precisely the same articles for export I am unable to see. We desire a market for our surplus pork, beef, butter, cheese, wool, barley, oats, pease, lumber, &c. Of these staple articles we not only more than supply our own home consumption, or would do so if left to ourselves, but we export largely of them. The Canadian provinces have a large surplus of these very productions over and beyond supplying their home demand, for which they are obliged to find a market outside of their own dominions. A very large amount in value of these surplus products finds a market in this country, notwithstanding the high duties now imposed by our tariff laws. The Canadian producer pays the duty on his products, and then puts them side by side with our products in our own markets. A great deal of rhetoric is displayed in taking a "broad and national view" of this question; but still the idea is very strongly impressed on my mind that nobody is benefited but those who are benefited by an overstocked market.

In 1854 partial reciprocal relations were agreed upon between the United States and Canada; they extended, however, only to the productions of the farm, lumber in its various forms, timber, shingles, products of our mines, and to the fisheries. That treaty, as everybody must see at a glance, was an arrangement in the interest of the Canadian producer and consumers in our own country, and in which the interest of the producers of those products in this country were entirely ignored, and the first class named were loud and constant in its praise, the latter never tired of denouncing it in the most unmeasured terms. The gentleman from New York says that it was for several years satisfactory. It never was satisfactory to anybody on this side of the line except to those whose interests were promoted by a full market. The articles embraced in that treaty constitute the entire exportable productions of Canada, and of the whole of which she always has a large surplus to sell. So do we. We also consume large quantities of such products in our cities and manufacturing districts and in our Army and Navy; but beyond these home demands we send large quantities to other countries. Under the treaty of 1854 our markets were flooded with Canadian products, if not to the practical exclusion, to the great injury of our own producers. The geographical position of the Dominion of Canada with reference to the lines of transportation to the great markets of this country enabled her to reach the great body of consumers in this country much quicker and at less expense than our own producers could, to the injury of the producers of such products in this country.

Taking for our text this idea, that the first duty of the Government is to its own subjects, let us see how a treaty removing all commercial restrictions with Canada will affect that class of our people who are engaged in the production of those products of which Canadian exports are chiefly composed; I speak now for the producers of our agricultural products, for our lumbermen and miners, a class of producers whose special interest in the adjustment of our tariff laws have as a rule been practically ignored, through the wisdom of statesmen who seem to have considered that the object and end of all tariff laws, so far as the question of protection was concerned in the adjustment of such laws, was to enable the manufacturer to realize a higher price for his goods than he would have otherwise been enabled to do. To accomplish this purpose there has been no end to the imposition of tariff duties on manufactured goods, and this class of statesmen have at the same time been willing to throw the gates wide open to unmanufactured goods to enable the manufacturer to buy as cheap as possible. And to more forcibly illustrate the truth of this statement is the fact of this discussion, in which it is proposed to let into our markets free of duty all the staple products of the only country on the globe whose productions are of the precise kind of the productions of our own country, and whose geographical position is such as to render her a dangerous rival in our own markets, and for which it is not easy to perceive any adequate compensation.

For the last fiscal year, ending 31st December there was imported into this country from the Canadian provinces about six million dollars' worth of barley, two million dollars' worth of animals, and two million dollars' worth of other kinds of grain and breadstuffs, and nearly another million dollars in butter, cheese, lard, &c.; and for the year 1873 the Canadians imported into the United States more than eleven million dollars' worth of lumber and lumber products; raw wool, $1,000,000; salt, $200,000. Of the productions of this country of a like kind there was exported to the Canadian provinces during the same time a very much less amount than was imported from the provinces into this country; but while there is nothing to show how much of the articles thus exported were for home consumption there, there is little doubt that the larger part was for exportation, because it is reasonable to suppose that a country which exports so largely of the same articles would be likely to supply her home consumption of her own productions instead of exporting to a foreign market, and buy her own supplies of the same article in such foreign market. Montreal has always been a large pork market where large quantities are packed and shipped away, and considerable pork in the carcass is marketed there from Northern Vermont, New Hampshire, and Maine, but it is not for home consumption It goes to England. It is not because the market is any better there, but because buyers for that market go through the country and buy at the price where purchased and ship to Montreal on their own account; and what is true in regard to this product is true of all the products of the farm, the forests, and the mines. Canada never can be a market for any considerable quantities of such products the growth of other countries, because the great and predominating industries in which her people are engaged are those of the farm, the forest, and the mines; her manufacturing interests are small—a dependency of the British Crown; toward whom, as toward all its dependencies, the policy of supplying with manufactured goods from its own looms and factories has been a principle of governmental policy.

A treaty of the kind proposed, so far as the productions of the two countries are concerned, is reciprocal only in name. The productions of Canada are not needed for consumption by our people. But it is said that the "agricultural productions of Canada, being identical with those of the Northern States, would be exchanged advantageously with the Southern States for their products." The answer to this argument is that such exchanges will deprive our own producers of a home market for their products just to the extent to which these foreign products are admitted, and drive the surplus products of our country away from home for a market. What statesmanship or justice is there in dividing our home market with a foreign producer free of impost duties, the effect of which would be, as I have before shown, to give him an advantage in our great produce markets, because more accessible to him than to the principal grain-growing regions of the United States, and would be an outrage upon our people for which there is no justification? Perhaps the injury does not lie so much in the influence the importation of Canadian products has thus far had upon the value of the like products of our own country, as in the fact that it is proposed to admit such products free of duty, thereby diminishing our revenue receipts by many millions of dollars, increasing the burdens of our own people to that extent, and is in effect a clean gift of that amount to our Canadian neighbors. I say a clean gift, because it is not probable that the imports of agricultural products from that quarter would be materially increased by a removal of the duties, as in the last year of the late reciprocal treaty all the imports were $39,000,000, and for the last fiscal year the value of imports was about $33,000,000. Of course the tendency of impost duties is to check importations, having more or less force, depending upon the rate of duty; but there is little doubt that the bulk of the Canadian productions imported into this country came here because it was the best market notwithstanding the duty. But the importations from Canada of the products of the farm is a serious injury to the farmers of the West.

Take the article of barley, for which there is no export demand and the home consumption limited to the wants of brewers and malsters. Last year there was imported into the United States for consumption over six and one half million dollars' worth of barley and barley malt, upon which there was paid a duty of $972,789.62. We imported over a million bushels of oats, upon which there was paid a duty of $121,936. And in addition the Canadians find a market here for their surplus butter, cheese, lard, pease, buckwheat, bran and mill-feed, bread and biscuit, rice, rye and rye flour, &c. Now is there any reason why a foreign people should supply our own home demand with articles of which we raise a surplus, and in which our production would be largely increased if a market could be found? In the article of barley the Canadian producer has actually driven our western farmers out of the eastern markets. He is near at hand, with convenient transportation; he watches the market, and is enabled to take advantage of any demand and supply it before the western man, by reason of the greater distance his goods have to travel, can get to market. There need be no fear that the consumers will be imposed upon by the high price of these articles if foreign competition is shut out, because in a country so vast in extent and where so large a portion of it is adapted to the production of breadstuffs and must be used for that purpose, and in the production of which a large majority of the people must necessarily be engaged, competition and amount of production will keep prices at a point near the actual cost of production.

But our commercial relations with Canada are said to be "exceptional," if anybody knows what that means, for they are exceptional only in the ease and facility with which its products can be introduced to our markets. To us Canada is to all intents and purposes a foreign country, and should be treated as such. Is the introduction of its products into our markets any the less injurious to our producers because the growth of contiguous territory? In countries remote from ours, distance itself, by increasing the cost of transportation, will afford protection against foreign competition, but from the productions of contiguous territory there is no protection from foreign interference at all, unless it be found in the imposition of such duties as will exclude them. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WARD] says that the argument that the products of the "panper labor" of other countries should not be admitted to compete with our own citizens, has no reference to a contiguous territory from which people may pass to the United States in a few hours; but he has not told us why it has no such application. The necessity is the same, for the injury is alike and much greater in case of contiguous territory, for the reason above mentioned, namely, nearness to our markets and facility of ingress. Further on the gentleman says:

> Another argument from the same class of theorists is derived from the importance of a "home market." But a home market is the market nearest home, and this is furnished by the respective countries to each other at every point of their conterminous territory.

No nation in the world has ever acted in accordance with this idea in the adjustment of its tariff laws, so far as I have learned; but, on the contrary, precisely the opposite has been the universally received doctrine, that "home market" means a home market to the people of the country within which it is located; and it is clearly a perversion of the understanding of everybody to say that New York, Boston, and Chicago are the home markets of the people of any other government, or that Quebec and Montreal are the home markets of the people of the United States. It is opposed to the grand principle upon which all protection is founded, and without which such laws cannot be sustained, that the people of a country who support, maintain, and defend it by their money and valor shall be protected in the sale of the productions thereof in their own country—in their "home market," so to speak—from an unjust and injurious competition from other countries. It seems to me that the speech of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WARD] is a labored effort in behalf of the Canadian producer. Nobody on this side of the line has requested any such thing, excepting, of course, the cities interested in breaking down every obstacle that tends in the slightest degree to prevent them from becoming great centers in the commercial world, and also excepting those engaged in the lines of transportation benefited by such an arrangement; all others are opposed to it. While on the other side of the line the people are clamorous for a new treaty, every effort was made by them immediately upon the expiration of the old treaty to have it renewed, and a delegation visited this city for that purpose and sought by every means in their power to induce a renewal of the treaty; and since that time they have never ceased to urge upon Congress the propriety of such an arrangement. But the people of this country have never shared in that feeling. That the treaty was profitable to Canada does not admit of doubt; their solicitude for its renewal is evidence of that, if there was none other; but there is plenty; it was a saving to her producers of millions every year in the way of duties, while upon everything of the productions of this country for which there was any demand in the provinces there was imposed a heavy duty. And why must any reciprocal arrangements that are likely to be entered into with Canada be unsatisfactory to the people of this country? Because the exports of Canada consist chiefly of raw productions of the farm and forest, of which we export little or none for consumption there. Says the gentleman:

> The admission of these articles between the two countries duty free is not the most just or desirable form of reciprocity.

This expresses the whole question in a nutshell and in a few words the whole secret of the opposition to reciprocal relations between the two countries; and there is no prospect that any arrangement can be made that will at all compensate the producers of farm and forest products for the injurious competition from Canadian products; neither is it clear in what way the country is to be compensated for the revenue lost to the Government consequent upon admitting such products free of duty.

In addition to admitting free of duty the products of the farm, as under the treaty of 1854, it is now proposed to admit into each country duty free, manufactured products. Such an arrangement might be a benefit to manufacturers on both sides and to the producer of farm and forest products in the provinces, but it does not alter the status of the producers in this country; if we could do the manufacturing for the world it would benefit all classes of our citizens, and especially the producers of breadstuffs, in the increased market it would afford for such products. But such an advantage is all lost, if in securing that we permit the nations whose manufacturing we do to furnish all the breadstuffs demanded to sustain such manufacturing and more beside. The establishment of manufacturing within a country benefits the farmer by reason of the greater demand for his products at home, but it is no benefit to him if another country with equal or better facilities for doing so is permitted to supply the extra demand made necessary by such manufacturing. But this is all the merest speculation possible. Reciprocal relations with Canada while it retains its present relations with Great Britain cannot be extended to include the products of our looms and factories, neither do I believe that our manufacturers will consent to throw open our ports to the products of the English factories; it must extend to that to be of any benefit to our people. Why, our manufacturers have always claimed to be unable to compete in our own markets with British goods, and at their instigation all such goods have been charged with a rate of duty sufficient to overcome the pretended difference in cost of manufacture. If free trade or reciprocal relations less than free trade in manufactured articles is desired by our manufacturers, how comes it that while the Canadian government has imposed an average duty of 17½ per cent. on manufactured goods imported from this country, our Government imposes a duty of 40 to 60 per cent. upon the same class of goods imported from Canada into this country? The reason is obvious; the Canadians do not fear our manufactured goods in their markets. No kinds of wearing apparel or goods made of wool, cotton, flax, or silk made in this country have ever maintained any standing in the Canadian markets, for the best of all reasons, that better goods of English or Canadian manufacture would undersell our goods in that market, and there has never been a time since I came to years of understanding that woolen, cotton, and silk wearing apparel could not be purchased in Canada at from 60 to 70 per cent. the cost in the States; it is so to-day, and is a fact well known to those who have had occasion to know anything of the matter, and explains the reason why Canada can afford to appear liberal in the adjustment of its tariff laws with regard to goods manufactured in this country, and why our Government cannot afford to meet them half way. Why are the class of goods before alluded to cheaper in Canada than the same class of goods in this country? Because either the cloth of the goods, or the material of which it is made, is admitted into the provinces duty free; the manufactured goods coming from England, the product of pauper labor, and at such less cost than we can produce the same kind of goods, that, as the gentleman says, unless some restrictions can be imposed upon the importation into Canada, reciprocal relations with that country would enable its merchants to drive our goods out of our own markets. If the Canadian provinces were an independent government some practical scheme for reciprocal relations might be devised, but so long as those provinces remain dependencies of the British Crown no treaty stipulations need be looked for that involves an exclusion of British manufactures from the provinces. The prosperity of England lies in her unrivaled system of manufactures, sustained largely by the markets afforded in her extensive colonies. This trade with her own colonies, and of which she of course holds a monopoly, she will not be likely to surrender to any other power. And I apprehend our manufacturers are not anxious for such relations with Canada as will permit the products of the English looms to come into our markets free.

The fact that large quantities of wheat and wheat flour are imported into Canada and exported from there to other countries proves nothing in favor of such a treaty. Unless our exportable products find consumption in Canada, there is no reciprocation for the importation of her products which enter into consumption here, because it amounts to nothing more or less than so much of our exportable products reaching a foreign market through the Dominion, which they would certainly reach, without the interference of Canadian dealers, through other channels; in other words, by this arrangement with Canada we shall find no new or additional market for a single bushel of grain.

How is the producer of barley, whose home market is destroyed by the importation of Canadian barley, benefited by the transit of ever so much wheat through that province to a foreign market? Of course not at all. If Canada is able to afford us an additional market beyond the well-known markets we already have, there would be some compensation for the admission of her products duty free. There can be no reciprocity in farm products between the two countries for a reason that must not be lost sight of, namely; the principal products which Canada desires to introduce to our market are products for which there is no foreign demand, products that will not bear transportation—barley, pease, beans, oats, animals, potatoes, wool, lumber, and rice—articles that are consumed here, and therefore have an appreciable bearing on the value of our own like productions and are directly in competition with them, while on the other side the farm products Canada takes from us, wheat and wheat flour and meats, are staple articles of export, and which we do export in large quantities, and of course for which there is always a foreign demand; consequently it is not a benefit arising under a treaty with Canada that the foreign demand reaches us through Canada; it would reach us just the same were there no treaty, but through other channels, if her merchants had not interfered. They did not create the demand; they were but the medium in supplying it. Suppose there had been no foreign demand, would Canada have purchased of us for export or at all? Certainly not. She buys of us to sell again, not to new customers, but to the same customers to whom we have always sold our surplus wheat; and the interference is no benefit to us.

It is thus seen that the injury to our producers lies not in the exchange of grain or other products for which there is an export demand in both countries, which would carry off any surplus, but in an exchange on our part of products for which there is always an export demand for products for which there is none in either country. Take barley as an example, for which there is no export demand. The entire consumption of this article in the United States is about 29,000,000 bushels. Of this amount New England and New York furnish 8,500,000 bushels, California 8,000,000 bushels, Canada over 6,000,000 bushels, (or over one-fifth of the whole consumption,) and the Western States the balance, showing that in the great markets of New York, Boston, Albany, and other eastern markets the State of New York is the only competitor the Canadian producer finds. By reason of his proximity to those markets he is able to keep the western producer at home, to the extent at least of the Canadian crop. It cannot be denied the admission of a foreign product bearing so large a proportion to the whole consumptive demand must have an injurious effect upon the home grower.

The question of transit for our products through the Dominion, on their way to a foreign market, ought not to be taken into consideration as compensating us for surrendering a home market which we have always been able to more than supply, because the question of transportation is one that will take care of itself. If the carrying trade is of any importance to the Canadians, they will make it an object for shippers to go that way, which can only be by making their route as cheap and expeditious, or more so, than any other, taking into consideration the impost duties. Of course the free navigation of the Saint Lawrence is desirable as a competing line with others to the sea-board, but is not indispensable to the prosperity of this country; happily for us we are not in any sense dependent upon any foreign power for transportation privileges, but have within our own borders unequaled facilities for reaching tide-water, and it is not at all probable that the enterprise and pride of our people will ever permit this carrying trade to be diverted to a foreign channel. But, as before remarked, that is a question which may be adjusted without requiring our producers to make unjust and unfair concessions. Our routes of transportation are quite as important to the Canadians as theirs are to us, and they will be quite willing to concede free transit to our products through their territory for the same privilege through our territory.

The gentleman from New York complains that the people of Canada are enlarging their facilities of transportation for the purpose of driving away from this country the transit of their own products, doing that which every government ought to do: provide the facilities for doing the carrying trade of its own products through its own territory; what our own country will no doubt do with regard to its own products. If the advantages flowing from the transit of our products through its territory are not sufficient to induce the government of Canada to remove unnecessary obstructions, the means will no doubt be found to furnish the necessary transportation in our own country. I do not understand that there has ever been any restrictions in the navigation of the Saint Lawrence River, except the tolls imposed for passing the Welland Canal; neither is it probable there will be, it is so largely to the interest of the Canadians to induce the use of that route. The people of this country will never consent to unjust and unreasonable concessions for the partial benefits arising from affording our railroads and canals an opportunity to carry Canadian produce. The benefit of this mere carrying is confined to a comparatively small portion of our people, while the injury arising from the admission of Canada products free would be an injury to the whole country.

Mr. Speaker, another benefit to the Canadians and corresponding injury to this country resulting from reciprocity is in the admission of lumber products free of duty. If there is any principle which may be said to be established in the adjustment of our revenue tariffs it is that the duties shall be so imposed as to protect the manufactures of this country against unfavorable competition from other countries; and so long as this principle remains the acknowledged policy of the Government I insist that an exception shall not be made against so important an interest as that of the manufacture of lumber. With equal propriety the duty on salt or sugar or iron might be repealed. The admission of lumber free of duty, by leaving it optional with the Canadians whether they would send the bulk of their productions here or ship as now to foreign countries, would so derange the business here as to be of serious injury.

The Canadian provinces are large producers of lumber products aggregating many hundred millions annually, going principally to countries beyond the seas; but, suppose such markets should for any cause be temporarily inaccessible, as in case of war, it would leave this vast production to be turned into our markets, resulting in great injury to the lumber interests of this country. The lumbermen of that country have an advantage over people engaged in the same business in this country, in this, that the price of labor is cheaper, cattle, horses, and provisions are cheaper than such articles are here, and in addition the facilities for reaching the lumber markets of this country are better from the mills in Canada, where manufactured, than from the pineries of this country. Therefore, as a rule, the Canadian dealer can put his lumber down in our market and pay the present duty at less actual cost than our dealers can deliver their own lumber at the same place. The idea of those in this country who favor free trade in lumber that the admission of lumber free of duty will cheapen the price in this country is undoubtedly an error unless the importation is sufficiently large to overstock the market. Taking the highest yearly importation of the last ten years, say, six hundred million feet, it would be an amount too trifling to affect a market in which the average annual sales cannot be less than ten thousand million feet. It is, therefore, a question of revenue purely. Under the present rate of duty imposed upon lumber products, there is levied and collected as part of the revenues and used in defraying expenses of Government as much as $1,500,000, and very nearly the same amount is collected on the importation of barley, wheat, rye, oats, and breadstuffs imported from Canada into this country; and I apprehend the producers of farm products will not consent to the admission of farm products free of duty. And is there any good reason why any distinction should be made between these two classes of products? Those who favor the admission of lumber free affect to believe that it cheapens lumber; but this I believe to be an error, taking the average importations of the last ten years as a basis. But a small portion of the lumber products of Canada finds a market in the United States, showing that the lumber market here does not control that of Canada; because, if it did, more lumber would be sent here. Other markets, beyond our influence, control and govern the market there, and there has never been, either under reciprocity or since, any attempt to make the United States a general market for Canada lumber, but the trade has been exceptional, confined entirely to the orders of American dealers for the delivery of specific kinds and quantities, designed to supply a particular trade, never beyond that, and as a rule confined to the lower grades. The advocate of free lumber supposes the imposition of a duty will diminish importations; but the truth is that the trade has never attained sufficient magnitude to be affected by that consideration at all, as is proved by the fact that importations have largely increased since the repeal of the reciprocity treaty; that since there has been imposed a duty of $2 to $2.50 per thousand feet the amount of lumber imported has more than quadrupled the amount imported under free trade, while the price in the States was higher during and under free-trade regulations, say from 1854 to 1866, than since the expiration of the treaty, showing that causes entirely independent of the question of "duty" have governed the lumber trade between the United States and Canada.

In further proof of this idea that the treaty regulations with Canada had no influence on the market value of lumber in Canada is the fact that immediately after the termination of the reciprocity treaty and the imposition of a duty of 20 per cent. ad valorem the price of lumber advanced in the principal lumbering districts. Now, sir, I should like to hear some reason assigned for such a measure. No man can demonstrate that it will cheapen lumber or that any possible advantage will result to this country to compensate for taking $1,500,000 out of the public Treasury in the way of surrendered duties and putting it in the pockets of a few importers of Canada lumber, as I have stated that importations have increased since the duty was imposed; that lumber in the States has not risen in price, but, on the contrary, has diminished, while in Canada the price did not fall as was apprehended when a 20 per cent. duty was imposed, but, on the contrary, the price advanced, showing that the Canadian market was not influenced by the impost duties. What service has Canada ever rendered to this country that we should extend to her people this extraordinary and exceptional privilege, taking this large sum of money from the Treasury of an overtaxed people and putting it into the pockets of the subjects of a power which through an unjust and unfriendly policy contributed materially to the present embarrassments of the country?

Those engaged in the business of manufacturing lumber in the United States regard the proposition to admit lumber free of duty as a blow aimed at that important interest, and containing within it an implied assertion that they are reaping larger profits in the business than is just and reasonable, as compared with the profits of other industries.

I represent, sir, on this floor a district that manufactures annually 1,000,000,000 feet of lumber, and have resided there for thirty years, and am acquainted with the business in all its branches, and have personally participated in it in all its various departments, and feel confident of my ability to speak understandingly in regard thereto; During the war and since its close to within the last few years, the business of lumbering had been fairly remunerative, nothing beyond, but for the past five years I assert that the business has been prosecuted at a loss, arising not because more lumber has been made than is really needed in the country, but because of the embarrassed condition of all branches of industry, and the consequent inability of the people to buy and pay for as much lumber as their necessities require, producing general stagnation in the business and an accumulation of lumber in all the principal markets, to remain an indefinite time on a constantly falling market, awaiting an opportunity to sell at any price. Hundreds of hitherto prosperous lumbermen have been obliged to succumb to the embarrassments of the situation, prostrated by the loss of idle capital and eaten up by the payment of interest in vainly trying to "bridge over" the hard times. But unfortunately the chasm is too wide. Says a western journal:

> Western lumber interests have in a variety of ways suffered terribly during several years past. Between fires, freshets, explosions, and a long list of casualties, to which depressed markets and monopoly extortions may be added, not only the prosperity but very existence of a large percentage of our enterprising northern population is seriously menaced. The financial pressure has forced the partial or total suspension of many of the largest mill companies. Floods have now swept many hundred millions of feet of logs into the Mississippi, or worse, out upon the bottoms; booms, dams, and other structures have been destroyed, and many localities can scarcely fail to suffer severe privations from the general calamity. All this, too, at a time when losses of any kind would be doubly felt by the stricken population.
>
> But the most serious feature of the case is that, as in other avocations, general impoverishment has exhausted the means of consumers and sales are everywhere limited. Cities and villages are scarcely growing at all, the farms no longer allow of large expenditures, and immigration and new settlement have nearly ceased, so that at best the promise of future profit is not encouraging. * * * If there is any relief in store it will not come through shrinking the currency, destroying half the value of every citizen's property, drying up the very fountains of enterprise, or in making our paper money an absolute monopoly in the hands of a few thousand bankers, banded together to plunder if not ruin the country. If our lumbermen do not look to Congress, and force protection from their Representatives, the interest has blue times in prospect.

Sir, it is under such circumstances as these that the lumbermen of this country feel keenly the influence in a market already glutted by the introduction of five or six hundred millions of foreign lumber, when the great effort is not for profits, but cost of manufacture and transportation; and I take upon myself the responsibility of asserting that the results of the business for the last four or five years have been unsatisfactory to lumbermen, to all classes, absolutely ruinous to the smaller class of operators; and those doing business on an entirely solid basis, whose means were ample and whose facilities enabled them to do business in the most economical manner, and take advantage of every possible circumstance, are unable to show any profit over expenses, and the great effort of all has been to escape utter ruin.

No effort should be made to antagonize the agricultural against the lumber interest in this country, but these interests should stand together; the prosperity of both is necessary to the prosperity of either, and the prosperity of the agricultural is not more necessary to the lumbering interests than is the prosperity of the lumbering interest essential to the agricultural interest. They are mutually beneficial, and any measure or policy that cripples either one will surely injure the other. With equal propriety might the extensive and powerful lumber interests of this country combine to facilitate and cheapen the introduction of all the immense supplies, chiefly the products of the farm, used in lumbering, as that any class of producers shall combine to admit foreign lumber into our markets to compete with the productions of our own country. The agriculture of this country cannot afford to strike a blow that shall cripple or embarrass the lumber interest; it is a blow that would rebound and inflict a corresponding injury upon the one setting it in motion; and it is very apparent to my mind that free trade in farm and forest products would be greatly to the injury of the farmers. It is estimated that in the three States of Michigan, Wisconsin, and Minnesota, being those States in which the greater portion of the lumber of this country is manufactured, there are employed in that business about one hundred thousand persons, the greater portion of whom, of course, have families to which, applying the common ratio, and we have five hundred thousand persons dependent for support from the wages of persons employed in lumbering. To this number are to be added those engaged in the transportation from mills to yards and the handling and disposition of it until it reaches the consumer, and we have some idea of the vast population gaining its support out of the business of lumbering.

The producer of farm products will not be likely to underestimate the advantages of close proximity to the lumber districts in the market afforded for the vast amount of corn, oats, wheat flour, beef, pork, cattle and horses, and other farm products required to carry on the business in all its branches. The lumber districts as a market are not to be ignored. They are the best market the farmer has to the extent of their demand. It is so in the State I in part represent: the markets in the pineries for farm products are the best markets in the State and the consumption of farm products is immense. Farm lands are worth more in the neighborhood of the pineries upon the principle that distance from market is an important factor in determining the value of farm lands, and nowhere is this more apparent than in close proximity to the lumber region.

In the city of Stevens Point in my district and a principal market in the Wisconsin River pineries, in which supplies for lumbering are extensively bought and sold, the prices of all kinds of farm products entering into supplies for lumbering are greater than in either Milwaukee or Chicago, the great markets of the West. Now does anybody suppose that it will be cheaper to buy lumber of the Canadians and lose the home market and be obliged to send to a distant and uncertain market the products that would otherwise be consumed at home, and in that way pay transportation on the lumber from Canada and on the products of the farm sent abroad? Not only is the country benefited in the matter of a market for its products, but employment is provided for thousands who would otherwise be idle when the labors of the farm did not demand their attention, and the spare teams of the farm, which would otherwise stand idle, a bill of expense to the owner, find profitable employment during the winter months.

As a rule, a home market is better for the producer than a foreign market, because in his own market he gets the full value of the product, with no deductions for risks and commissions, which are all charged to him when his produce is purchased to go to a foreign market. A purchaser of Milwaukee wheat to go to Europe keeps a margin to cover risk against loss, insurance, and safety from a falling market, and, therefore, cannot afford to pay as much as he who buys for immediate consumption; and the difference to the producer when wheat is worth $1 in Chicago in favor of that market and against the English market is not less than 20 cents per bushel; that is, the shipper buys upon as wide a margin as that.

It seems incredible to me that gentlemen on this floor can seriously urge a policy of free trade with a country which buys of us for home consumption none of our great staple articles of exports, but exports largely herself of the same articles, and whose immense territory when brought under cultivation will enable her to become a dangerous rival in our own market in the sale of agricultural products, and must prove injurious to the manufacture of lumber, a branch of business intimately connected with the prosperity of the country. However much we may desire the prosperity of a sister-republic, is it a wise policy for us to minister to such prosperity to the injury of ourselves? It is not so much of to-day that we are considering this question, but of the future, as a permanent policy is desirable by which the enterprise and industry of the people will be governed, and to which the business of the two countries may adjust and settle itself.

We have seen that the exportable articles of the Canadians, the products of the farm and forests, already reach hundreds of millions of dollars annually, to be increased to an indefinite extent in the near future, already a population of over four millions, three-fourths of whom inhabit territory south of our northern boundary of Maine and Minnesota, and the gentleman from New York says "favorable to the growth of wheat, barley, and other cereals of the North;" and it is a proposition admitting of no contradiction, that the immense populations that will in the future possess this wide expanse of fertile lands and illimitable forests must be producers alone of the products of the farm and the forest. From the very nature of the country, its people must be an agricultural people, with limited manufactures, and therefore its home market will be unimportant; all its vast productions must seek a foreign market. And do the farmers of this country desire to initiate a policy through which such immense quantities of farm products may be thrown into their markets and compete with their products? It is well for them to consider this question in all its bearings; no policy will be agreed upon which will be partially beneficial to one interest and prejudicial to another; there will be no admission of lumber products free of duty and a prohibitory law as to farm products, but justice to manufacturers of lumber will demand for them that if lumber is admitted free, the tendency of which would be to diminish the price of lumber, farm products should be admitted free, so that they might supply the vast demands of their business in the most favorable market.

Has labor no demands for recognition at our hands that we should so legislate as to jeopardize the support of more than half a million of persons dependent upon labor in the various branches of lumbering in this country, by diminishing the demand for such labor and rendering it more uncertain and precarious, at the same time, by our legislation building up and increasing the demand for labor in the Canadas? Such legislation will demoralize and render more uncertain the prosecution of the lumber interest in this country by making it impossible for those engaged in the business to form any reliable estimate of the amount of lumber to be thrown upon the markets of this country in any given year, because the action of the Canadian lumbermen cannot be anticipated. The average consumption of lumber in the United States is well known to those engaged in the business, and also the productive capacities of the different lumber districts to contribute to such consumptive demands, and by this knowledge each manufacturer regulates his particular business to meet the demand and prevent any large accumulation, always so injurious; and it is a wholesome law of trade that the supply will accommodate itself to the demand, though circumstances beyond human foresight, such as war or the failure of crops, may diminish the demand; and so may an unpropitious season diminish the supply, but the derangement from these causes will be but temporary, and eventually the law of supply and demand will assert its power. But under the régime of free trade it will be in the power of the Canadians to demoralize the lumber-markets of this country at their mere will and pleasure, and it will no longer be in the power of any to anticipate the supply of lumber for our own markets. An accumulation in foreign markets, a foreign war rendering the transportation by sea hazardous, may induce them to throw all their vast lumber products into our markets, producing plethora in the market to the injury of those engaged in that business and benefit to nobody, or, after furnishing a yearly supply until it comes to be regarded as a fixed element in regulating the lumber supply of the country, a sudden rise in their foreign market would induce the withholding from our markets of every board of their usually large supply, producing scarcity and high prices here, to be followed in the succeeding year, when our own crop is stimulated to a large supply by the apparent scarcity, by a large importation from Canada. The results must be mischievous. It gives the Canadians an important advantage over us in this, that it gives them a choice of markets and enables them to send to us the lower grades of lumber, that will not bear transportation seaward, and which it is an object to dispose of at almost any price, but which always has a depressing influence upon the better grades of lumber with which it comes in contact.

But we are told that the free and unrestricted importation of Canadian lumber will tend to the preservation of our pine forests and that it is good economy to first use up the forests of Canada, keeping our own to future generations. I would submit to no waste of the valuable timbers of this country, but a sharp economy should be enforced in its manufacture. People do not as a rule destroy property of their own that is valuable, but are heedless in the preservation of that which possesses little or no value; therefore, to my mind, a fair price for lumber will do more toward preventing waste than anything else. Make it an object and advantage to cut close and it will be done; so, on the other hand, when from any cause the common grades do not pay for the handling, less care will be observed in the manufacture, and only the best will be taken. Remunerative prices induce economy in the handling.

I would not rob posterity to enrich the present, neither would I impoverish the present to benefit an uncertain future. Take care of the present, and let the future take care of itself, is pretty sound doctrine as applied to the temporal affairs of life. The lumbering business of this country has already attained to giant proportions; the timber has already passed into the hands of individuals as an investment; the machinery and appliances necessary to carry on the business have cost millions of dollars; thousands have embarked their all in the business; they are obliged to go on; to stop is ruin; and it is the sheerest folly in the world to attempt to curtail and restrict the business by the enactment of laws for the purpose of preserving the timber to future generations. As well prohibit the working of the lead, iron, and coal mines for fear that future generations will have none. The present owns the timber; has all the means for its manufacture; it has improved harbors and rivers at a vast expenditure of its money to facilitate its transportation to market; it has an abundance of labor that needs employment; it has a surplus of breadstuffs, cattle, horses, and provender for which a market is wanted; and lastly, it needs the lumber. Are all these requirements to be answered by purchasing our lumber of foreigners? No; because that involves the rotting and rusting of our machinery, the sending of our products to a foreign market, the idleness of thousands of laborers, the building up the manufactories of another country, and the pulling down of our own.

Let us utilize the resources of our country in the best possible manner and supply the lumber demands of the present from our own forests, and when some uncertain and yet unborn future finds itself short of lumber it will be time enough to buy of the Canadians. Let us see how much danger there is of a failure of timber. The forests of Europe are 500,000,000 acres, North America 1,500,000,000 acres, and South America 700,000,000 acres.

A diversified industry is the best, and it cannot be doubted that the agricultural interests of this country have been greatly benefited by proximity to the lumbering regions, aside from the facilities thus afforded of obtaining its supplies of lumber. While farm laborers have in my State been paid from fifteen to twenty dollars as monthly wages, lumbermen have been in the habit of paying from twenty-five to forty dollars per month; and by its great consumption of the farm and manufactured products of the country adds greatly to the wealth and prosperity of all.

The policy that would encourage the foreign manufacture of lumber to supply our home demand would also encourage the manufacture in other countries of every fence-nail and horseshoe used in this country, to the exclusion of our own material, of which we have such an abundance. For there is no question but the pauper labor of Europe can furnish these articles to us at a less cost than our workmen can afford to furnish the same articles. There can be no distinction, and unless we are prepared to surrender the manufacturing interests of this country to the cheaper labor of other countries, all the industrial interests should stand firm against every attempt to break up the long-settled policy of the Government to advance some special interest. The argument used by the consumers of lumber is, that free trade will cheapen that commodity in our markets. I speak for the farmers, who are the principal consumers; but it must be remembered that the proposition under discussion also proposes free trade in farm products, which, by the same rule, would also be cheapened, and therefore it necessarily results that if we have cheaper lumber we have cheaper farm products to buy it with.

Cheap lumber, as well as everything else we buy, is desirable, but not below a fair compensation for its production. But I am satisfied that, with the average price or rate of labor for the last ten years and the cost of the necessary appliances entering into the production of lumber, that industry has paid a less profit than many other interests in this country. It is desirable that those who propose to put this important interest upon a level with foreign manufactures should remember that almost the whole cost of lumber is made up of labor, the labor of our own people, and that a reduction in the actual cost price of lumber involves a reduction in the price paid for labor. Cheap lumber means cheap labor. Free trade in lumber involves just these considerations. Put the laborers of this country upon a par with the laborers of Canada and Europe and you may have cheaper lumber and cheaper iron, but not otherwise; for a competition powerful enough to break down monopolies in this country will keep the price within reason as compared with the cost of production.

Are the people of this country prepared to embark in a policy the tendency of which is to put the laboring-man on a level with the cheaper labor of other countries? If so, they must accept with it all the conditions attaching to cheap labor as the same exist wherever cheap labor prevails. It brings the mud hovel and the straw roof, the scantiest of fare, unschooled and half-naked children, wives who never see the inside of a church because the second calico dress is wanting, and husbands whose aspirations never rise above the conditions of a debasing and demoralizing servitude.

Early in the ministerial career of Sir Robert Peel he sought to establish the permanency and prosperity of the manufacturing interests of Great Britain, and to secure to her the patronage of the world, by providing a supply of labor that should be enduring by reason of being wholly dependent upon a daily labor for the absolute necessaries of life, and above which they could never rise, to effect which the compensation of the operatives was fixed at a price that would barely supply the means of keeping soul and body together in a condition of wretched poverty. Pinched by want and dwarfed by overwork, they had neither the ability nor the opportunity to aspire to anything better, and therefore the aspirations of the great statesman have been fully realized, and generation succeeds generation among these people only, as it would appear, to realize his hopes of furnishing a supply of laborers for the factories of England. And at the close of life he boasted that he had anchored the manufacturing interests of his native country deep in the bed-rock of prosperity, and the historian will add that he had anchored the lives of generations of his fellow-countrymen in poverty and ignorance. What are the conditions of labor in the manufacturing districts of England as compared with the price of labor in this country? Skilled labor in the mills and factories in England is paid $6 to $8 per week. In this country the same class of labor is paid $18 to $24 per week. This is a nation of toilers in the workshops, in the mines, in the forests, and at the plow, and all classes properly appreciate the dignity of labor, and no policy should be adopted the tendency of which is the debasement of labor. Now, if the Canadian lumbermen can undersell us in our own markets, it is solely because lumber in Canada can be manufactured cheaper than in the States; and if it can be made cheaper there than here, it is because labor and breadstuffs are cheaper there than here; and if lumber is admitted free of duty, resulting in reducing the price, our lumbermen will be obliged to protect themselves from such ruinous competition by reducing the price of labor in our pineries; and this policy of admitting foreign lumber and foreign breadstuffs free, once initiated, may be applied to all the manufacturing interests of this country, resulting in the destruction of our most important industries.

This result follows if it is true that free lumber and free farm products lessen the price; but if it is not true that the removal of the duty on forest and farm products will reduce the cost of those products in our markets, then why remove the duty, why take several millions of dollars out of our Treasury and put it in the pockets of a few Canadian dealers? The people of the United States pay for the privileges of their market and the protection the law affords them in their persons and property. Let the foreign tradesman do likewise. It is a fallacy to suppose England will ever consent to any regulation which will place their manufacturers and ours upon an equality in the Canadian markets, or that our manufactures will ever consent to any regulation which will permit the introduction of English goods via Canada free of duty. Such regulations are impossible, arising as they do out of the conditions of labor in the two countries. The British, acting through the Canadian government, will at any moment consent to free trade in manufactured goods; it is just what they want, and is evidenced by their nominal tariff; while the views of our manufacturers are abundantly proven by our practically prohibitory tariff of 40 to 60 per cent., as before stated.

But Mr. WARD says that "manufactures are not the only form of industry which is worthy of consideration; the interests of our merchants and forwarders, as well as the people of Canada, are seriously injured by the present obstacles to their intercourse." This may all be true and undoubtedly is true; but it furnishes no reasons for the adoption of a policy that must be of great injury to other important interests in this country, and involves the surrender of millions of dollars by way of duties now paid, putting it in the most favorable light, for the benefit of the "Canadians and our merchants and forwarders."

We are advised by those who advise the taking a "broad national view of the question" that the difficulities now existing between the two countries may all be solved by the adoption of the principles of the Zollverein or Prussian confederacy of the German states, the principles of which are, that there shall be entire and unrestricted freedom of imports, exports, and transit among all the states which belong to the confederacy. But it must be borne in mind that the conditions upon which an arrangement would be admissible between the independent German states, and prove beneficial there, do not exist between the United States and Canada, and without which such an arrangement could not be tolerated anywhere. Throughout the German confederacy the conditions of labor are essentially alike, that is, the price of labor is the same all over. Little raw material is exported; manufacturing is an important industry, and the cost of manufactured goods is the same in all parts of the confederacy. So there seemed to be nothing in the way of a free and unrestricted commerce among those states.

But the conditions of labor in this country and in Canada and in England, who does the manufacturing for the Canadians, are not the same, labor being much the highest in this country. Consequently the cost of the products of this country and Canada are not essentially the same, costing less in Canada than here, resulting in cheapening products in this country through a cheapening of the price of labor. Another consideration in favor of the Zollverein among the German states is found in the fact that the people of those states are one people, governed by the same system of government, a consideration absent in the relations of this country and Canada—one a monarchy, whose people have hitherto failed to appreciate republican institutions.

Mr. Speaker, I have thus attempted to state my opposition to any treaty with the Canadian provinces which shall permit the introduction of their farm and forest products free of duty, and I am also opposed to the appointment of any commissioners with a view to any such treaty, because I believe the scheme is pregnant with mischief to the people of this country. The present system is wholly in the interest of Canada and eastern merchants and forwarders, and ought to be revised to the practical exclusion of Canadian farm and forest products, because the admission of such products rob our own producers of a market at home, in the right to which they ought to be protected. Mr. WARD says that the "Canadians have it in their power, and it could be no just cause of complaint by us, to adopt our scale of duties. The effect of which would be to inflict serious injury on our manufacturers, by excluding their products from the Canadian markets." Does anybody suppose the Canadian tariff is arranged in our interest, or that our interest will be consulted in its revision or continuance, or that it will not be increased or diminished as the interests of that country may require? If it is true, as stated by the gentleman, that a large portion of the manufactures we export "so extensively" to Canada, such as copper, brass, lead, cotton, &c., are admitted free of duty, or at a mere nominal duty of 5 to 10 per cent., and that those charged at higher rates than 17½ per cent. are few in number and insignificant in quantity, how much more of these products would we export there under free trade? According to the gentleman's own showing there is little or no obstruction in the way of our manufactures now; if the demand is not fully supplied, why do not our manufacturers supply it? The tariff is not in the way, for if they are able to export so "extensively" to Canada and pay the present duties, it is not easy to perceive why they do not supply the full demand there. If profitable to supply a portion, why not the whole demand? The reason of course, cannot be found in the tariff regulations, because a rate of duties that would exclude the supply of the entire demands of the country would exclude the supply of a part. No the truth is, there is practically no restriction on the introduction of American manufactures into Canada; but the trouble is, that, except in certain products, the English manufacturer can undersell us, and in those exceptional products we sell there now under existing regulations all we should be able to sell if there were no duty at all.

Nothing is expected in the way of free trade in manufactured goods while present relations exist between Canada and the mother country, but I desire the laboring-men of this country to understand that this is a move wholly in the interest of the Canadian producer of farm and forest products, and "forwarders and merchants" in the eastern markets, which, if consummated, must result in the serious injury of all our own citizens interested or engaged in the production of such products. Gentlemen skilled in the jugglery of words may succeed in making it appear to be a matter of national importance, when in fact it is special legislation affecting beneficially particular interests only, but really injurious to a large majority of the people and an innovation upon the long-settled policy of the Government, a species of legislation that deserves the condemnation of all.

The Hawaiian treaty legislation I regard as of the same class, designed to affect a particular interest, to wit: the admission of the sugar products of those islands free of duty, resulting in a loss to the Treasury of the duties which would otherwise be collected, while the amount thereby let in free of duty would be too small to cheapen the price in this country, putting the amount of the duties, be the same more or less, into the pockets of the producer. Why levy any duties at all if these exceptions are to be made, for which there is no more excuse than there would be in removing all duties. I would not object to the removal of all duties on articles needed by us, and of which we have an insufficient supply of our own productions; but in view of the well-known ability of our own people to more than supply the consumption demanded, I am at a loss to understand the meaning of the gentleman in the assertion that "by opening trade with Canada we should furnish our people with a more abundant supply of the necessaries of life." I hope the resolution will not be adopted. All such projects are best nipped in the bud. Its adoption will be the entering-wedge to still further consideration, for means will be found to induce a favorable report, and plenty of plausible arguments in its support will be offered here, and I feel there is danger that the interests of the humble class of citizens, injuriously affected by this measure, may be subordinated to the interests of the more opulent and powerful, who will be benefited by it.

From the beginning of the world, we might almost say, the only labor interest wholly without concert or coherence as to its own was the farming. It was like a school of herring, preyed upon by vultures and sharks. All form of enemies watched eagerly the growth of the prey, and each levied toll as the myriads passed along. The little fish were unconscious that their combined strength would make them a match for all enemies combined. So with farmers. Divided, they have been feebleness itself; united, they have the strength of giants, and when they so will are masters of the situation, whatever they undertake.

In conclusion, sir, I express the hope that the folly of another reciprocity treaty with Canada is not to be perpetrated, but that we shall adhere to a sounder social science, by encouraging a domestic commerce in preference to a foreign trade involving the sending of our raw material out of the country and bringing back in return the same material in manufactured goods.

Let us by every means within our reach strive to increase our domestic manufactures, thereby increasing the number of consumers at home, diversifying as much as practicable the employments of the people, so that producers and consumers may be brought as nearly together as possible, that production and consumption may follow each other closely, thereby economizing labor and affording every person an opportunity of devoting himself to that kind of employment for which he is best suited. The more highly diversified the labor of a country is the more profitable it is, because it permits the employment of every person in the particular kind of business for which he is best adapted. Let us imitate as far as practicable the policy which has made France more independent in a commercial sense than any other country on the face of the globe, because she has held to the protection of her own people against unjust and unfavorable competition, while at the same time, by a wise and judicious system of impost duties, she so encouraged the growth of articles of which she stood in need as to make her independent of all nations in the necessaries of life. Said a celebrated French statesman, in speaking of the policy so successfully followed by his government:

Every nation owes it to itself to seek the establishment of diversification in the pursuits of its people, as Germany and England have done in regard to cotton and woolens, and as France herself has done in reference to so many and so widely different departments of industry. It is the accomplishment of a positive duty, which requires the government so to act as to favor the taking possession of all the branches of industry whose acquisition is beneficial to the people.

We have within our borders the elements of a most diversified industry, only requiring a proper appreciation of the benefits springing from their utilization, with such encouragement as a wise governmental policy would impart to enable us to use up in our own country its raw productions and export only the manufactured article, made more valuable from the labor bestowed upon it, at the same time reducing its bulk and consequently the cost of transportation, and in addition increasing the home consumption of our breadstuffs. It is an axiom in political economy that the exporter of raw material pays all expenses incident to a separation of producers and consumers. The wheat-grower of Minnesota pays for taking his wheat to the European consumers. And all experience proves that those people are prosperous and constantly advancing in wealth and a real civilization who work up their raw products at home; while those nations whose policy has been to export the raw productions of its people for somebody else to manufacture and sell back to them at an immense increase in value, the cost of manufacture, a sort of selling a whole hide for a shilling and buying back the tail for a dollar, have constantly grown poorer. This is shown in the condition of the cotton States before the war. The planter was constantly exporting cotton and tobacco, the raw results of mere brute labor, paying in addition to the cost of transportation of such weighty and bulky product all the risks and expenses incident thereto, resulting in impoverished soil and abandoned fields. On the other hand, the working up of the raw material at home and sending abroad the manufactured product will render the cost of transportation unimportant, while a diversified industry will convert those abandoned wastes into fertile fields.

See the progress France has made under the influence of a policy which encourages home manufactures and thereby creates home markets. In 1830 she had a population of 30,000,000, in round numbers, and in that year exported one hundred million dollars' worth of products, or about $3 per head of population. During the succeeding thirty years, under a system prohibiting importations, her exports grew to $11 per capita. Since the close of her war with Germany, under a protective tariff, her exports have been:

In 1871	$573,000,000
In 1872	736,000,000
In 1873	760,000,000
In 1874	774,000,000
In 1875	800,000,000

During this latter period she has paid out of the industries of her people a thousand millions of dollars to Germany, and is to-day the most prosperous nation in all Christendom. Her laborers are not idle, loafing about her halls of legislation begging for labor, but have employment that feeds and clothes them well. With about the same population, half our people are idle; with an abundance of all the elements of prosperity, we utilize but few of them; with a productive capacity unequaled, we buy more than we sell, and consequently we are poor. And do not let us intensify the evils by the initiation of a policy the tendency of which is to make us hewers of wood and drawers of water to other nations.

Mr. Speaker, I feel great interest in the proposition under discussion, because the people of my district are largely interested in producing farm and forest products. The only home market the farmers have is that afforded in the lumbering districts, and because I believe that the only object expected to be accomplished by those who are urging it is the admission into this country of the farm and forest products of Canada free of duty.

Equalization of Bounties.

SPEECH OF HON. G. L. FORT,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

June 20, 1876,

On the bill (H. R. No. 581) to equalize bounties to soldiers who served in the late war for the Union.

Mr. FORT. Mr. Speaker, sooner or later the chief provisions of this bill ought to be and will be enacted into law. And why should it be longer delayed? Hope deferred has already made the heart of the soldier sick. In the most part, the soldiers who are so justly entitled to the bounty provided for by this bill are poor men. They have earned this money many years ago. They gave the strength of their youth and manhood voluntarily, cheerfully, and heroically. We have had their service, the value of which to the country and to posterity cannot be computed in dollars and cents. They have patiently waited without murmur the sitting and rising of Congress after Congress until now, and here we are this 20th day of June, 1876. Our nation is within a few days of being one hundred years old, and it seems to me that if we are ever to discharge this obligation it is now indeed about time to begin; or if we do not intend to redeem the good faith of the Government in this behalf, we ought to frankly say so to the frank, brave soldiers, and let them know, and the widows and minor heirs of the deceased soldiers know, that, while we will pay the bondholder to the uttermost farthing and pay claims for property destroyed, yet we do not intend to pay them. Their services made it possible for the Government to pay the bondholder and pay for property destroyed. Yet for these services and for health destroyed the poor bondless soldier shall not be paid.

It is urged by many here among us that the financial affairs of the Government are such that it cannot meet this payment now, and thus in effect say that this demand, no matter how just and equitable, must be postponed without day or be repudiated outright. They say the country is in debt, and that to carry out the provisions of this bill would take from twenty to thirty millions.

Mr. Speaker, these are, in my judgment, weak and unsatisfactory reasons for refusal to pay or to delay. We may not have the money, but we can borrow it. Our credit is above par in gold, and is better abroad in the money markets of the world than it is at home; and if we can do no better, we can issue bonds payable in currency, and, in my judgment, not a single soldier whose honored name ever adorned the muster-rolls of his country will refuse to take them because not to be paid in coin.

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me very ungracious for the Government to decline to adjust this matter now. Had these soldiers been paid their money at the proper time and invested by them as they had a right to do it would have at least doubled by this time, and had we borrowed the money then and paid interest on it till now, we would have had to pay much more than we now will. These soldiers do not demand or expect interest, but simply to receive what was due them years ago. And of their patient waiting it does not become us to complain. If we can pay now what we ought to have paid long ago we should be more than content, and should cheerfully and at once go about our duty and adjust these meritorious claims with all convenient speed.

Mr. Speaker, I would appeal to no party feeling. No republican can hesitate, and no democrat can longer defer to do equity and justice to a class of men equally honored by both political parties.

Mr. Speaker, a moment's reflection, it seems to me, will bring every fair mind to the conclusion that the claims of these soldiers are just, and that in honor we must pay them. Our great country cannot disregard its duty, and must protect its honor.

It sometimes seems to me that by mistake or design many of our laws discriminate against the most just and equitable class of cases, and often by the interpretation of our laws the poorer and most needy and meritorious citizens are wronged, while we with great care and without delay provide for our larger creditors. This is not intended, but comes only by accident, and because the smaller claimants do not press and importune payment.

Mr. Speaker, the volunteers who come forward on the first sound of alarm, as does the faithful fireman, and who rushed without taking thought of his home, his dear ones, or his worldly affairs, but thinking only of the impending peril to his country, as a rule got little and many of them no bounty.

They enlisted without hesitation for the war. It took no drumming and fifing to get them into line, and many of them never lost a roll-call until the last armed foe surrendered. Later the Government found it necessary to offer large bounties to bring out men fit for war, and those who came at the eleventh hour received more than those who had borne the heat and burden of the day. This is not according to Scripture and is not gospel. As it is written in those days, the laborers in the vineyards who come at the eleventh hour received the same pay as did those who labored the whole measure of time. This is true, but it will be observed that they did not receive more pay, as did the eleventh-hour soldiers in our service. It might have been according to Scripture to allow them as much, but it is certainly not therein taught that they should receive more pay.

Mr. Speaker, the application of our bounty laws has worked such manifest inequality and injustice, that soldiers might well have complained, and the wonder is they did not. A good, true soldier is not apt to find fault with his country. He is apt to think that whatever his country does is right, and he is always for his country, right or wrong. But, Mr. Speaker, that is no reason why their country should misuse them. We in all fairness owe them this bounty, and let us not delay payment longer. Many of them have long since passed the meridian of life, and with unsteady step and unhalting march they approach their last bivouac. Their once bright uniform is now worn and threadbare, and their rations in their haversacks are scant. Whatever they have on this earth they must have soon, and they need it now. And can a generous people, rich in the fruits of their suffering; can our great Republic, with credit unquestioned and resources unbounded, look upon this march-worn, battle-scarred veteran host and say, "We have had your services during the best years of your manhood, for which we owe you a few dollars; but we never intend to pay you." Never; no, never! forty millions of people say, and so let it be recorded by every member on this floor.

The Geneva Award.—Honest Faith the Nation's Supreme Need.

SPEECH OF HON. B. A. WILLIS,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

July 1, 1876,

The House having under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 2685) reported by the Committee on the Judiciary for the distribution of the unappropriated moneys of the Geneva award—

Mr. WILLIS said:

Mr. SPEAKER: The discussion inaugurated by my honorable colleague, Mr. LORD, possesses rare interest, far exceeding that which any question of local concern can excite. It relates to action on the part of the United States Government bearing upon the disposition of a trust fund placed in its possession by award and decision of arbitrators pursuant to the treaty of Washington. Fidelity to international obligations, the maintenance of national honor by strict regard to the behests and conditions imposed by such award and decision, are the grave questions to be determined by the action of Congress upon the pending bill. It becomes us to accept as an appropriate rule of our conduct in this matter the decision of the Supreme Court, pronounced by Associate Justice McLean in these words:

The action of a sovereign state will be characterized by a more scrupulous regard to justice and by a higher sense of morality than belongs to the ordinary transactions of individuals.

Noble words these and fitly spoken then, but far more needed now, when vice is so rampant and corruption so thoroughly infused in all the channels of commerce and government that simple virtue has scarcely a single worshiper.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE.

Mr. Speaker, my honorable colleague has aptly stated what occurred before the Judiciary Committee, the classes of claimants who presented themselves, and some of the facts which serve to illustrate the history of what are known by the generic term of "the Alabama claims." He has failed, however, and that, too, utterly, to give place and prominence to those essential facts which constitute the res gestæ of the case, and out of which arise the legal and moral obligations of the United States Government. To do this is the province I have assigned myself. It shall be my labor to exhibit the precise relation which the Government sustains to the fund paid pursuant to the award made by arbitrators at Geneva.

It is quite a labor of supererogation to recite all the facts of history which are in any way, directly or indirectly, connected with the transaction. I will confine myself to a recital simply of such as specially serve to characterize it.

During the war of rebellion, confederate cruisers roamed over the sea which were built in English ship-yards and were coaled at English harbors; they committed depredations upon American commerce; destroyed American shipping; multiplied risks to such an extent that premiums were enhanced, the war prolonged, and its costs enlarged incalculably, so that every American citizen—the whole country—suffered loss.

Pending war, when the people were absorbed with its grand problems and intent only on the salvation of an imperiled Republic, they slept upon their rights, the Government contenting itself simply with forwarding claims of its citizens and entering its occasional protests. But when rebellion was suppressed and arms silent, urgent steps were taken; Great Britain was summoned to answer for its responsibility in permitting confederate cruisers to be built and launched as a curse upon the seas to blight and destroy. Negotiations were entered into with a view of ascertaining the exact measure of such responsibility.

Succeeding the outbursts of fierce hate, of cries for vengeance into which the country in a moment of frenzy and resentment indulged, came a calm, intelligent desire on the part of the better elements of the two nations to adjust amicably and permanently all existing grievances and differences between them. Such desire found expression in what is known as the treaty of Washington, which constituted the most glorious victory of peace achieved in the history of the world, not surpassed by that great victory of war which determines the perpetuity of our Republic. The former was a fitting sequel of the latter: First, the brotherhood of man; second, the brotherhood of nations. Such treaty contained everything that the keenest, most scrupulous sense of honor on our part demanded; it expressed regret for wrongs committed; it provided an ample, satisfactory mode for the redress of such wrongs; it prescribed the rules which should control the adjudication.

Here is the language of the treaty in so far as it has special reference to the purpose of my argument:

ARTICLE I.

Whereas differences have arisen between the Government of the United States and the government of Her Britannic Majesty, and still exist, growing out of the acts committed by the several vessels which have given rise to the claims generically known as the "Alabama claims;" and whereas Her Britannic Majesty has authorized her high commissioners and plenipotentiaries to express in a friendly spirit the regret felt by Her Majesty's government for the escape, under whatever circumstances, of the Alabama and other vessels from British ports, and for the depredations committed by those vessels:

Now, in order to remove and adjust all complaints and claims on the part of the United States, and to provide for the speedy settlement of such claims, which are not admitted by Her Britannic Majesty's government, the high contracting parties agree that all the said claims growing out of acts committed by the aforesaid vessels, and generically known as the "Alabama claims," shall be referred to a tribunal of arbitration, to be composed of five arbitrators, to be appointed in the following manner, that is to say:

ARTICLE VI.

In deciding the matters submitted to the arbitrators they shall be governed by the following three rules, which are agreed upon by the high contracting parties as rules to be taken as applicable to the case, and by such principles of international law not inconsistent therewith as the arbitrators shall determine to have been applicable to the case:

RULES.

A neutral government is bound—

First. To use due diligence to prevent the fitting out, arming, or equipping within its jurisdiction of any vessel which it has reasonable ground to believe is intended to cruise or to carry on war against a power with which it is at peace; and also to use like diligence to prevent the departure from its jurisdiction of any vessel intended to cruise or carry on war as above, such vessel having been specially adapted, in whole or in part, within such jurisdiction, to warlike use.

Second. Not to permit or suffer either belligerent to make use of its ports or waters as the base of naval operations against the other, or for the purpose of the renewal or augmentation of military supplies or arms, or the recruitment of men.

Third. To exercise due diligence in its own ports and waters, and, as to all persons within its jurisdiction, to prevent any violation of the foregoing obligations and duties.

And the high contracting parties agree to observe these rules as between themselves in the future, and to bring them to the knowledge of other maritime powers, and to invite them to accede to them.

ARTICLE XI.

The high contracting parties engage to consider the result of the proceedings of the tribunal of arbitration and of the board of assessors, should such board be appointed, as a full, perfect, and final settlement of all the claims hereinbefore referred to; and further engage that every such claim, whether the same may or may not have been presented to the notice of, made, preferred, or laid before the tribunal or board, shall, from and after the conclusion of the proceedings of the tribunal or board, be considered and treated as finally settled, barred, and henceforth inadmissible.

Having adduced the evidence of this fact, the United States will next endeavor to indicate to the tribunal of arbitration what they deem to have been the duties of Great Britain toward the United States in respect to the several cruisers which will be named in this paper.

Such is the treaty.

Then the high court of nations is duly appointed, assembles at Geneva, and organizes. The high parties litigant appear through agents and able counsel and present pleas; both those growing out of wrongs done to the nation and wrongs done to its citizens.

By the terms of the treaty just read all claims growing out of the acts committed by the Alabama and other vessels, which in any manner had escaped from British ports, were submitted for arbitration.

RESULTS OF ADJUDICATION.

England interposed a demurrer on the ground that by the intent and scope of the treaty of Washington the claims for indirect damage, as here indicated—namely: a, The loss of commercial marine to the American flag; b, The enhanced payments of insurance; c, The prolongation of the war and consequent additional cost—should not be entertained or allowed.

The demurrer was sustained.

Had the United States insisted upon their further consideration the arbitration would have been dissolved, and a grand stride toward universal peace would not have been taken.

But the agent of the United States telegraphed Secretary Fish, June 19, 1872:

We are of the opinion that the announcement this day made by the tribunal must be received by the United States as determinative of its judgment upon the question of public law involved, upon which the United States have insisted upon taking their opinion.

The tribunal, you will observe, had determined adversely to these indirect claims, and the United States had insisted upon the opinion being rendered.

Let no member of this House, in the presence of such irrefutable testimony, pretend that these indirect claims were not rejected by the tribunal after due consideration.

Listen further: On June 22, 1872, Secretary Fish telegraphs to the United States agent, in reply to the dispatch already read:

I have laid your telegrams before the President, who directs me to say that he accepts the declaration of the tribunal as its judgment upon a question of public law which he felt that the interests of both governments required should be decided, and for the determination of which he had felt it important to present the claims referred to for the purpose of taking the opinion of the tribunal.

You will note the language of this dispatch. The President accepts a declaration of the tribunal's judgment. He felt it important to present the claims referred to. But note further. The same telegram contains this unmistakable language:

We had no wish for a pecuniary award, but desired an expression by the tribunal as to the liability of a neutral for claims of that character. (Meaning indirect claims.)

The President therefore further accepts the opinion and advice of the counsel as set forth above, and authorizes the announcement to the tribunal that he accepts their declaration as determinative of their judgment upon the important question of public law upon which he had felt it his duty to seek the expression of their opinion; and that, in accordance with such judgment and opinion, from henceforth he regards the claims set forth in the case presented on the part of the United States, for loss in the transfer of the American commercial marine to the British flag, the enhanced payment of insurance, and the prolongation of the war, and the addition of a large sum to the cost of the war, and the suppression of the rebellion, as adjudicated and disposed of; and that consequently they will not be further insisted upon before the tribunal by the United States, but are henceforth excluded from its consideration by the tribunal in making its award.

FISH.

After such a declaration from the Chief Magistrate, in terms so explicit that, had we not been familiar with past legislation on this subject, had we not read the report or listened to the argument of my honorable colleague, we would have deemed it impossible for any intelligent man to insist that such indirect claims had been waived or withdrawn. We will go still further in this direction. What did the tribunal actually do upon the reception of the foregoing dispatch? You will find in protocol 7—the same being a record of the proceedings of the 27th of June, 1872,—that Count Sclopis, on behalf of all the arbitrators, then declared that the said several claims for indirect losses, to wit, (see protocol 6:)

First. The loss in the transfer of commercial marine to the British flag.

Second. The enhanced payments of insurance.

Third. The prolongation of the war, and the addition of a large sum to the cost of the war and the suppression of rebellion—

Are and from henceforth shall be wholly excluded from the consideration of the tribunal, and directed the secretary to embody this declaration in the protocol of this day's proceedings.

Mr. Speaker, before this determination was had, before it was accepted as binding and conclusive by the high contracting parties, Cushing, Evarts, and Waite had exhausted all the resources of their lore, their logic, and their eloquence, far overmatching their competitors, in enforcing the justness of these indirect claims, they were attentively heeded by willing, admiring judges, but to no purpose; the arbitrators calmly and firmly rejected the claim. The United States acquiesced in their rejection; acquiesced in the understanding that our Government was not to recover money for such a purpose. The arbitrators, in arriving at their judgment respecting these claims, were controlled by rules contained in the sixth article of the treaty of Washington and such principles of international law as are not inconsistent therewith. The rules are already quoted.

IMMORALITY OF PAYING REJECTED CLAIMS.

Now, we have the liability of the British government in the premises clearly defined; determined acceptably to both governments. The indirect claims are distinctly announced as not being sustainable either by virtue of the treaty or of any principle of international law; and yet we confront a demand that moneys obtained on account of claims which were specifically allowed, which in the high court of nations had been solemnly adjudged as proper, upon which the award itself was predicated, shall be appropriated, now that we have by fraudulent contrivance and device obtained control of it, to the payment of claims admittedly unfounded, and which by solemn decree, pursuant to solemn treaty, have been solemnly adjudged illegal and without warrant in international law. What words can be employed in depicting the infamy of such an act?

The nation, exultant that such claims had been declared illegal and boasting the advantages to accrue from such an adjudication, through its Congress enacts a law in direct antagonism to the judgment of the tribunal and in violation of every sentiment of honor and justice. Why, the United States disdainfully stated they desired no pecuniary award on their account. In the correspondence the Secretary of State (see volume 11, treaty of Washington, page 476) writes that we should be content with an award that a state is not liable in pecuniary damages for the indirect results of a failure to observe its neutral obligations.

Any other decision would have been prejudicial to the interests of our Republic. A nation whose sphere for the next century will be neutrality and belligerency will be its exceptional condition.

CHARACTER OF THE MAJORITY PROPOSITION.

Mr. Speaker, the turpitude of the pending bill amazes one who has any moral sense at all: obtaining money in trust for the payment of claims specifically allowed, and then employing it to satisfy claims specifically disallowed. The sophistry of the report which tends to justify its conclusions is thinner than a gossamer wing. It urges or tends to urge that these claims were not adjudicated but abandoned; that in consideration of their abandonment the United States received certain advantages in the negotiation, and that thereby the citizens who paid enhanced premiums of insurance made a sacrifice which it became the duty of the Government to requite. This reasoning is delusive, were it true in itself. It would have no applicability; for sums of money would be diverted and appropriated contrary to the letter of the trust money intended for other definite purposes. But this is the admirable logic of the report; and if the arbitrators decide in favor of the indirect claims, it will inure to the advantage of a few gentlemen who claim war premiums, but will prejudice us as a neutral nation and injure thereby forty millions of our people, if the arbitrators decide adversely to the indirect claims.

Why, it will benefit forty millions of people, and it will not interfere with the rights of the gentlemen who claim war premiums. We will take care of them, say the Judiciary Committee; they shall be beneficiaries, law or no law. Happy claimants of the war premiums! Ingrates if you do not praise the Lord for such zealous friends!

Mr. Speaker, perhaps I have dwelt overlong on the question of good faith upon the part of the Government before stating with proper precision the particular questions which are to be settled in this discussion. The character of our claim against Great Britain, the mode of determining damages due the United States, the rejection by the arbitrators of indirect claims, including claims for enhanced premiums of insurance, and the acquiescence of the high contracting parties in such rejection, and finally that such rejection was a determination forever barring such claims, as the language of the treaty expresses it, are facts incontestably established.

THE RELATION OF THE GOVERNMENT TO THE FUND.

The trusteeship of the Government is a fact no less susceptible of demonstration, so far as these claims for money awards are concerned.

The money claims of the Government were rejected, as already indicated; they came under one or the other of the following heads:

For transfer of commercial marine to the English flag.

For additional cost in suppressing rebellion.

For expense in pursuing the cruisers.

The United States, as already shown, submitted these claims; they were adversely determined by the tribunal, and such decision rejoiced in by our Government as one specially favorable to its probable position of neutrality. The Government no longer had any pecuniary interest in the controversy.

Such decision was not the result of a bargain, of shrewd calculation—a tacit waiver for an equivocal consideration; it was the deliberate judgment of illustrious judges, representing the majesty and dignity of empires, upon certain issues presented, honestly and fairly, according to the rules provided in article 6 of the treaty of Washington, and the principles of international law not inconsistent therewith.

Tables of American claims were presented and accepted as elements of damage sustained by citizens of the United States. Details of evidence were analyzed in determining which particular cruisers should be inculpated and which exculpated. Extreme particularity in the findings is a feature of the award.

No money award was made to the nation. Any moneys intrusted to the Government were intended for the satisfaction of claims due to American citizens, as determined by the tribunal.

SUMMARY OF POINTS DECIDED BY THE TRIBUNAL.

Let the award be produced; let the decision be exhibited.

After first declaring certain vessels to be inculpated, holding that Great Britain in such instances failed by omission to fulfill duties prescribed in the first, second, and third of the rules established by article 6 of the treaty of Washington, they decide that the United States are not entitled to indemnity for costs of pursuing the cruisers; they decide that prospective earnings cannot properly be made the subject of compensation, inasmuch as they depend in their nature upon future and uncertain contingencies; they decide that all double claims for same losses shall be set aside, and also all claims for gross freights, so far as they exceed "net freights;" that it is preferable, in accordance with the spirit and letter of the treaty of Washington, to adopt the form of adjudication of a sum in gross, rather than refer the subject to a board of assessors, pursuant to article 10 of the treaty; that $15,500,000 in gold be paid as indemnity by Great Britain to the United States for the satisfaction of all the claims referred to the consideration of the tribunal, conformably to provisions contained in article 7 of the said treaty; that each and every one of the said claims, whether the same may or may not have been presented to the notice of, or made, preferred, or laid before the tribunal, shall henceforth be considered and treated as finally settled, barred, and inadmissible.

The claims in the American case were classified as follows, to wit:

1. The claims for direct losses growing out of the destruction of vessels and their cargoes by the insurgent cruisers.

2. The national expenditures in the pursuit of those cruisers.

3. The loss in the transfer of the American commercial marine to the British flag.

4. The enhanced payments of insurance.

5. The prolongation of the war and the addition of a large sum to the cost of the war and the suppression of the rebellion.

So far as these various losses and expenditures grew out of the acts committed by the several cruisers, the United States are entitled to ask compensation and remuneration therefor before this tribunal.

The claims for direct losses growing out of the destruction of vessels and their cargoes may be further subdivided into: 1. Claims of destruction of vessels and property of the Government of the United States; 2. Claims for the destruction of vessels and property under the flag of the United States; 3. Claims for damages or injuries to persons growing out of the destruction of each class of vessels.

Is it still an open question what claims were allowed by the Geneva tribunal?

Verily, that grand court, where met republic and monarchy each the most commanding and enlightened on earth, to have differences adjusted and grievances recompensed under auspices so peculiarly grave, was after all a solemn farce. Evarts, Cushing, and Waite were joking when they urged indirect claims; they winked at the arbitrators, and intimated they did not mean what they said; it was a game of bluff, where certain proofs were exhibited to create an impression that certain parties were to be paid for injuries, when in reality the moneys were intended for another purpose.

How transcendent and exalted such purity! How splendid such diplomacy! It would be obtaining money under false pretenses. Should an individual in ordinary business resort to such methods he would be condemned to social outlawry.

PLEA OF GOVERNMENT OWNERSHIP INVALID.

Mr. Speaker, wrongs are rarely urged unless fortified by plausible pretext. Not so in this instance. A pretext is set forth, but it is utterly wanting in plausibility. It consists in the allegation that the payment of the money in a gross sum vested the same absolutely in the United States, subject to their arbitrary disposition.

This position is not tenable for an instant.

First. The actual proofs, weighed by the arbitrators and accepted as pertinent to the issues, having reference only to the losses of private individuals by certain cruisers, namely, the Alabama and her tenders, the Florida and her tenders, the Shenandoah, after leaving Melbourne, give exact shape and direction to the award.

Second. The language of the American case, where the exact reasons are stated why an award of a sum in gross was desired, as follows:

They earnestly hope that the tribunal will exercise the power conferred upon it to award a sum, in gross, to be paid by Great Britain to the United States. The injuries of which the United States complain were committed many years since. The original wrongs to the sufferers by the acts of the insurgent cruisers have been increased by the delay in making reparation. It will be unjust to impose further delay, and the expense of presenting claims to another tribunal, if the evidence which the United States have the honor to present for the consideration of these arbitrators shall prove to be sufficient to enable them to determine what sum, in gross, would be a just compensation to the United States for the injuries and losses of which they complain. (Case of the United States, part 6.) To save delay and expense, and to exhibit generous confidence in our Government, induced the arbitraters to respond favorably to the plea.

Third. The official statement of the agent of the United States, made to the tribunal, as follows:

The object of the treaty is to indemnify the United States for the losses suffered by their own citizens, and not to impose a part of that indemnification upon the United States themselves.—Volume 4, page 43, of the papers relating to the treaty of Washington.

Fourth. The tribunal, having determined as to the vessels inculpated, examined and scrutinized the schedules and estimates of individual losses presented by the United States, including claims of insurance companies, and, on the inspection thereof, awarded a sum in gross which they conceived to be sufficient to afford a just indemnity to the citizens so injured. The evidence relating to this point, making it unassailable, is found in volume 3, page 579, of papers relating to the treaty of Washington, containing a statement of the agent, with reference to certain tables, which contain a list of the vessels and cargoes destroyed by the inculpated cruisers and the amount of claims in respect of each, including the amounts of insurance thereon, couched in the following language:

The claims on the part of private individuals, thus computed, verified, and submitted, are supported by all the guarantees of their good faith and their validity, as well for their general amount as for the other facts concerning them which governments are in the habit of requiring in such cases from their own citizens. It thus appears that these computations show the entire extent of all private losses which the result of the adjudications of this tribunal ought to enable the United States to make compensation for.

Fifth. If the tribunal had not awarded a sum in gross the distribution would have devolved on a board of assessors, who would have heard each particular claimant in such cases as it had been determined by the arbitrators England was guilty, and according to the measure of damage by them prescribed. That the assessors would review and set at naught the decree of the tribunal from whom they borrowed their power, to which they would be subordinate, is a senseless proposition.

Yet the United States Government were endowed with the precise powers that would have devolved on the assessors; none beyond. The reasons for imposing such duty on our Government are embodied in the argument of American counsel just quoted from.

Sixth. The action of the United States under direction of the very officials who conducted the negotiations, the Government binding itself to pay the Secretary of State in trust, and to pay interest on the amount; the constitution of a court and a partial distribution among sufferers, to the extent of a decree at least—such is the enumeration of facts out of which a trusteeship on the part of our Government arises. Either of these facts would suffice to create a trust.

THE ARGUMENT OF FORCE AND INJUSTICE.

The only argument that can be preferred in favor of the proposition that the award is the absolute property of the Government is that it is in the Treasury and it has the physical force to appropriate it. Such is the argument in a minority report signed by one member of the Judiciary Committee. He logically demands that the sum be covered in the Treasury of the United States and applied to the payment of the national debt. The majority report, planting itself on the same ground, ignoring all the determinations of the tribunal, all the arguments of American counsel, all the declarations of the State Department, sanctioned by the President and Senate, insists on distributing the money, not among all the people who equally suffered by a prolongation of the war and the mountainous debt; not to the nation's defenders, by whose valor a flag was saved from pollution, a Republic from absolute wreck; not to the foundation of grand charities, where the maimed soldiers, the widows and orphans of those who have fallen might obtain succor, but among the individuals who paid enhanced premiums of insurance and those also who suffered from depredations committed by exculpated steamers. Consummate wisdom! They say the fund belongs to the Government! The claims were rejected as illegal, but they must be paid. Such marvelous affection for a class, without any apparent reason for sympathy or sentiment, is not comprehensible to ordinary intelligence.

Socrates, by dint of long association, learned to bear with Xantippe, but he never became infatuated with her. In this case the power of association is mightier; the infatuation is complete.

Gentlemen, if you but knew the attitude the United States would occupy, if after consenting, acquiescing, exulting in a determination involving the rejection of certain claims, it should recognize their validity and pay them to the exclusion of others the validity of which have been acknowledged and moneys paid with a view of discharging the same, you would scorn this bill.

If Congress should pass this law, it can be justly said that our officials do not reflect the average moral sense of the people, for such a breach of moral obligation would not find toleration in any business community.

Mr. Speaker, equities doubtless there are belonging to those gentlemen who paid premiums for war risks, and still more so to those who suffered direct losses inflicted by exculpated cruisers. I heartily sympathize with them in their losses; regret that the award was not broad enough to make their claims valid; but in view of the circumstances they cannot be entertained for a moment. Supposing Great Britain made a demand upon the United States Government for a claim based on premiums paid for war risks by its citizens, or losses such as I have referred to, what would my honorable colleague advise? Would he say, O, yes; certainly; our citizens were paid for like claims, and therefore we must respond to your demands? I think not. He would proudly point to the treaty of Washington and the award made pursuant thereto, and say we bound ourselves to abide forever by their text. We hold you to the letter thereof.

Is it in accord with good judgment to do that which will destroy all the moral effect of the treaty, which will bring to ignoble end a grand event hitherto supposed to have transpired in the interest of peace and higher civilization?

Treaty of Washington, a monument to Christian love, torn down by the bad faith of the great American Republic; its advantages and results ruthlessly and lastingly lost to us all through our future years.

Mr. Speaker, the peculiar relation of our Government relatively to this award and its citizens has been plainly demonstrated. If the Government is a trustee, who are the cestui que trusts—a question of strict law not dependent on discretion, but nevertheless equities are not absent. It should be judicially determined. From the beginning this has been the error of our Government; instead of directing specific claims to be paid it should have authorized a competent court to determine the validity of all claims, subject to the treaty of Washington and the proceedings of the tribunal at Geneva, together with the decision and the award there made. We would then have escaped an unseemly scramble in the lobby. Suitors would have plied courts, where they belong, instead of Legislatures, whose business it is to make, not to administer and construe the laws. Having given a competent court jurisdiction, all else could have been better done without the aid or hinderance of legislation; but the mistake has been made, the subject is thrust upon us. We must not shrink from making a just determination without reference to any former action on the part of this body, excepting, of course, cases where judgments are already rendered.

The cestui que trusts are those who suffered directly by the ravages committed by inculpated cruisers, being, first, those who owned the vessels and cargoes destroyed and, second, those subrogated to their rights.

In this remarkable discussion of a question as to the execution of a trust defined accurately and specifically, none among those advocating a violation of the trust has disputed the validity of the claims just indicated. The particular claims proved resulted from the destruction of ninety-four vessels and their cargoes by the Alabama and Florida and their tenders and the Shenandoah after leaving Melbourne; the value of the vessels, their cargoes and earned freight with interest thereon, the arbitrators after careful computation announced to be $15,500,000, and made the award accordingly. Now, it seems incredible, in the presence of such an adjudication, to suppose any gentleman could doubt that the owners of these vessels and cargoes, or those who, having paid the losses, became subrogated to their rights, are entitled to the award; that the moneys so paid to the United States are held in trust for such a purpose.

The former part of the proposition happily escapes the censure of the Judiciary Committee, that the owners were so entitled. Will the legal skill and wisdom of the Judiciary Committee enlighten us as to the distinction of owners and those subrogated to the rights of owners?

I suppose it is no needful labor to expound the doctrine of subrogation and point out its application in this case. Such right on the part of underwriters was insisted upon by American counsel before the tribunal, admitted by Sir Roundell Palmer, attorney-general of England, and Chief Justice Cockburn, the English arbitrator. No good, conscientious lawyer will deny it.

When a merchant makes a contract of insurance with a company he agrees, upon being paid for his loss, to abandon everything connected with the thing insured to the insurer; to assign to him all right of reclamation—legal parlance, the spes recuperandi, the hope of recovery—of the thing lost or any damage from the tort feaser who occasioned the wrong. The case reported (8 Johnson's Report, page 237, New York) cited by Chief Justice Story with approbation, in the case of Comegys vs. Vasse, (1 Peters, page 193, United States,) sets forth the doctrine intelligibly and with an aptness so much in point that its full force will be acknowledged.

One question was whether the jury was at liberty to deduct from the total loss the value of the spes recuperandi. The court held they they were not. Chief Justice Kent said:

> If France should at any future period agree to and actually make compensation for the capture and condemnation in question, the Government of the United States, to whom the consideration would in the first instance be payable, would become trustee for the party having the equitable title to the re-imbursement, and this would clearly be to the defendants (the underwriters) if they should pay the amount.

This case has wonderful analogy to that of the underwriters in the matter of the Geneva award; it is an exact precedent; as such I commend it to the favorable consideration of gentlemen who advocate the majority report, though they will doubtless give as slight heed to Kent and Story as they have done to Moses. With an ardent desire to enlighten my honorable friends, I will cite also for their instruction the following cases where the right of subrogation as claimed here is amply vindicated: Randall vs. Cochran, 1 Vesey, 98; Watson vs. Insurance Company of North America, 1 Birney, 47; Rogers vs. Hosack, executor, 18 Wendell, 319; Hull & Long vs. Railroad Companies, 13 Wallace, 367; Symonds vs. Union Insurance Company, 4 Dallas, 417; Rheulander vs. Insurance Company, 4 Cranch, United States, 29.

The line of decisions is unbroken. Among the eminent jurists who have spoken in the cases enumerated, are the unrivaled Hardwicke of England, the sturdy Marshall of our own country, maintaining that the insurer occupies toward the insured practically the position of a surety, and in the words of section 635 Story's Equity Jurisprudence, "a surety paying the creditor is entitled to a cession of the debt and a subrogation or substitution to all the rights and actions of the creditor against the debtor; maintaining further, that the insurance company, upon payment of the loss, succeeds to the rights of the owner," that such company is entitled to all the means of indemnity which the satisfied owner held against the party primarily liable in this case—England is such a party.

The owners had a right to recover from England in this case, but no remedy. The United States furnished such remedy; did this and nothing more, save accepting the award in trust for the purposes thereof.

In Comegys vs. Vasse it was held—

> That an abandonment passes to the underwriters all the claims of the assured against a foreign government on account of illegal capture.

Such was the clear judgment of our Supreme Court.

Mr. Speaker, in view of all these decisions, speaking with one voice, concurring in the correctness of the principle of subrogation as applied to cases involved in this discussion, which affirm also the doctrine of the civil law, it is not strange that those interested in securing the payment of enhanced insurance premiums and losses occasioned by exculpated cruisers should, in their horror for constitutional tribunals in whose temples alone justice is secure, take refuge in this House, and by appeals to false sentiment persuade gentlemen whose manifold duties prevent them from critically examining the legal features of the question to pronounce judgment, in wanton disregard of moral, legal, and international obligations.

There is but one conclusion which an honest judgment can reach: that is that the award belongs to the owners of the ninety-four vessels and cargoes destroyed, or to those who, having paid the owners, are subrogated to their rights; and if the Government in the distribution of the award swerves one hair's-breadth from the faithful fulfillment of its trust it will be guilty of an awful crime against morality, and we will learn but too tardily that "righteousness exalteth a nation."

Mr. Speaker, appeals to prejudice in determination of a legal question where the rights of all the parties are finally adjudicated are unworthy this House and should be visited with pitiless censure, more especially when unfounded.

To whom would these moneys, if paid to the insurance companies, go? Let us see.

The amount of insurance claims aggregate the sum of $4,002,872, including interest. Mutual insurance companies claim $2,634,234; stock companies claim $1,368,629; ten stock companies claiming $666,691 have failed by reason of great fires in Chicago and Boston.

All the moneys received by the bankrupt companies will relieve the necessities of those who suffered by these severe fires. Will my honorable friends of the Judiciary Committee urge Congress by caprice and stretch of authority to turn away these funds from that undeserving class, all for the sake of equity and justice?

But, Mr. Speaker, nearly three-fourths if not quite all of these claims are preferred by mutual insurance companies; they, by organization, voluntary association, combine and insure themselves against loss. Everything they receive will be divided among ship-owners and cargo-owners. Do they morally, equitably, or logically shift their position as owners when by this voluntary arrangement they insure themselves; are they less owners than before? Is it not a fact that losses and profits by reason of a species of partnership are mutually borne and losses so divided as to operate without harshness upon individuals?

Do not the gentlemen who made the majority report understand that these moneys, if paid to insurance companies, would be returned to the very parties who paid premiums and war risks during the rebellion; during the period when depredations were committed?

In New York State the statute provides for such a distribution.

These are the unconscionable parties whose devoted heads the legislative wrath is to be poured. Such are the people whose rights, more ancient than the Republic, coeval with civilization, are assailed by the majority report of the Judiciary Committee. No sophistry can mislead, no misrepresentation betray; the facts are palpable. But infinitely more important than even these rights is the honor of the Republic.

Mr. Speaker, it is conceded that the payment of war premiums can be justified only by the plea that the ownership of the award vests absolutely in our Government. They were excluded from all consideration by the tribunal; no proofs were proffered. Now I beg to inquire what special ground there is, what reasons there are, what circumstances which sanctify these claims?

We are told they maintained the honor and dignity of the flag; that through their inflexible patriotism our commerce survived the rebellion. Indeed, sir, they are a class of heroes whose history is unwritten. Our annals should blaze with the luster of their deeds, for I would gladly yield devotion and homage to valiant men, to patriots.

What did they do? Well, they paid excessive rates of insurance, and in doing so they exercised their own volition; they entered into a contract without any one dreaming that they were fit subjects for the issuance of a writ de lunatico inquirendo. If they met with losses they were paid in full by the companies; if not, it is fair to assume these disinterested gentlemen made profit. I doubt whether they ever indulged the spes recuperandi; the thought, the vulgar, gross thought of indemnity never entered as alloy in their pure patriotism. O, no! this was an after-thought; and if the Judiciary Committee are potent enough it will eventuate a lucky thought. When gentlemen are terribly overweighted with sympathy, I would suggest they considered whether the patriotism of these claimants would not have helped the flag quite as much if it had been expended in our armies or navies as in the peaceful pursuits of trade.

Mr. Speaker, the cruisers inflicted an equal loss on every citizen of this Republic; every soldier was thereby exposed to additional rigors and hardships; additional graves, additional homes made cold and desolate, additional burdens of taxation imposed, attest the loss.

If restraints imposed by the treaty are to be disregarded, if the Government decides to claim it for itself, then let it be distributed among those whose valor on fields of carnage saved a nation's life; let it be distributed in bounties and pensions, or, what is yet more equitable, let it be covered in the Treasury and divided without partiality among all the people. Do not idly pretend, gentlemen, that your bill rewards patriotism.

In all I have said no disrespect is intended for individuals claiming the enhanced premiums; they rely upon the advice of learned counsel; my arrows are aimed at the shallow argument which does them gross injustice. This bill enacted into a law, France and England involved in war; cruisers fitted out from the harbors of this neutral republic; England knocks at our door; presents claims for war premiums. We say, "Have you forgotten the Geneva award given pursuant to the treaty of Washington?" England will say, "No; but while I remember the smart Yankee trick of the American Republic, which, disclaiming all concern about indirect claims, contrived under the guise of a gross sum to collect and distribute them all."

What a spectacle then would the glorious Republic present! Convicted of treachery to treaty obligations, of misappropriation of moneys intrusted to it in a fiduciary capacity. The tableau would be indeed interesting if my honorable friend and colleague should happen just then to be the Secretary of State.

Perhaps England would say, "We discard the treaty you have violated; we demand damage as though it had never been signed."

What a pitiable plight! Would my honorable friends pride themselves as wise lawyers and considerate legislators? The people would be entirely indifferent about the cost or the size of their head-stones.

If the British Parliament should enact a law declaring the treaty of Washington a nullity, we would invoke upon it the execrations of mankind; and yet we are asked by this bill to do that which in England would be deemed infamous.

Mr. Speaker, there are among those claiming enhanced premiums gentlemen who recognize the meaning of a sacred compact and the national obligation to respect the same, who disdain to receive what does not belong to them. I refer to Grinell, Minturn & Co., of the city I have the honor in part to represent, who frankly write, in a letter dated January 8, 1874, as follows:

> After the decision of the Geneva board of arbitration, disallowing the claims for war premiums, we supposed that all chance of our receiving anything for those claims was ended, and the idea of making an allowance to claimants of this character, by means of taking away from the insurance companies the amounts allowed by the Geneva board in satisfaction of their direct claims for losses of ships and cargoes vested in them as assignees, by abandonment or otherwise of the claims of the original parties, is an idea which certainly never would have occurred to us.

The letter, a part of which I have just read, indicates how this question addresses itself to the commercial mind, which, in obedience to the dictates of intelligent self-interest, always recognizes the full force of honesty and integrity in all business transactions.

In the court of Alabama commissioners, in the case of West vs. The United States, this straightforward language is employed:

> Does not national courtesy and good faith require of us to suppose that Congress in creating the court never intended we should distribute the fund other than for the purposes Great Britain supposed she was paying it? Suppose, for instance, Congress had chosen to keep half the fund and convert it into the Treasury of the nation, or had directed this court to distribute it among those who had been injured by the terror and alarm caused by the insurgent cruisers, or among those who had suffered loss by the depredations of rebel cruisers other than the Alabama, Florida, and Shenandoah. In such cases would not Great Britain have had cause to complain that she had been misled, overreached, deceived? Would our Government have been acting in good faith in making such disposition of this fund?

Such were the pertinent queries that occured to the judicial mind accustomed to weigh and determine under the sanction of an oath! Such are not the pertinent queries that occur to the minds of the majority of our Judiciary Committee, which for their sakes I regret. The Judiciary Committee at least respects its predecessor in the Forty-third Congress. Where the mighty Butler led, it fears not to follow.

The former committee are entitled to the credit of originality, but what honor will posterity award to the present committee?

Mr. Speaker, the majority report is predicated upon a false notion that the claims in question are against the United States. Wherefore their warrant for this conclusion? The United States Government committed no wrong in the premises; no damage occurred by reason of their neglect. The wrongs done for which the award was made resulted from the negligence of England. All claims were against England; the claimants, unable individually to press their demands against a foreign government, invoked their own Government to act as sponsor and agent. On the 22d of September, 1865, the Department of State issued a circular in the following form:

> DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
> Washington, September 22, 1865.
>
> Citizens of the United States having claims against foreign governments, not founded in contract, which may have originated since the 8th of February, 1853, will, without any delay which can be avoided, forward to this Department statements of the same, under oath, accompanied by the proper proof.
>
> * * * * * * *
>
> It is proper that the interposition of this Government with the foreign government against which the claim is presented should be requested in express terms, to avoid a possible objection to the jurisdiction of a future commission on the ground of the generality of the claim. Claims of citizens of the United States against this Government growing out of the late insurrection are under cognizance of other Departments, of the Court of Claims, or are a subject for an appeal to Congress.

Were the majority of the Judiciary Committee cognizant of this letter? Did they note the manner in which the claims were designated; the distinction made between claims against Great Britain and claims against the United States; the instructions given to such claimants? If so, what an astonishing assumption that the obligation to pay the claims in question devolved upon our Government as such rather than upon it as the custodian of a fund, charged with a duty in making disposition thereof!

The treaty, the proceedings before the tribunal, the records of the Secretary of State, the action of Congress, the arguments in American case, the nature of the matter in itself, are so many proofs, clear and explicit, to the effect that the award was made to satisfy the claims of American citizens against Great Britain, and the United States were intrusted with the task of custody and distribution.

Mr. Speaker, a commanding duty, one of unequaled dignity and consequence, awaits our performance. The rights of the respective parties, whose demands for this award depend upon our action, have already been determined by irreversible decree. We have yielded thereto our acquiescence and expressed therewith our satisfaction. We have accepted a trust subject to its conditions. If we fail in executing it, so as to escape the whisper of censure, better, a thousandfold, that the treaty of Washington had never been.

What is ill-gotten rarely thrives. Arbitration would henceforth be spurned and discarded as a mode of adjusting international difficulties.

A republic would sink into deserved obloquy, the companion of semi-barbarous nationalities, whose distinction consists in wanton disregard of sacred treaties; a shame on our part infinitely multiplied because of the crime against humanity involved in provoking a frequency of wars.

Whatever scrupulous honor shall demand or strict propriety suggest, let that be done. If rejected claims must be paid, let some other fund be provided. The Geneva award is English money, not ours. To use it as our own would be turpitude. Law, not caprice, should be the oracle.

That our glory may be dimmed by no unworthiness; that the treaty of Washington may be a presage of a holier and happier futurity; that it may be hailed by all the peoples of the earth as a rich, sure pledge of enduring peace among the nations, let this last act on our part, the execution of the trust, be honestly, piously performed.

The Geneva Award.

SPEECH OF HON. E. G. LAPHAM,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

July 6, 1876,

On the bill, (H. R. No. 2685,) reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, for the distribution of the unappropriated moneys of the Geneva award.

Mr. LAPHAM. Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to enter upon a detailed examination of the precise mode in which the remainder of the fund in question shall be distributed by Congress among the various classes of claimants thereto. Agreeing in the main upon that question with the views stated by the majority in their report, I shall briefly discuss the question as to the status of this fund and the general duty of the Government in respect to it and its distribution.

Three important ends to the Government of the United States were aimed at and sought to be attained by the Geneva arbitration:

First. An acknowledgment on the part of Great Britain that she had been guilty of a violation of the rights of neutrality and an apology therefor.

Secondly. The establishment of the principle or doctrine that no neutral shall be held liable for indirect or consequential damages in case of a violation of neutral obligations, but only for the direct losses resulting therefrom.

Thirdly. That national grievances may be peaceably and honorably adjusted by the mode of arbitration, so that war and all its attendant evils and sacrifices may be avoided.

In order to accomplish these ends the United States early took the ground no claim for any indirect or consequential damages should be insisted on by the Government, and that, as between Great Britain and the United States, the high tribunal of arbitration were at liberty to pronounce against such allowance as a principle of international law.

In order to accomplish these ends and leave the Government entirely free to act as its interest might seem to dictate, the President, in his message, in December, 1870, recommended the purchase of all individual claims in the following language:

> I therefore recommend to Congress to authorize the appointment of a commission to take proof of the amount and the ownership of these several claims, * * * and that authority be given for the settlement of these claims by the United States, so that the Government shall have the ownership of the private claims, as well as the responsible control of all the demands against Great Britain.

Had this been done, it is self-evident the United States would have paid for or become liable to pay to every individual having a claim for loss the amount thereof or such sum as might have been fixed by agreement, and in that event the sum awarded, whatever it might have been would have belonged absolutely to the United States.

Before there was time to perfect and carry out this recommendation of the President it became necessary for the United States to act in the premises, and so great were the promised advantages of the arbitration, that the Government decided to act without acquiring the rights or claims of individuals; and yet, in order to attain those ends, it was necessary that the United States should assume the control of, and the right to release and forever discharge, all such individual claims, as well as those of the Government, and to fully release the government of Great Britain therefrom. Acting in such an emergency and for such high ends, let us see how careful the United States were not to become in any manner committed or crippled in the disposition of the money awarded when it should have been received by us.

In the instructions given by Secretary Fish to Messrs. Cushing, Evarts, and Waite, counsel of the United States, he said:

The President desires to have the subject discussed as one between the two governments, and he directs me to urge upon you strongly to secure, if possible, the award of a sum in gross. In the discussion of this question, and in the treatment of the entire case, you will be careful not to commit the Government as to the disposition of what may be awarded. * * * It is possible that there may be duplicate claims for some of the property alleged to have been captured or destroyed, as in the cases of insurers and insured. The Government wishes to hold itself free to decide as to the rights and claims of insurers upon the termination of the case. If the value of the property captured or destroyed be recovered in the name of the Government, the distribution of the amount recovered will be made by this Government without committal as to the mode of distribution. It is expected that all such committal be avoided in the argument of counsel.—Papers, &c., volume 2, page 414.

A gross sum was awarded and received by the United States in full of all claims of every description, and the government of Great Britain was fully and forever released and discharged from all such claims.

It is obvious that here is no case of an express trust. This money was not received or obtained with the privity and consent of any of the individual claimants. On the contrary, the Government, for the reasons I have stated, assumed to treat the entire demands as its own, and to deal with Great Britain upon the theory it was the owner of all these claims, and had the right to arbitrate and negotiate in respect thereto, and to receive as its own whatever sum might be awarded by the tribunal of arbitration.

Yet this money is not in fact the money of the Government, is not claimed by it, but it is conceded it belongs to some one or more of the various classes of claimants for damages by reason of the unlawful acts of the British government.

What, then, is the tenure by which this money is held by the United States, and what is the duty of Congress in providing for its distribution?

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the analogies in familiar cases in equity are complete.

A person takes the custody and control of the personal estate of a deceased individual and deals with it as his own. The law converts him into a trustee, and makes him liable as an administrator de son tort.

A person standing in loco parentis to one or more minors assumes the control and disposition of property belonging to such minor or minors. The law converts him into a trustee for such minor. A stranger or one of several cestui que trusts intrudes upon an express trust, and assumes the whole management and control of the trust property. The law converts him into a trustee, and renders him liable to account more strictly even than if he had been appointed by the court to execute such trust.

An attorney purchases the property of his client at a judicial sale in his own name; the law converts him into a trustee for such client.

Now the Government of the United States has assumed the power and authority to deal with all private claims as its own; has received a gross sum therefor; and has released and forever discharged all such claims. It is obvious to my mind that this money is held in trust in the sense I have named, and that the trust is as broad and comprehensive as the claims which were satisfied and discharged by the payment and receipt of such gross sum.

Assuming the correctness of this position it follows as a fundamental principle that in the distribution of the fund the highest equity is first to prevail and each equity in its turn according to its validity. Following this rule the insurers who were actual losers have already been provided for and paid. It would seem that the actual losses of property uninsured are equitably upon the same footing. But, Mr. Speaker, as I said in the outset, I do not propose to discuss the detail of distribution, contenting myself with referring to the general principles upon which I think it should be made.

Here, then, is no express trust, no limitation upon the general power of distribution, except such as the rules of equity impose; and within that range Congress is left free to dispose of this money.

Nor was it in the power of the government of Great Britain to place any limitation or check upon the power to distribute this fund. She was the wrong-doer and cannot be permitted by objecting to the allowance of one claim or class of claims to deprive such claimants of their equitable rights.

But, Mr. Speaker, gentlemen who differ with the views I have expressed say by the terms of the award the money belongs to a class of claimants, the insurance companies, and that good faith demands they should be preferred. I cannot concur in this view. I have very briefly endeavored to show the money was not paid or received for any such purpose. I do not deny the obligation of good faith in the disposition of this money. Why are the persons to whom I have referred in supposing cases—the administrator de son tort, the person in loco parentis, the intruder upon an express trust, the attorney purchasing his client's property—held liable as trustees? It is, sir, because good faith requires it.

It was a remark of Michael Hoffman, in the New York constitutional convention of 1846, speaking of the obligation of the State to its public creditors, that "Good faith is a jewel."

It is so, Mr. Speaker, between private individuals. It is eminently so between a government and its citizens. The United States assumed to take this money as its own. The individual claimants were ignored. The parental power of the Government was exercised for the high ends to which I have referred. The money is clearly subject to the operation of the broad equities named, and the highest good faith demands at the hands of Congress that actual sufferers shall be provided for in its distribution.

The Dead Lock.

SPEECH OF HON. JAMES WILSON,

OF IOWA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

June 28, 1876,

On the question of agreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, there is cause for sincere concern relative to the position of the two Houses on appropriation bills. The position assumed by the controlling party in the House that the constitutional provision giving us the sole power to originate a revenue bill contemplates that we are justified in compelling the Senate to come to our views respecting the amounts that shall be appropriated is controverted by the Senate, who insist that appropriation bills shall only contain provisions to carry out existing laws, and that existing laws should not be changed on an appropriation bill.

To sustain the stand taken by the House, the remarks of several gentlemen and some papers that have been submitted to the House for action attempt to draw analogies between the legislative bodies of this country and Great Britain that do not exist; endeavors to compare our House of Representatives with the House of Commons, where comparison is impossible, and tries to run a parallel between our Senate and the House of Lords relative to power over money bills, where the constitutional powers of the one and the hereditary prerogatives of the other forbid the effort.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] in his admiration for the monarchical form of government seems to forget that the contrasts between our Government and that of Great Britain are much more marked than the analogies. The Commons only grant money on the petition of the Crown. Our Executive makes no petition. We pass bills in the line of our duty with nothing in the nature of a grant about them. The power of the Commons has steadily grown, since their original powers only reached to the extent of petitioning the Crown and Peers, till they now govern the country in reality, while the House of Representatives has no more power to-day than when the Constitution was adopted. Our Executive is elective; the English executive inherits. Our Senate is elective; the House of Lords is hereditary. Our Houses meet by constitutional provision; the English houses are convened by the sovereign. They are controlled by precedent; we act under the Constitution. The English houses separately claim the initiatory on special subjects of legislation; our jurisdiction is co-ordinate except in relation to originating revenue bills.

In England, the origin of taxation refers to the feudal aids and services due from the tenants to the Crown, recognizing a condition of superior and inferior that we do not recognize as existing politically between individuals in our land or as existing between the House of Representatives and the Senate. The tenants in chief to the Crown, as a Parliament, granted to William the Conqueror aid due him as their superior. (401.)

Prior to 1688 imposts were occasionally levied by royal prerogative without the consent of Parliament; notably the imposts levied by James after the death of Charles II. Since that time the revenues of the Crown have been dependent altogether upon Parliament, and a careful study of the encroachments of the royal prerogative upon rights of the Commons before the accession of the Prince of Orange to the English throne will furnish abundant reason for customs that have prevailed since that time with regard to the appropriation of money for their civil and military establishments.

King John bound himself in the great charter not to assess "aids and scutages" otherwise than by the common council of his realm; but his successors often did it notwithstanding. Macaulay tells us that a great constitutional principle, so old that none can say when it began to exist, is that the king could impose no taxes without the consent of his Parliament; that this was a fundamental rule five hundred years ago, but at a much later period it was not cleared of all ambiguity. This rule has grown into constitutional enactment now with us, that regulates the raising of revenue by a system clearly defined and should be well understood. The necessity of constant vigilance in the Middle Ages against royal prerogative does not exist in our form of government. The encroachment mentioned by the gentleman from New York of the Senate upon the privileges of the House is wholly imaginary. The Constitution, while it gives the House power to originate revenue bills, also gives the Senate power to amend. The law of amendment reaches to the extent of substituting one word for another, one paragraph for another, one section for another, and everything but the enacting clause may be substituted. The Senate not only exercises a right, but performs a duty in amending a bill for which they are as much responsible to the people as the House is. The framers of our Constitution had the struggles of the commons against the encroachments of kingly power as a light to them when they constructed a charter that balanced the governing powers so evenly that no undue prerogative of either Senate, House, Executive, or judiciary could exercise an amount of authority likely to become dangerous.

DeLolme, a writer on the British constitution, says:

Without looking further back than the reign of Charles II, we see that the House of Commons had in that reign begun to adopt the method of adding (or tacking, as it is commonly expressed) such bills as they wanted more particularly to have passed to their money bills. This forcible use of their undoubted privilege of granting money, if it had been suffered to grow into common practice, would have totally destroyed the equilibrium that ought to exist between them and the Crown. But the lords took upon themselves the task of maintaining that equilibrium. They complained with great warmth of the several precedents that were made by the Commons of the practice we mention. They insisted that bills should be framed in the old and decent way of Parliament, and at last made it a standing order of their House to reject upon the sight of them all bills that are tacked to money bills.

One of the differences between the House and Senate now is, the House has indulged in new legislation on the appropriation bills to such an extent as to upset all the well-established rules of procedure between the two Houses; and while the House insists on the exclusive control over money bills, they also violate the time-honored rule relative to what a money bill should contain.

Let us now look for an illustration of the upper House going beyond its constitutional prerogatives. DeLolme says:

In the reign of King William III, a few years after the Revolution, attacks were made upon the Crown from another quarter. A strong party was formed in the House of Lords, and, as we may see in Bishop Bennet's History of his Own Times, they entertained very deep designs. One of their views among others was to abridge the royal prerogative of calling Parliaments and judging of the proper times of doing it. They accordingly framed and carried into their House a bill for ascertaining the sitting of Parliament every year; but the bill after it had passed their House was rejected by the Commons.

DeLolme also gives an account of an attempt by the Lords in the reign of George I to limit the number of the members of their own House and prevent the Crown from adding to their numbers—the only check the crown has on the Lords should they desire to stop the passage of money bills. The Commons again stepped in and sustained the Crown by rejecting the bill. Thus we find in English history the checks one branch of the government could put upon the other. The people were ready with the sword to support the Commons against the encroachments of the royal prerogative. The Commons sustained the royal prerogative against the encroachments of the Lords, and the hereditary House of Lords refused to allow the Commons to encroach on their prerogatives or those of the Crown.

Macaulay says that a week of civil war in England would be felt from the Hoang-Ho to the Missouri a hundred years hence. We know something of the effects of civil war. But he must have the gift of prophecy who can foretell the effects of stopping our Government by a refusal to pass the appropriation bills, of stopping the courts, the mails, the foreign service, the Army, the Navy, the Indian Bureau, the Pension Bureau, Bureaus of Education and Agriculture; in short, stop the whole American Government because one committee of the House, after having absorbed the functions of nearly all the standing committees of the House, insist upon pushing the prerogatives of the House beyond any precedent heretofore set, and against the very letter of the Constitution itself, that gives the Senate the same power to amend a revenue bill—conceding an appropriation bill to be a revenue bill—that the House has to originate it. If the Senate refuse to cut down where it should be done they are responsible and can be reached, but such a revolution as a failure to pass the appropriation bills would bring about is not justified by the Senate refusing to change existing law on a money bill.

I personally believe that many of our reductions are justifiable. I fully believe that some of them are not. But, be that as it may, no condemnation of a refusal to effect the best terms possible within the remaining days of the fiscal year would be too severe.

Lord Brougham, on The British Constitution, says of our system on this point:

In the House of Representatives resides exclusively the power of propounding taxes of any description, but not so exclusively as in England, because the Senate may alter and amend the supply bills. * * * The suffering amendments upon money bills is no doubt an improvement upon the English constitution, but there is still left a remnant of the same error on which our Commons claim the exclusive right of dealing with taxation.

The analogy between the House of Representatives and House of Commons is destroyed when we consider that the Commons are compelled to limit the time that mutiny bills and appropriation bills shall be in force to insure the annual meeting of Parliament. May says:

Without 'heir annual sanction the maintenance of a standing army in time of peace would be illegal and the army and marines on shore would be released from all martial discipline and subordination. This usage affords an additional security for the annual meeting of Parliament, which is otherwise insured by the system of providing money for the public service by annual grants.

The ancient prerogative of the Crown to call Parliament together was often negatively abused. James II levied taxes without sanction of Parliament. Charles I feared to call his Commons together. Our Constitution insures the meeting of Congress, and with that safeguard placed in the Constitution the co-operation of the Senate in the appropriation of money for the public use became desirable, there being no need of placing in the House the exclusive control of money bills to insure its being called to sit at all. The House of Commons send to the Lords the supply bills in brief, enactments of amounts needed, and refuse to furnish the details on which those totals are based, or even papers giving information on the subject. Our Constitution giving the Senate the power to amend contemplates that they shall have as ample information on the subject as the House and the right to the possession of all estimates, information, papers, and facts bearing on the subject. For the House to deny the Senate the exercise of its constitutional power is revolution.

Consider the present situation. We have civil and military establishments, the salary of each officer and employé established by law. The House, whether by exclusive right or not, originates bills appropriating money to support these establishments.

It has been customary to allow nothing to be tacked to these bills not in accord with existing law, if either House objects. When the law is to be changed a standing committee of the House, under the rules, has jurisdiction, and part of the legislative machinery of the House is arranged by which laws can be changed when a majority of the House desire. There are thirty-four standing committees, upon which are appointed all the members of the House, having charge of all the subjects upon which Congress can legislate.

One of these committees is that on appropriations, consisting of eleven members, the same as the other committees. It has formerly been charged with the duty of preparing and reporting bills to appropriate money in conformity with existing law. When legislation has been tacked on these bills, it has been by suspending the rule and making it in order by a two-thirds vote. Such new legislation has been limited heretofore to occasional clauses. But this session a new policy has been inaugurated, enabling a majority by changing the rule to do what could only be done heretofore by a vote of two-thirds of the House. This departure from time-honored custom has given to the eleven members composing the Appropriations Committee the power heretofore exercised by the standing committees, and is a concentration of power unheard of in our times. Close observation of the workings of this new order of things has shown that when the opinion of the Appropriations Committee clashed with that of any other standing committee, the standing committee could not be sustained.

It is a well-known fact that unless the party in power for the time being in the House stands well by the Appropriations Committee they cannot succeed in carrying through the eleven bills for the support of the Government. Our eleven members on the Appropriations Committee first got the power through a change in the rule. Then the majority was compelled to sustain them as against any standing committee. The Committee on Appropriations adopted a theory of reduction of 10 per cent. in pay, 20 per cent in force. In some Bureaus of the Government this might be applied without detriment; in others only at the expense of efficiency. The Committee on Military Affairs, on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, on Agriculture, on Indian Affairs, and others, might and often did protest against the iron resolution of the Committee on Appropriations. But power is sweet even to a committee, and necessity compelled the House to sustain them. One by one the standing committees were beaten. The judgment of one committee of eleven men was indorsed on one day against the judgment of eleven men on one standing committee, on another day against eleven men on another standing committee, until the whole field was gone over; and now we have the law changed relating to all branches of the Government on the recommendation of eleven members of the House, whom the House was compelled to sustain if we passed appropriation bills at all. I do not say that the Appropriations Committee has not been industrious. I am sure they have been. I do not say they are incompetent. I think if they had confined themselves to reporting bills to carry out existing law, as former Appropriations Committees have, they would have been fairly successful. But they have applied an unbending rule to everything. They cannot know what all the consequences will be. The House surely does not know whether they have done well or crippled the Executive Departments of the Government. The Senate, being vested by the Constitution with the same powers to amend appropriation bills that we are vested with, and consequently under the same responsibility the House is under, and hesitating to stop or block the wheels of Government, determined to be governed by law, and change the law relative to appropriation bills only when their judgment tells them it is wise to do so.

For this law-abiding spirit the gentleman from New York compares the Senate to the English Crown and their stand for law and order to the encroachments of the royal prerogative on the English Commons. The House says it is economy because the Appropriations Committee thinks it is. The Senate does not know it is economy and proposes to stand by the law until a reason is given for changing it. It cannot be said that the Senate refuses to agree to the reduction of expenditures because they concurred last Congress in a reduction of twenty-six millions on these same bills when the House gave them abundant time to ascertain what they were doing. There is no doubt of their willingness now to help effect salutary retrenchment, but it is not clear to many of us that we have not gone entirely too far in nearly every direction, while it is clear to many of us that we have cut too deep in many directions.

It would not become a member of the House to advocate the yielding of any privilege or prerogative that belongs to it, either by custom or through the Constitution. But the issue raised by the gentleman from New York, respecting the right of the House to the exclusive control of appropriation bills and the denial of the right of the Senate to either originate or amend, can result in no good to the country. The two bodies are co-ordinate and have equal powers in making all laws, except that the House has the sole power to originate a revenue bill. After it is originated, the powers of the House and Senate are equal in every respect. Nor is it possible to conceive how any evil can result from the power of the Senate to amend or reject any bill. The Senate is not, like the House of Lords, a hereditary body, but is elective and representative in its character. There is but little analogy between our Senate and the English House of Lords. The reference of the gentleman from New York to the struggle between King and Parliament, before it can be brought into comparison with our courted dead lock, must be transposed. In the English case the Parliament struggled for existence. If the King could levy taxes he had no need of Parliament. In our case we are the aggressors; we are reaching for more power than the Constitution gives us; and, while there was no doubt the people sided with the Commons, we have no evidence whatever that the people desire the Senate to yield to us its constitutional privileges. The judgment of both is needed, and I do not think it would be best that the whole responsibility of passing appropriation bills should rest on the House. It is a prominent feature in our form of government that absolute power and sole responsibility rest nowhere but with the people, whose majority vote can bring about anything they desire, the same as a majority of this House can find a way to do anything or prevent anything from being done.

It is the duty of the House, however, to guard well the people's money, as it is the duty of the Senate and the Executive. We know very well that frequently bills are allowed to pass with the knowledge that the Senate will correct some error or reject the bill altogether. We know that the President is very careful about attaching his signature to bills that shall form a precedent as to a class of claims that would deplete the Treasury. Neither the President, the Senate, nor the House is excusable if a bad bill passes, and the vigilance of all three is often overreached by the advocates of doubtful measures. Notably so in regard to third-class mail matter. None of the checks can be safely removed, even if the oath of a Senator to support the Constitution would permit. It takes the care of the House committee, the House itself, the Senate committee, the Senate, the President, his advisers and officers to make a law at present. Then the people must approve or its repeal is certain. The assumption of the House that they should have the sole control of appropriation bills would only embarrass the House in the future, and the people would not agree to it.

The assertion that we are the most heavily taxed people in the world has led me to inquire into the sources of taxation, and for illustration I have inquired into the amount of taxes laid on one of my constituents and who lays them. I find the average Iowan pays for municipal and local purposes, laid by himself, seven dollars and a half. The State of Iowa lays one half dollar on him; the late war, to pay interest on the war debt, pensions, war claims, &c., lays $3 on him; and the United States, to support the foreign service, the Army and Navy, pay interest on lands got by treaty from the Indians, to provide for the deficiency in the mail service, meet the executive, legislative, judicial and other expenses of the Government, lays little over $2 on him. Now you see who is taxing the people. More than one-half of all taxes are local, nearly one-fourth the interest on the cost of the late war, and a little over one-sixth suffices for all the purposes of the General Government, derived from whisky, tobacco, and foreign imports. No people on the face of the earth are as lightly taxed by their government: our Army but a skeleton, our Navy a shadow, compared with the great armies and fleets of old countries. We are the best-fed, best-clothed, best-housed, most generally educated, freest, and should be the happiest people on earth. This misrepresentation of the condition of our people on the floor of Congress is unwise and sinful, and, to a stranger who might be listening, incomprehensible.

If there is depression in some of our industries, so there is all over the world. We have been living on too high a plane; we must economize a little till times get better. Our system has enabled the workman to live like the higher classes of some countries. If overspeculation and overproduction of the products of our factories has overflowed the home market we must seek one abroad and curtail family expenses till the home market revives or the foreign one is found. If you take off the $2 per capita that internal and customs duties bring us and run the Government for nothing, it would not create a home market for iron and cotton goods.

Our people are not ground down by taxation. We expend very freely to educate and improve, and moderately for civil service. If the House would turn its attention to the industries of the people more than to the success of party it would find a more noble field for inquiry.

Is it remarkable that the Senate could not see in the few days we have given them to consider the multitudinous changes we have made in the general laws the propriety of adopting them on sight? We did not see the propriety ourselves. I saw where the rule pinched in some cases; other members of the minority saw where it pinched other parts of the service. I was voted down in some instances; other members of the minority were voted down in others. I could see where the Department of Agriculture, the Bureau of Statistics, or the Post-Office Department would be hampered in contributing to the development of the great West. Other members of the minority who had acquaintance with the Army, the Navy, the collection of revenue, or the efficiency of the foreign service, presented arguments that were unanswerable against the new legislation respecting these Departments of the Government. But the Committee on Appropriations was satisfied of the wisdom of their course; the majority of the House sustained them in every case. The standing committees protested in turn, and were in turn voted down. In this manner we have passed the appropriation bills. The Senate proposes to change the law where necessary through the usual committees intrusted with each special subject, and pass appropriation bills in conformity with law.

The House say that they are justified in insisting that the Senate shall take the bills as the House send them or a dead lock will be justifiable; that is, if the judgment of eleven of our men is not conceded to be right, without time to ascertain whether it is right or wrong, the wheels of Government shall stop.

There is much in the conduct of the majority that seems to invite a dead lock. Our rules require that at or near the close of a session the disagreeing House shall ask for a committee of conference. We have permitted our bills as they came back from the Senate amended to lie on our table until the Senate should take the initiative in bringing the two Houses together. After the Senate did ask for a second committee of conference where the first committee had failed to agree, we advertised our defiance by re-appointing the same members as conferees on the part of the House. If the Senate takes the same course, the two Houses will never come together. I am slow to believe that our very late action on the appropriation bills, our wholesale change of existing law, our extensive tacking on of new legislation, our refusal to ask for committees of conference, and our uncourteous re-appointment of the same members on conference committees that had failed to bring the two Houses together, is intended to result in a dead lock and consequent embarrassment of the Executive Departments of the Government; but it does not require a lively imagination to entertain the thought.

The remarks of our Ex-Speaker pro tempore at Saint Louis certainly indicate an intention to coerce the Senate or refuse to pass some of the bills till after November. If the American people cannot see through this, then our free schools, free press, free library, and free churches have failed to teach the people how to analyze the dark ways of politicians.

It cannot be said that a Senator does not sympathize with the people. He must know his people as well as the Representative, must be familiar with their religious, educational, and industrial interests, or he will not long hold his position as Senator. The only difference between him and a Representative is that he is elected by members of the Legislature, who are generally instructed tacitly or formally by the people whom they shall support, and the Senator is elected for a longer time. But the responsibility is as great as the Representative acts under, and communications with the people more voluminous. One of the most popular amendments to the Constitution would be to provide for the election of Senators by the people. The theory that they represent States is becoming obsolete. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Cox] in this House deplores, and Mr. Potter from the same State in the last House deplored, the inequality of representation in the Senate. Would they equalize the representation and then deny them the power to act as representatives?

The only judge between House and Senate is the sovereign people. If we ask the Senate to go further than they will go, we must compromise on the best terms we can get and let the people judge between us. The people will hold us to account if we stop the administration of public affairs. The people will deal with the Senate if they refuse to meet us in our desire to cut off needless expenditures; what are needless and what are not they are as much the judges as we are under the Constitution.

There is equal desire on both sides to do for the best; but the republicans regard the country as growing and expanding, and think it necessary to provide for it. The democrats seem to regard the country as dead and proceed to administer on the estate by shutting up the house, bringing the family together to mourn, notifying everybody of the sad event, putting on a rueful countenance; money only is paid for any purpose after the utmost difficulties. A funeral gloom seems settled on the House. One can scarcely help thinking that one of the old Jewish prophets is present proclaiming, "Woe to the land, and the inhabitants thereof."

District of Columbia Affairs.

SPEECH OF HON. W. W. CRAPO,

OF MASSACHUSETTS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

July 13, 1876,

On affairs in the District of Columbia.

Mr. CRAPO. Mr. Speaker, the fact that the Committee for the District of Columbia has unanimously reported certain resolutions as the conclusion reached by it upon its examination into the affairs of the District, under the order of the House directing the investigation, would seem to make unnecessary any discussion of the question. But while entirely harmonious in recommending the action to be taken by the House, the committee have submitted reports quite conflicting, and members of the committee widely disagree in the inferences drawn from the testimony. I am compelled, from a sense of duty, to dissent from the report presented by the chairman, [Mr. BUCKNER,] which expresses the views of the minority of the committee, and beg to state briefly my reasons.

This investigation has been thorough and painstaking. It has been conducted with candor and fairness. Every person with a complaint or grievance, desiring a hearing, has been fully heard. Statements directly and remotely bearing upon the inquiry have been received. Disappointed contractors, discharged employés, "ring" men and "anti-ring" men, representatives of every theory of District government and District management, have had entire freedom of speech accorded to them. On the other hand those representing the District commissioners and the board of audit have had every opportunity for defense and explanation. While we have listened to every rumor and suspicion of official misconduct, we have granted every facility for explanation and contradiction. It is but simple justice to all of the members of the committee to say that there has been a denial to none in the search for facts and truth. No single member of the committee can arrogate to himself a purer purpose or a more impartial mind in this investigation than his colleagues.

And yet, Mr. Speaker, we find ourselves reaching very different conclusions. Why is this? I account for it upon a theory entirely consistent with fairness and integrity. Some of the committee naturally approach the inquiry with the feeling that there must of necessity be a grievous wrong and a corrupt intent simply because a debt which they had supposed, from an imperfect knowledge of the details, should not have exceeded $10,000,000 has reached nearly fifteen millions. Here at the outset is a circumstance which to some carries suspicion of fraud and corruption, and with it a natural prejudice. There are some men, and they can be found on congressional committees as well as elsewhere, who, without intending to wrong any one, believe that office-holders have more than the ordinary share of human infirmities and are more liable to err than men in private life. On the other hand there are those who in an investigation like this have some faith in human nature; who are slow to believe that men who have worn a reputation for honesty and integrity both in public and private life, trusted and honored for years by their neighbors and friends, respected by all who know them intimately, do not surrender all virtue and morality simply by being placed in official position even at Washington.

But these differences in temperament and the prejudices which arise from political preferences and party associations do not fully account for the conflicting views held by the committee. There is in my judgment a better and more satisfactory explanation for these opposite conclusions, and one which, while prejudice and bias may intensify the opinion when formed, is not inconsistent with an honest and earnest endeavor to arrive at correct results. This explanation I find in the contrary views entertained by members of the committee upon the legal effect of the act of June 20, 1874, and the different opinions concerning the authority conferred by that act upon the District commissioners and the board of audit. If the legal propositions stated by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER] are correct, then I can find some warrant for his conclusions, although a partisan spirit may have magnified some of the alleged misconduct and offenses. But if, on the other hand, his construction and interpretation of the law is erroneous, then the conclusions and inferences which he has drawn from the evidence fail.

In my judgment the report of the chairman is based upon a misapprehension of the law and an incorrect legal understanding of the powers and authority conferred by Congress upon the District commissioners and the board of audit. The District commissioners and the board of audit, before entering upon their duties, consulted with persons learned in the law and competent to advise them. They obtained the legal opinion of the official law adviser of the District, and they sought information from those who, as members of a special committee of the last Congress, had given much consideration to the affairs of the District, and had been largely instrumental in the passage of the act which authorized their appointment. Acting thus carefully at the outset in determining their powers and duties, and with no doubt about their legal authority, they proceeded to the discharge of their trust. It is admitted by all that they have acted in good faith, and that their administration has been marked with personal integrity and good sense; but it is asserted in the minority report (that signed by Mr. BUCKNER and others) that they grossly exceeded the limited authority conferred upon them.

Let us consider this question. It is admitted by the report that "there can be no dispute or controversy that Congress intended that the valid contracts of the board of public works should be completed, and that provision was made for auditing and funding the claims growing out of the completion of this work according to the terms of these contracts."

Elsewhere in the report it is stated concerning the provision for the settlement of the fourth class of claims in section 6 of the act of June 20, 1874, that "the phraseology of the statute describing the claims of this class leaves no doubt that it was intended to include the claims growing out of the incomplete contracts of the board of public works. They must be claims for work done, or claims hereafter created, that is, for work to be done, but arising out of contracts already made by the board of public works."

It is also stated that "neither the commissioners nor the engineer can be held responsible if the work needful to finish these contracts required a larger expenditure than the sum estimated by the joint committee" of 1874. The report makes "no exception to the increase of the debt of the District growing out of this expenditure. Whether more or less than estimated, the claims growing out of the completion of these incomplete contracts were provided for and required to be audited by the board of audit." But the report contends that the completion of these contracts "was not a matter over which the commissioners had any jurisdiction, except to see, by their engineer, that the work was done according to the original contract, and that the measurements were honestly and fairly made."

The report also contains the following admission respecting the power of the commissioners: "There is no doubt that they had authority, and it was their duty, to preserve and protect the improvements of the District." But it is denied "that it results from this admitted power that they had authority to contract for the payment of the labor expended in the preservation and protection of these improvements in the bonds of the District."

And touching the ninth section of the contract of the late board of public works, which is in the following language:

Ninth. It is further agreed that if at any time, during the period of —— years from the completion of this contract, any part or parts thereof shall become defective, from improper material or construction, and in the opinion of the said party of the first part require repair, the said party of the second part will, on being notified thereof, immediately commence and complete the same to the satisfaction of the party of the first part; and in case of failure or neglect of the said party of the second part so to do, the same shall be done under the direction and orders of the party of the first part, at the expense of the party of the second part.

It is contended in the report that even if the commissioners, under that section, had the power, on notice to the contractor of a failure on his part, to make the repairs and charge the cost thereof to the contractor, still the commissioners have no authority "to issue bonds of the District in payment of those repairs." It is further contended that "if the obligation is between the District and the contractor, that obligation is that the contractor shall keep the streets improved by him in repair, and the commissioners would enforce this contract on the part of the District by suing the contractor for his failure and obtaining a judgment against him.

The report admits that there is before the committee no positive and direct proof of "corrupt motive or criminal misconduct" on the part of the commissioners, and does not even insinuate that there is any kind of evidence, however slight, of such motive or misconduct. Nor does the report deny that the work performed by the commissioners was well done, was advantageous to the public interest, was necessary to the preservation and protection of existing improvements and to the convenience of the public, and prevented the destruction or waste of public property. But nevertheless the report claims that there has been on their part "not only frequent violations of law, but absolute unfaithfulness in the administration of the affairs of the District."

The report, however, imputes to the commissioners no other violation of law or unfaithfulness than those involved in proceeding with entire integrity of purpose to accomplish important and necessary public benefits under a construction of the law differing in the respects indicated from that adopted by the report.

Thus it is seen that the points especially laid down in the report wherein its construction of the law differs from that of the commissioners, and wherein it consequently claims that the latter violated the law, are as follows:

First, it is contended in the report that although under the grant of authority to the commissioners in the act of June 20, 1874, and under section 6 of that act, providing for the settlement of the fourth class of claims therein specified, namely, "claims existing or hereafter created for which no evidence of indebtedness has been issued, arising out of contracts, written or oral, made by the board of public works," it was, in the words of the report, "intended to include all claims growing out of the incomplete contracts with the board of public works," and "provision was made for auditing and funding the claims growing out of the completion of this work according to the claims of this contract;" yet nevertheless the commissioners were required to adhere strictly to the terms of these contracts, and only in the case of the performance of such contracts according to their strict terms could claims be adjusted by the board of audit in certificates of that board convertible into 3.65 bonds.

Second. It is claimed in the report that, as respects the ninth section above quoted of board of public works contracts, the commissioners could only sue the contractor for his failure and obtain judgment against him, and in making repairs, in case of default of contractor, could only apply taxes or other revenue to the payment of the same.

The adoption of a construction different from that of the report in these two respects, admitted to be "without corrupt motive or criminal misconduct" and (by the implied admission of the report) for the accomplishment of public benefits, constitute flagrant violations of law and an absolute unfaithfulness in the administration of the affairs of the District charged to the commissioners in the report.

Let us examine these two points.

First. According to the report the unfinished contracts of the board of public works were intended by the law to be completed. The second section of the act of June 20, 1874, vested in the commissioners the power and authority theretofore lawfully vested in the board of public works, except so far as limited by said enactment; consequently, after the board of public works was abolished, the commissioners became vested, within the limitations prescribed in the act of June 20, 1874, with the former power and authority of the board of public works in respect to such contracts. They were substituted for the board of public works as one of the contracting parties. Within the limitations of the act, as a contracting party, and with the concurrence of the other party, or so far as authorized by the contract without authorization from the other party, they might modify unfinished contracts of the board of public works. The limitation upon the power of the commissioners is against the making of contracts or incurring of obligations "other than such contracts and obligations as may be necessary to the faithful administration of the valid laws enacted for the government of said District, to the execution of existing legal obligations and contracts, and to the protection or preservation of improvements existing or commenced and not completed at the time of the passage of this act."

The report concedes that the commissioners might make contracts and incur obligations for either of these purposes. If they might make a contract for these purposes and afterward, with the concurrence of the other contracting party, modify such contract, so also, being substituted by the act of Congress for the board of public works in unfinished contracts with that board, and taking all the power and authority of that board within the above limitations, it necessarily follows that in the performance of such contracts the commissioners might make modifications of their provisions necessary to the faithful administration of the valid laws enacted for the government of the District, to the execution of existing legal obligations and contracts, and for the protection or preservation of improvements existing, or commenced and not completed at the time of the passage of the act of June 20, 1874. A different construction, denying the authority of the commissioners to make the modifications necessary for such purposes, would operate very prejudicially to the public interests, and would require them to go on with the performance of contracts of the board of public works in a manner conflicting with the faithful administration of the valid laws, or with the execution of existing legal obligations, or prejudicial to the protection and preservation of existing improvements. Assuming, then, that such a modification might be made, the question upon which the report adopts a different conclusion from that acted upon by the commissioners is whether claims for work done pursuant to such modifications would have to be audited and settled by the ordinary accounting officers of the District and paid for in cash out of the revenues of the District, or whether such claims under such contracts of the board of public works, so lawfully modified, came within the fourth class in section 6 of the act of June 20, 1874, as "claims existing or hereafter created for which no evidence of indebtedness has been issued, arising out of contracts, written or oral, made by the board of public works," and coming within such class had to be audited and settled by the board of audit and paid in certificates of that board, convertible into 3.65 bonds. The report furnishes no reasoning in support of the former of these two constructions. The construction is simply dogmatically laid down, and the adoption of the other construction is stigmatized as a "flagrant violation of the law and absolute unfaithfulness in the administration of affairs."

But a claim arising under such an unperformed contract of the board of public works, and created by a modification lawfully and necessarily made by the commissioners, was a claim necessarily and lawfully created after the passage of the act of June 20, 1874, and arising out of a contract of the board of public works. Therefore, in respect of all of its conditions, it belonged to the class of "claims existing or hereafter created for which no evidence of indebtedness has been issued arising out of contracts, written or oral, made by the board of public works."

In specifying claims not merely to arise after the passage of the act, but to be thereafter created, the law seems to provide pointedly and specifically for lawful and necessary modifications of the original letter of the contract. Such modifications always become necessary in the prosecution of extensive public works, and cannot be avoided. Again, the construction laid down in the report would have required a claim arising out of such a lawful modification of a contract of the board of public works to be separated into two branches, one belonging to the strict and original letter of the contract, and coming within the jurisdiction of the board of audit; and the other coming within the jurisdiction of the ordinary and subordinate accounting officers of the District; the latter branch to be paid for in cash, and the other to be paid for in board of audit certificates convertible into 3.65 bonds. In carrying out these necessary modifications nice calculations would have to be made in order that these two kinds of payments might accord. In many cases it would be impossible to regulate the compensation of the contractors, and impossible to audit and settle the claim by separating it into the two branches, and sending one branch to one set of accounting officers for one mode of payment, and the other branch to a different set of accounting officers for payment according to a different standard of values. Much confusion would have resulted from this course, even if practicable. But the act of June 20, 1874, contemplated and required that claims for work rendered necessary in the completion of contracts of the board of public works should be submitted to the examination, not of the subordinates and appointees of the commissioners, but to examination by the board of audit, composed of the Comptrollers of the United States Treasury, the highest accounting officers of the United States Government, independent of the executive authority of the District, and possessing high personal qualifications as well as high official position. One great purpose of the act of June 20, 1874, would have been frustrated had necessary modifications in uncompleted contracts—however slight such modifications might have been—removed the settlement of claims under such contracts from the jurisdiction of the board of audit and transferred their settlement to subordinate officers of the District, appointed by the District commissioners. It would have been a "flagrant violation of law and absolute unfaithfulness in the administration of affairs" had the commissioners and the board of audit adopted the construction laid down in the report.

Second. The only remaining matter wherein the report claims that the law was wrongfully construed by the commissioners and by the board of audit is in reference to the settlement of claims under contracts made by the commissioners pursuant to the powers given to them under the ninth section of contracts originally entered into by the board of public works. This point requires an examination also as to the fifth section, to which the report makes no reference. The fifth section of board of public works contracts is as follows:

Fifth. It is further agreed that if, at any time, the party of the first part shall be of opinion that the said work, or any part thereof, is unnecessarily delayed, or that the said contractor is willfully violating any of the conditions or covenants of this contract, or is executing the same in bad faith, all of the work may be discontinued under this contract, or any part thereof; and the said party of the first part shall thereupon have the power to place such and so many persons as may be deemed advisable, by contract or otherwise, to work at and complete the work herein described, or any part thereof, and to use such materials as may be found upon the line of said work, or to procure other materials for the completion of the same, and to charge the expense of said labor and materials to the party of the second part, and the expense so charged shall be deducted and paid by the party of the first part, out of such moneys as may be then due, or may at any time thereafter grow due to the said party of the second part, under and by virtue of this agreement, or any part thereof; and in case such expense is less than the sum which would have been payable under this contract if the same had been completed, the party of the second part shall be entitled to receive the difference; and in case such expense shall exceed the last said sum, the amount of such excess shall be paid to the party of the first part by the party of the second part.

The ninth section has been cited above.

The power of the commissioners to act under the fifth section arose in the courts soon after the commissioners entered upon their duties. The power was sustained. The commissioners reported the matter to Congress in December, 1874. (See commissioners' report, December, 1874, page 22.) The commissioners advised Congress also of the fact that claims arising under contracts entered into by them by reason of this fifth section were being audited and settled by the board of audit. The same policy and requirement of the act of June 20, 1874, which required claims of the original contractor to be examined and audited by the highest accounting officers of the United States Government, acting independent of the executive authorities of the District, required also that claims where a contractor substituted by the commissioners for the original contractor by virtue of the fifth section of the original contract entered into by the board of public works should also be audited and settled by the same accounting officers. It would have been a flagrant violation of law had the board of audit neglected to perform such a duty, or had the commissioners usurped the authority and themselves, or through their subordinates assumed to examine, audit, and pay for claims under a so-called new contract made by the commissioners under the fifth section of the old contract. But if claims created under and resulting from obligations entered into by the commissioners pursuant to the fifth section of an old contract were properly to be audited by the board of audit and settled in the certificates of that board convertible into 3.65 bonds, so also were claims resulting from obligations lawfully entered into by the commissioners under the ninth section. The right in respect to the fifth section is not controverted in the report, but both sections were parts of written contracts made by the board of public works. Claims arising out of one would have to be treated in the same way as claims arising out of the other. These sections could not be separated from other sections, and claims under them be paid in cash, and claims under other sections be paid in board of audit certificates, convertible into 3.65 bonds; and the propriety and necessity of examination and audit by the board of audit in the cases where the fifth section is acted upon by the commissioners being conceded, it necessarily results that the same propriety and necessity exist in respect to the action of the commissioners under the ninth section. The commissioners, then, did not violate the law in acting under the ninth section of contracts originally made by the board of public works. The only question that remains is whether they were in any respect "absolutely unfaithful in the administration of affairs" by so acting. The report states that "if the obligation is between the District and contractor, that obligation is that the contractor shall keep the streets improved by him in repair, and the commissioners shall enforce the contract on the part of the District by suing the contractor for his failure and obtaining judgment against him." But this ninth section of the contracts contains an express stipulation binding both contracting parties, that if at any time during the prescribed period any part of the work done under the contract shall become defective from imperfect or improper material or construction and require repair, the contractor must be notified thereof and thereupon must commence and complete the same; and in case of failure or neglect of the contractor so to do, the same is then to be done under the direction of the authorities at the cost and expense of the contractor. Legal proceedings could not be instituted by the commissioners and judgment obtained against the contractor, in violation of the provisions of this section. In order to hold the contractor, the commissioners were obliged to act under this ninth section. If they had not done so, the right of recovery against the contractor would have been lost, and of course the right of recovery against his sureties.

But the report of the chairman, while denying the authority of the commissioners to make these repairs, asks, even admitting the commissioners have this right, "where do they obtain the authority to issue the bonds of the District in payment of these repairs?" The question contains a misstatement of fact. The commissioners do not issue the bonds of the District. In the case of claims under these so-called repair contracts arising out of the ninth section of contracts of the board of public works, as in the case of other claims belonging to the fourth class named in the sixth section of the act of Congress, the conversion of certificates of the board of audit into 3.65 bonds belonged entirely to the commissioners of the sinking fund under the act of Congress; and in the discharge of that duty the sinking-fund commissioners were entirely independent of the District commissioners. The question of the examination and allowance of such claims, and of the issue of certificates thereon convertible into 3.65 bonds, was one which had to be decided by the First and Second Comptrollers of the United States Treasury. The corresponding question, as to whether the commissioners would assume to exercise authority under the ninth section of the board of public works' contracts, had to be determined by the commissioners. But the views of the commissioners could not and did not control the views or action of the board of audit; and no effort was made to influence the judgment of those officers. The action of the commissioners of the sinking fund in converting the board of audit certificates into 3.65 bonds was also independent of the action of either the board of audit or the commissioners. Had not these three boards in the exercise of their independent duties concurred, not a single 3.65 bond would have been issued in payment of this class of work; nor would the commissioners have exercised any authority under the ninth section of the old contracts. It may well be said, however, that the decision of the First and Second Comptrollers of the United States Treasury, the highest accounting officers of the United States Government, who were expressly selected for their personal qualifications and on account of their official position by the act of June 20, 1874, for the responsible duties imposed upon the board of audit, was an authority in support of the construction of the commissioners which is entitled to great weight.

The commissioners have shown, and the report does not deny, that the rapid deterioration of the pavements and carriage-ways of the city in 1875 made it impossible for the commissioners to make repairs within the limit of their cash resources. If the commissioners had not exercised the power given them by the ninth section the preservation and protection of the improvements would have been neglected, and the commissioners would have violated what the report concedes to be a duty plainly imposed upon them by the act of June 20, 1874. It follows, therefore, that in this respect the commissioners have not only not violated the law nor been unfaithful in the administration of affairs, but they have acted in conformity with the law, and by their course accomplished what could not otherwise have been accomplished and what was necessary to the faithful discharge of the duties imposed upon them.

If the work falling within necessary and lawful modifications made by the commissioners of unperformed contracts originally entered into by the board of public works and of obligations entered into by the commissioners under the ninth section of contracts of the board of public works was well done, and was necessary, (as to neither of which is there any denial in the report,) the only practical detriment that could result to the public interest by reason of the adoption by the commissioners of their construction instead of the one indicated in the report is that the one might involve a greater expenditure than the other. But the report fails to show how work could be done more economically under one construction than under the other, or how the District government could have received a better equivalent under one construction than under the other. If, therefore, there is even a fair question of construction in respect to these two matters, a person adopting the construction laid down in the report would not be justified in stigmatizing the adoption of the other construction, without corrupt motive or criminal misconduct, as being a flagrant violation of law and absolute unfaithfulness in administration. The commissioners, however, have more than the justification of honestly adopting a reasonable construction of a statute with the concurrence of two other independent boards of officers. It has been shown that they could not logically or lawfully have pursued a different course; nor could they otherwise have regarded the act of June 20, in providing a separate tribunal of the highest accounting officers of the United States Government, independent of the executive authority of the District, for the examination of all the claims existing or thereafter created arising under the contracts and in the course of the performance of the contracts of the old board of public works. Nor could they hold delinquent contractors to their obligations, nor could they have carried out the official duty imposed upon them for the public benefit of preserving and protecting existing improvements.

Beyond the two matters above considered the report finds no fault with the construction of the act of June 20, 1874, according to which the commissioners have discharged their official duties. I have considered simply the question of legal authority under which the commissioners and the board of audit have acted. If the positions taken by me are sound, then the report and the argument of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER] completely fail. If these officers acted within the authority conferred upon them by the statute, then there is no need of further discussion. The resolution of inquiry under which the committee has acted alleged that contracts had been made in the interest of favorites and friends. There is not the slightest evidence to sustain such allegation. On the other hand, the testimony shows that the commissioners and the board of audit have acted throughout in good faith and with the highest integrity.

My colleague from Vermont [Mr. HENDEE] has so fully stated the facts and figures demonstrating the wise, prudent, and economical management of the affairs of the District under the charge of the present officials, that I need not discuss this branch of the inquiry. There are in the present system of District government many imperfections which need to be remedied. But the faults are in the system rather than with the persons intrusted with the executive authority. The District has doubtless suffered great wrongs, and has been subjected to an enormous expenditure of money, through the recklessness and folly, and perhaps dishonesty, of those who heretofore have managed its affairs. But this misconduct and these errors of a former administration ought not to be placed at the door of the present officials, who were in no wise instrumental in their origin. The condition of the District, in its management, government, and administration, is peculiar and anomalous. None of us expect that the present method of administering the government of the District is to be permanent. It is temporary and provisional until something better can be devised and adopted. A few years ago Congress established a form of government for the District. It had a governor, a legislative assembly with two branches, a Delegate in Congress, and, above all, what few cities or even States can boast of, a board of public works. This government, while sadly deficient in ballast, had an enormous spread of canvas. Through the wild recklessness of officers and crew it plunged into the breakers and came near becoming a total wreck. Congress, without stopping to take in sails, summarily used the ax and cut away the masts, and governor and board of public works went by the board. This was in June, 1874. Congress did not at that time make general repairs and re-organize the voyage, but rigged up jury-masts, in the shape of District commissioners and a board of audit, hoping to get the craft into smooth water and a safe harbor where there could be a thorough overhauling and a complete reconstruction. As yet nothing has been done except to stop a few leaks in the hull. If there is any blame or censure on account of this delay it attaches to Congress and not to the commissioners. While there are many defects in the present system, Congress has failed thus far to improve the system. Perhaps it may fairly be said that this neglect and delay in establishing a more perfect government is in a measure owing to the confidence which Congress and the residents of the District have in the high character and integrity and the wise judgment of those who now administer the affairs of the District.

District of Columbia Affairs.

SPEECH OF HON. G. W. HENDEE,

OF VERMONT,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

July 1, 1876,

On affairs in the District of Columbia.

Mr. HENDEE. Mr. Speaker, I approach the discussion of District of Columbia matters and the various questions growing out of the investigation which has recently been concluded by the Committee for the District with a full knowledge of their importance and a deep sense of the responsibility I must take in giving expression to my views. During this session of Congress there seems to have been a remarkable thirst on the part of members to dive deep and to the bottom of the official conduct of every department of the Government. Every official act of every public man who has been connected with the Government for the last fifteen years must be examined, and if possible fraud and corruption found and held up to the gaze of the country. This seems to have been the established rule of the majority of this House since its organization, and I admit that the rule has been vigorously, unrelentingly, and sometimes rashly executed. There has been no safety here or elsewhere for prominent public men, for however pure and deserving they may have been the wicked and invisible hand of scandal has seized its pen for their destruction and in some instances has done its work successfully.

Sir, we have come to that era in the life of this country when the partisan mind is better satisfied with scandal than truth; when exultation and satisfaction rather than sadness and regret follow the downfall of the prominent public man. We sit here to-day and see perhaps our nearest neighbor standing forth an upright, valuable, and honest man. He enjoys our confidence and that of the country. We believe him to be a model in example and statesmanship; and to-morrow, yes, even to-morrow, we may be pained with the announcement that he has been guilty of crime, has betrayed his trust for gain, and is unworthy to further hold his seat or our confidence. The mere announcement is sufficient, and the partisan mind grasps its new food with rare relish; and he who yesterday was and is the peer of the best of us is brought low or put under a cloud, where he must remain for long months and perhaps for life. He may be innocent; yes, he is innocent and the proof of this fact is most plenary and satisfactory to the fair and unprejudiced mind; and yet his traducers never let go, and he is followed by them till his happiness, his usefulness, and his good name are wrested from him. He gradually loses his friends, his influence, his social position, and finally reaches the low level of obscurity, where he must remain.

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that never before in the history of this Government has there been such a general distrust in the public mind of all public men; never before has it ever taken less to arouse the suspicion of the people and lead them to believe as true the most idle and unfounded rumor; never before was everybody on trial. And so general has become the desire to investigate, and not only to investigate but to find out something that shall create a sensation, I fear that undue and questionable measures are sometimes taken by parties who have these inquiries in charge. In times of great political excitement and bitter party effort for power, when one party has nothing to lose and everything to gain, and the other nothing to gain but everything to lose, I fear, yes, I maintain, that the accused official has but little guarantee for a fair trial and can have but little hope that justice will be done him.

How, let me ask, do we try men here? Our committees are made up of seven democrats and four republicans. The men on trial are generally republican officials. The triers are party adherents. They are sent here as such and they are inclined to act as such. As a general rule in the trial of criminals before our courts the accused has the sympathy and protection of the court or jury till his guilt is established by legal evidence, but in the trial of political offenders here the committee does not try as a judge or jury, but from the outset assumes the attitude of a prosecutor, and it is not to be wondered at that the proceedings are irregular—inadmissible testimony received and wrong conclusions reached. In trials before courts the judge is free from outside influence and pressure, while here there is no limit to such pressure and influence. I must say, Mr. Speaker, that in times like these I have not the highest regard for or the greatest confidence in the conclusions of committees which are designed to affect directly the result of a great and fierce political struggle for the control of the Government.

And when, Mr. Speaker, I gave myself to the candid and patient contemplation of the speech of the chairman I became more fully convinced than before that men who are brought under the ordeal of a political investigation cannot expect, except in the most clear case of innocence, to receive that fair, unprejudiced treatment to which they are entitled or which would be awarded them were they tried by impartial men and in accordance with the strict rules of law and evidence. The speech of the honorable gentleman from Missouri exhibits that bitterness, that personal feeling, and that hatred toward political opponents which seem at this time to so fill the breasts of many gentlemen on this floor. With such a feeling, and with such means as are used in the conduct of these investigations, who, I ask, can expect to stand? Men will do as political enemies what they would scorn to do as personal enemies; and I may be pardoned in this connection in referring to the investigation which brings before the House these reports and this discussion.

The committee has been daily at work for more than four months. Its members have been diligent and some of them active and zealous, and, in order that nothing should be left unknown, unread, unsearched that should bring to light fraud and corruption if it existed, the committee called about it and to its aid ex-officials, decapitated clerks and engineers, disappointed claim agents, defeated creditors, and such malcontents as volunteered their services, and the number of this class was not small. The books, papers, and records of the commissioners and board of audit were at once ordered and put into the hands of these men who have had full control over them during the whole period of investigation. Scores of witnesses have been summoned and examined and many have volunteered their testimony. Bankers and business men have been brought from New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and other parts of the country, and I might say that no channel has been left untraversed for proof that these men could reach or could cause to be reached. The expense to the Government has not been inconsiderable, and what is the result? It is this, that a majority of the committee join in exonerating the commissioners of the District and the members of the board of audit. So far as they are concerned no crime has been unearthed, no fraud practiced, and no corruption proved. So far as this investigation goes they are vindicated as upright men, honest officials, and fully worthy of the positions they have occupied. The only charge that can at all be brought against them is that they have misconstrued the law under which they have acted; that they have exceeded their powers; but it is admitted by all, with perhaps one or two exceptions, that they have proceeded in good faith, without corrupt motives and with the very best intentions.

The commissioners came into power July 8, 1874, and just at the close of a long, tedious, and searching investigation of the affairs of the District under the administration of Governor Shepherd. It had been advertised all through this broad land that fraud, misrule, and gross wrong had been the guiding stars of that administration since its inauguration. Of all this, whether true or false, these commissioners had full notice. They came into power with full knowledge of all that was alleged or proven. They knew the eye of the country was upon them, and they knew that, whatever had been the character of the reign of the former executive power in this District, they would be watched with anxiety and with a hope for sound, economical, and honest government by the whole people. That there should be no mistake and that they might be relieved from all suspicion and all doubtful influence, they at once discharged the officers of the old government and called about them almost entirely a new set of employés. As their powers had been delegated by a recent law of Congress and the duties imposed by that law were numerous, varied, and important, and involved the expenditure of large sums of money, they called to their aid as advisers two sound and trustworthy attorneys, and upon their advice they have universally acted. They have expended and disbursed millions of money, and the report of the majority of the committee, which I maintain is justified in every material particular by the testimony, shows that they have expended it faithfully, economically, and for the best interests of the District and Government.

It is not even pretended, sir, by the gentleman from Missouri in his report or speech that the commissioners or the auditors, or either of them, have ever directly or indirectly received a farthing wrongfully; that they have ever had any interest whatever, however remote or insignificant it might be, in any contract, claim, or transaction connected with District affairs. The report of Judge BUCKNER does not even charge corruption, intentional wrong-doing, or even bad faith; and because this is true I am all the more surprised at the indictment he has prepared and submitted to this House in the form of a speech. I am at a loss to know, sir, what imagination could have preyed upon his mind that could have brought forth such an unwarranted, malignant, and groundless arraignment of these gentlemen. His report does not justify it and the proof does not sustain it. He talks often of Shepherd and Babcock, and attempts to connect these commissioners with them in the conduct of the business of the District, when in fact there has never been before the committee one word of testimony sustaining such a theory in the slightest particular. They have not been witnesses, and have not been shown to have any connection with any contract, claim, or proceeding relating to District matters since the new government was organized.

The gentleman says the contractors have been the old favorites of Shepherd and have bought real estate of him, &c. Now, this is the lowest kind of pettifogging. The commissioners had not the power to select their contractors. The law transferred to them certain duties that had devolved upon the Shepherd government and compelled them to carry out legal existing contracts, and they could treat with none other than those who held contracts with the District on the 20th of June, 1874, the date of the act which brought them into existence. By the law they were compelled to recognize the contracts and contractors that Governor Shepherd should pass over to them when they should take charge of the government. They had and could have no voice in the selection. But, Mr. Speaker, I ought not and will not waste the time of the House in commenting upon those parts of the gentleman's speech, which seem to have been born in the crazed imagination of some wandering District malcontent.

Now Judge BUCKNER will admit that if his theory of the law of June 20, 1874, and the power of the commissioners under it is incorrect, his report and all its conclusions must fall to the ground; and this point I propose for a few moments to consider. There is no provision in the act of June 20, 1874, limiting in amount or kind the work to be done by the District commissioners. If such a provision had been inserted, the responsibility of the commissioners would have been definite and its enforcement would have been simple. Nor is there any mention in that act of the particular contracts of the late board of public works which remained to be completed, nor of the number of such contracts. None of the alleged existing contracts of that date were declared by the act to be fraudulent and void. Congress did not undertake to decide how many valid contracts were in existence or how much it would cost to complete them or whether any were fraudulent, nor is there any indication in the act of an intention of Congress to limit to a certain amount the debt to be incurred under the District commissioners and the board of audit. The sixth and seventh sections of the act make it clear, on the contrary, that the aggregate of the debt was regarded as uncertain.

Of the seven classes of claims confided to the board of audit, four involved amounts wholly uncertain. I refer to the fourth, claims existing or hereafter created arising out of contracts of the board of public works; fifth, claims arising out of contracts of the District; sixth, claims for private property taken by the board of public works. As I have said, Congress could not and did not fix the limit of the debt.

Now, sir, while, as I have said, the act makes no express limitation of the amount to be expended, and there is no implied or absolute limitation, either by designation of the particular contracts to be completed or by restriction of the District debt to a fixed amount, it does most explicitly make it the duty of the commissioners to complete all valid contracts of the board of public works, to make all contracts necessary to the administration of the District law, to execute existing obligations and contracts, and preserve all improvements begun or completed. The control and charge of the work of improvements was given to the engineer, under the general supervision and direction of the commissioners. It was clearly the intention of the act of June 20, 1874, to authorize the commissioners to do all the work and labor which in their discretion they might regard as falling under the powers above enumerated.

I will now call the attention of the House to the law further.

The act of June 20, 1874, must be construed like all other laws, in its entirety, to ascertain the intent of Congress, the powers conferred upon the commissioners, the manner in which these powers were to be executed, and the means provided to enable the commissioners to execute them. The second section defines the powers with the limitations; that is to say, the commissioners shall have power to make all contracts necessary to the faithful administration of the valid laws enacted for the government of the District and the execution of existing legal obligations and contracts and the protection or preservation of improvements, finished or unfinished. From the nature of these powers it is evident that the intent of Congress was to recognize as valid and binding the contracts of the board of public works which were in existence at the date of the act. But as the law makes no provision as to the particular manner in which the contracts are to be executed, it is clear that Congress intended to leave that to the sound discretion of the commissioners, subject only to the general conditions inferable from the circumstances under which the act was passed; that the cost in bonds of the execution of such contracts should not in any considerable measure exceed the cost of executing them pursuant to their express terms and conditions.

Now, as to the means given to the commissioners to execute these contracts the law makes no provision, except the certificates of the board of audit convertible into 3.65 bonds. Unless these bonds were subject to the control of the commissioners for the execution of the work, it would result that a duty important to the best interests of the District, to wit, the execution of the legal contracts of the board of public works would devolve upon the commissioners, without any means whatever placed in their hands whereby they could discharge such duty. Such a construction of the law would be in violation of every recognized rule of legal interpretation and must be rejected. In fact, the chairman of the committee feels strongly the pressure of this argument, for he is forced by it into two distinct and inconsistent theories of the meaning of the law.

His first theory is that the board of audit could recognize no claim against either the District proper or the board of public works which had not originated prior to the date of the law and which was not perfected as a claim at that date; that the commissioners and board of audit were created by Congress in the nature of assignees of a bankrupt estate, and that their duty was to fund in 3.65 bonds the debts matured and perfected as claims on the 20th of June, 1874, and none other, and to wind up all the outstanding business of the District proper and of the board of public works absolutely to that date. This theory negatives the idea that the commissioners had any right whatever to incur a dollar's indebtedness after that date, either for the completion of existing contracts or for any other cause. The payments made by them were to be made for debts originating subsequent to June 20, 1874, and were to be made in cash.

His second theory is so inconsistent with the first that it is scarcely credible that the two proceed from the same mind. It admits that the law provided for the completion of the unfinished contracts of the board of public works; also that the board of audit was authorized to issue certificates for work done and to be done, and to deliver them according to the contract in each case; also, that if the work was done, was within the powers conferred, and done upon existing contracts made by the board of public works, the commissioners are not to be blamed for any increase of indebtedness, even though the debts should have been piled mountain high.

The first theory forms the basis of the denunciations contained in the speech of the honorable chairman. This is a theory of repudiation, which rejects every incomplete contract of the District proper and of the late board of public works, arrests them absolutely at the date of June 20, 1874, requires the measurements of every contract to be made up to that date, and leaves the contractor no other remedy than to sue for damages. This theory directly contravenes the recommendations of the joint investigating committee, that every debt, both of the District proper and of the board of public works, should be adjusted. Such a theory imputes to Congress the purpose to annul by law existing contracts without making any provision for the payment of damages to the person injured, and, in fact, making it impossible for the parties charged with the District administration to pay the damages which might be recovered. I cannot accept such a theory. It is inconsistent with the debates in Congress and with the respect of that body for established law. If acted upon it would have ruined not only the contractors concerned but the reputation of the District and of the United States Government for honorable and just dealing.

The second theory is just and sensible. It is the theory of the act of June 20, 1874. It is the one acted upon by the commissioners in which they have vindicated the integrity of the District and the honor of Congress. It is the theory which was indicated by the joint investigating committee in that report, and which faithfully carries out the recommendations of that report. Congress intended to provide not only for the payment in 3.65 bonds of the debt already contracted but of the debt afterward to be made in completing the unfinished improvements and fully performing legal existing contracts. The act of June 20, 1874, shows that it carefully provided for the payment of the current expenditures of the government out of the revenues from taxes, and that it devoted all the proceeds of the taxes for the fiscal year 1875 to certain items of expenditure which did not include any of the payments on these incomplete contracts. That is, it devoted to specific purposes, not including these contracts, every dollar to be raised from the taxes levied. The 3.65 bonds are the special fund out of which the extension contracts should be paid.

On this point the gentleman has in fact surrendered his strongest point. He admits in terms the power and duty of the commissioners to complete unfinished contracts. He says that he does not blame them for any increase of the indebtedness properly arising from the completion of unfinished contracts, but for the approval given by them to the issue of 3.65 bonds in payment. He claims that they should have paid either out of the tax revenues or out of the appropriations; at any rate, in cash. But in the act of June 20 all the revenues from back taxes were appropriated to other purposes than unfinished contracts; the same act designates what use shall be made of the taxes for the fiscal year 1875, and the act of March 3, 1875, limits the uses of the taxes for the fiscal year 1876. No permission is anywhere given to use a dollar of the proceeds of taxes for completing unfinished contracts. Nor is there any appropriation by Congress for the purpose. The one of over a million, though couched in general terms, is based upon an itemized statement furnished by the commissioners, under date of February 18, 1875, which contains no item for unfinished contracts. No part of this money could be taken for the purpose. It is true, then, that there was not one dollar of money placed by Congress in the hands of the commissioners to be expended on this class of contracts. The usage of the District and of municipal administration forbade the general fund to be used for that purpose.

The gentleman then is reduced to this dilemma: he asserts the power and the duty of the commissioners to complete the unfinished contracts, holds them to exercise the power and perform the duty, but denies them the right to pay in the only fund provided by Congress. He places Congress in the absurd position of ordering the commissioners to complete the contracts while it provides no mode of payment. It is clear from the refusal of Congress to permit any use of cash for this purpose, and from the absence of any limitation of the use of 3.65 bonds, that the latter were intended to be used in the payment of the uncertain amount still to be expended to complete the unfinished improvements.

It is unfortunate for the argument of the gentleman that a distinguished Senator of his own party, as well as Messrs. BASS, WILSON, and HUBBELL, of the joint investigating committee, interpreted this law precisely as did the commissioners, their counsel, the board of audit, and the sinking-fund commissioners. This fact was elicited by a direct interrogatory propounded to the commissioners by the gentleman himself. Their plain answer on this point is treated by him in his speech with a redundance of reprobation, as "a vain and artful attempt" and "a weak and groundless effort;" but it will be noticed that the gentleman did not dare to attempt to disprove it. The Senator was in the other wing of the Capitol; why was he not called? Is it possible that his attention was not called to the concurring statement on this point of the members of the board of audit and the commissioners.

With due respect to the gentleman from Missouri, I think his views of the law are not more entitled to respect than those of the excellent lawyers under whose advice the commissioners acted.

I will here add the words of the commissioners, as expressed in their answer:

Soon after the commissioners and the board of audit assumed their duties, the question arose as to the power of the board of audit to examine and allow claims which might thereafter arise by the future performance of contracts made by the board of public works and not theretofore fully performed. This question was one for the decision of those officers.

The cognate question also arose as to whether it was the duty of the commissioners and of the engineer in their respective functions to stop work in progress under contracts of the late board of public works which had not been fully performed and to prevent the resumption of such work, or whether it was their duty to proceed with work under such contracts. Practically this involved the question as to whether streets and sewers should be left in their then unfinished and dangerous condition over large areas of the city, liable to waste and destruction, putting life and property in jeopardy, and involving the District in danger of vast liability at the suit of parties likely to sustain injuries. Before the commissioners had decided this question as to their powers and duties, and before the board of audit had decided the similar question respecting their own jurisdiction, the commissioners, in addition to their own counsel, sought the benefit of the views of a distinguished lawyer, who was then, and still continues to be, a leading member of one branch of the national Legislature, and who had been a member of the joint committee of 1874 which had framed the act of June 20, 1874. The members of the board of audit were present at the consultation, and so also was the counsel for the commissioners. It resulted from this conference that the board of audit came to the conclusion that they possessed authority to examine and allow claims arising out of future performance of the class of contracts above mentioned; and conformably to this decision, and as a logical sequence therefrom, as well as from other provisions of the law, the commissioners of the District came to the conclusion that they possessed the power to permit the continued performance of such contracts, subject to examination of claims thereunder by the board of audit, and to the payment of the contractors, not in money, (as provided by the literal terms of the contract and as expected by the contractors,) but in certificates of the board of audit, (to be issued by that board after due audit of the accounts,) convertible into 3.65 bonds.

This decision of the board of audit necessarily recognized not only the power of the commissioners, but as well their duty to execute the several classes of contracts specified in the second section of the act of June 20, 1874. How they should be executed, whether in literal compliance with their expressed terms and conditions, or with modifications, (called "extensions,") depended, within the limitations of the law, upon the consideration how the public interest would be the better promoted, which was of necessity, in large measure, if not wholly, an engineering problem, to be solved by the engineer of the District, on whom the technical duty devolved by law, of executing the work under the contracts of the board of public works. In practice this was done. The engineer determined the manner of doing the work and where to be done, which determination he communicated to the commissioners in the form of a recommendation, which they approved. Thereafter the engineer supervised and directed the execution of the work.

The decisions with reference to their respective functions thus made by the board of audit and the commissioners are believed to be not only warranted but demanded by the provisions of the act of June 20, 1874.

* * * * * * *

The action of Congress which impliedly ratified the allowance by the board of audit of claims which arose under unfinished contracts of the board of public works by performance of them after the passage of the act of June 20, 1874, also approved the course of the commissioners in proceeding with the performance of such contracts. With reference to such contracts the commissioners of the District were by section 2 of the act of June 20, 1874, vested with the former power and authority of the board of public works, except so far as limited by the said act of June 20, 1874. Thus within the limitations prescribed by that enactment the commissioners succeeded the board of public works as a party to the unfinished contracts entered into by the latter board. Except so far as restricted by law in their power to make contracts and incur obligations the commissioners might as a contracting party and with the concurrence of the other party modify an unfinished contract with the board of public works. The limitation of law upon the power of the commissioners as to contracts and obligations is (see section 2 of the act of June 20) against the making of contracts or the increasing of obligations, "other than such contracts and obligations as may be necessary to the faithful administration of the valid laws enacted for the government of said District; to the execution of existing legal obligations and contracts, and to the protection or preservation of improvements existing or commenced and not completed at the time of the passage of this act."

Of unperformed and outstanding contracts made by the board of public works, (and to which the commissioners became by law a substituted party,) modifications necessary to faithful administration of the valid laws enacted for the government of said District, to the execution of existing legal obligations and contracts, and to the protection or preservation of improvements existing or commenced and not completed at the time of the passage of the act of June 20, 1874, might lawfully be made by the commissioners.

In the event of a modification within these limitations, a claim arising under the contract as modified was recognized by the board of audit as coming within their jurisdiction. It was a claim created necessarily and created after the passage of the act of June 20, 1874, and arising out of a contract of the board of public works, and therefore it belonged to the fourth class of claims mentioned in section 6 of the act of June 20, 1874, which class is as follows: "Claims existing or hereafter created for which no evidence of indebtedness has been issued arising out of contracts, written or oral, made by the board of public works." Unless audited by the board of audit, such a claim would, upon a different construction of the act, have required to be separated into two branches: one branch pertaining to the strict and original letter of the contract and coming within the jurisdiction of the board of audit, and the other branch coming within the jurisdiction of the ordinary and municipal accounting officers of the District; and different modes of payment, by bonds in the one instance and cash in the other, would have been compelled, in respect of these two branches. To have carried out such a construction of the law would have been utterly impracticable in many if not all cases, and even where practicable would have led to confusion. Besides, the spirit as well as the letter of the act of June 20, 1874 requires that claims arising out of contracts with the board of public works should be submitted to the examination not of the subordinates of the commissioners of the District, filling the position of accounting officers of the District, but of a board of audit, composed of the Comptrollers of the United States Treasury and the highest accounting officers of the United States Government—presumably selected to compose the board of audit on account of their personal qualifications as well as their official positions, and on account of their independence as respects the executive authority of the District; and these officers were invested with authority to employ experts and assistants for such compensation as they might deem proper.

In the making of modifications or extensions of contracts of the board of public works it is but reasonable to presume that the law committed to the executive authorities a reasonable and fair discretion in relation thereto. And in the management of the "work of repair and improvement of all streets, avenues, alleys, sewers, roads, and bridges" the commissioners were by law invested only with authority of "general supervision and direction," while the engineer had that direct charge and control of the work for which, both in determining what work should be done and in carrying it on, the exercise of professional qualifications is required.

And in this connection the undersigned say, in answer to each and every interrogatory relating to improvements and work made or done under their administration, payable in 3.65 bonds, whether made or done pursuant to the exact terms and conditions contained in contracts of the board of public works, or under such extensions or modifications as were recommended by the engineer, and which they approved, that they exercised the powers only which they understood were conferred upon them by the act of June 20, 1874, and that they never made nor modified any contract which was not regarded by them as falling within one of the three classes of contracts they were authorized to make, namely, in administration of the valid laws enacted for the government of said District in execution of existing legal obligations and contracts or necessary to the protection or preservation of improvements existing, or commenced and not completed, at the time of the passage of said act; and they disclaim ever having exercised any power or performed any act relating to or in any way connected with the execution of contracts specified in the second section of said act or otherwise, or relating to any matter or thing since their entrance upon their offices as commissioners of the District, which they did not consider it was their legal duty to exercise or to do and as to which they say they always consulted one or both of the attorneys of the District whenever, upon the question presented for their decision, doubt occurred to them as to how such questions should be legally decided, and, in every case of the submission of such questions to the said attorneys or either of them, they decided as advised by their said counsel.

I will now attempt somewhat to follow the chairman of the committee in his speech and to answer the same, and I desire to say that my statements will not be based upon rumor, but upon the facts as they appear in the testimony. The gentleman from Missouri has taken two cases of contracts, Nos. 582 and 916, upon which he has dwelt at length in attempting to show that the commissioners of the District have committed a great wrong or exceeded their authority. Now, I wish to state the fact in regard to these two contracts:

Contract No. 582, dated October 23, 1872, with James W. Walsh, provides for grading Eleventh street east between Pennsylvania avenue and H street north, was recognized by the commissioners November 25, 1874, under the advice of the assistant attorney, as an existing legal obligation, and extension drawn December 7, 1874, recognizing Walsh's assignment of the contract to William Hussey, who had been found at work upon the street on July 7, 1874.

For work done upon the original contract under the commissioners the cost has been $27,398.10.

Under this contract less work was permitted than had been contemplated by the board of public works, the grades being changed so as to diminish the amount of excavation over a large area east of the Capitol. In conformity with the opinion of the attorney for the District that contractors under such circumstances were entitled to an equivalent amount of additional work, the extension of April 8, 1875, was drawn. Under this extension the cost (considerably less than an equivalent for the work withdrawn) has been $5,738.66. In the grading of the street the curb, foot-walks, and covering of the carriage-way were removed and the street left without pavements of any kind. The extensions of July 9, July 28, and October 25, 1875, were for the purpose of replacing this material and completing the improvement of the street. The cost under these extensions (much less than would have been the cost of completing the improvement upon the entire line of the contract) has been $45,823.50. As extra work the contractor was directed to lay the foot-pavements upon New Jersey avenue, between M and O streets northwest, the grading, curbing, and wood pavement on the carriage-way having been completed under the board of public works. It would have been liable to injury in the unfinished state of the improvement. Cost, $4,032.76.

The extension of September 3, 1875, provides for the improvement of Fourth street between M and O streets northwest, and N street between Fifth street and New Jersey avenue northwest. The work was important and necessary to complete the connection with surrounding improvements, from which these localities were cut off by the change of grade, the streets and avenues being cut down around them; cost, $29,008.81.

The total expenditure upon this contract and all of its extensions under the commissioners has been $112,901.66. The cost of completing the original contract, with the additional amount of grading contemplated under it and the completing of the improvement of the street within the limits of the contract, in accordance with the general plan of the board of public works, would have been $111,562.44; besides which an increased cost of $183,812 would have been incurred in the grading of parallel and intersecting streets, which were also under contract, in order to make them conform to the deeper cut which had been contemplated.

Contract No. 916, dated September 26, 1873, with John O. Evans, provides for laying Scharf concrete on the carriage-way of B street north, between First and Second streets east; was reported incomplete in the annual report of November 20, 1874. The work at that time authorized was completed, but the contract was not terminated. No final settlement had been made with the contractor.

The subsequent extensions of the commissioners increased the amount of work.

This contractor, and after him his assignee, in whose name the various extensions are drawn, controlled the Scharf patent concrete pavement, one of the two concrete pavements selected for use in the District to the exclusion of all others which had been tried by the board of public works, after a long and careful investigation of their relative merits. The extension of May 10, July 5, August 5, August 6, and October 22, 1875, provide for the paving of the carriage-way with Scharf patent concrete of Fifteenth street, between Rhode Island avenue and S street northwest, and other streets, upon all of which the improvements had been previously completed in other respects under other contracts.

It may be stated, generally, that the completion of the improvement of these streets, in other respects, necessitated the paving of the carriage-way for the protection and preservation of the improvements made, and that considerations of sound economy dictated the use of a pavement suited to the locality, rather than a temporary make-shift, of which the cost must be wasted.

On Fifteenth street, west, contract No. 806, of the late board of public works, with J. E. Gregg, dated August 5, 1873, provided for a wood pavement, as also upon other streets, but the contractor was not allowed to proceed with the work, concrete being substituted. This contract (No. 806) provided for an expenditure of $118,096.03 for wood pavements, no part of which has been permitted. On Fifteenth street the cost of the concrete pavement has been $26,977.28, and upon all the other streets covered by the extensions of the commissioners, $86,682.88. So that a total expenditure is here represented of $113,660.16, as against a saving, by the suppression of wood pavement, of $118,096.03.

So it will be seen that the course adopted by the commissioners in regard to these two contracts has absolutely saved many thousand dollars to the District, and that the work as done under them by the commissioners will prove far more beneficial than would the work if done in exact conformity to the terms of the contract; and in this connection I will say there were many contracts in existence when the commissioners took charge of the government which provided for the laying of wood pavements. Hundreds of thousands of dollars must be expended in this work if the contracts were carried out to the letter. The contracts were binding and the contractors were demanding the right to proceed under them. It was necessary to pave the streets with something. That wood was expensive, unsuitable, and of short life, everybody agreed. It was in fact a mere waste of money to use wood. Experience in this city had fully established this fact, and the commissioners so modified contracts that the best approved concrete pavements should be substituted for wood. Now the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER] says this should not have been done, as there was no authority in the law for such a change. I take it that all will agree that in this matter the commissioners acted discreetly and for the best interests of the District. The cost of carrying out these contracts as modified was less than it would have been had they been executed as originally drawn or as they existed when the commissioners came into power. The result is that we have good concrete pavements where we should have had decaying wood, and this with a saving of expense to the Government. And now, I ask, are the commissioners to have no credit for this? If they had adhered to the letter of the contract and laid wood where they could at less or the same cost even provided concrete, they would have not only been condemned by the gentleman from Missouri but by every gentleman in the House.

It is true that in modifying some of the contracts, which the commissioners recognized as existing legal obligations, the amount and cost of the work was increased, but in others the amount and cost was diminished; and the proof shows that on the whole the cost to the Government will be less, as the contracts were executed under modifications and extensions, than it would be if the contracts had been performed in accordance with their original terms and the general plan for improvements and within the limits covered by them. I will submit a table of cost and estimates that is official and fully establishes my statement. The table, with explanations, may be found in the testimony taken by the committee, pages 142 to 143; but to save trouble to members I will have it printed at this point in my remarks.

Recapitulation of tables 1, 2, 3, 4, and 6.

WORK COMPLETED AND AUDITED.

Number of table.	Done under the board of public works.	Done under the commissioners.				Aggregate.
		Under contracts and extensions of the board of public works, including oral contracts and repairs under ninth section of contracts.	Under extensions of the commissioners.		Total.
			Work upon the main sewers for their protection and preservation, and that of adjacent improvements.	Additional work of improvement considered necessary and important, including sewerage.
1	$3,624,000 32	$2,560,853 10	$280,660 11	$1,515,663,19	$4,357,176 40	$7,981,176 72
2	74,941 98	316,124 24	18,670 84	219,339 90	554,134 98	629,076 96
3	1,430,923 74	.....	.....	.....	.....	1,430,923 74
4	2,548,291 90	809,244 23	.....	.....	809,244 23	3,357,536 13
6	.....	()	()	(*)	‡104,262 15	104,262 15
	7,678,157 94	3,686,221 57	299,330 95	1,735,003 09	5,824,817 76	13,502,975 70

Recapitulation of tables 1, 2, 3, 4, and 6.—Continued.

WORK COMPLETED, NOT AUDITED.

(Estimated in 3.65 bonds at par, as heretofore payable.)

Number of table.	Done under the board of public works.	Done under the commissioners.				Aggregate.	Grand aggregate, (audited and not audited.)
		Under contracts and extensions of the board of public works, including oral contracts and repairs under ninth section of contracts.	Under extensions of the commissioners.		Total.
			Work upon the main sewers for their protection and preservation and that of adjacent improvements.	Additional work of improvement considered necessary and important, including sewerage.
1	$594 77	$47,937 13	$17,475 11	$66,406 36	$131,818 60	$132,413 37	$8,113,590 09
2	.....	5,131 02	.....	5,026 37	10,157 39	10,157 39	639,234 35
3	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	.....	1,430,923 74
4	.....	†615 86	.....	.....	615 86	615 86	3,358,151 99
5	.....	()	()	()	()	(*)	104,262 15
	594 77	53,684 01	17,475 11	71,432 73	142,591 85	§143,186 62	13,646,162 32

SUMMARY.

Number of table.	Cost under the board of public works.	Estimated cost of completion, dating from June 30, 1874, of contracts and extensions of board of public works, which were incomplete at that time, and which have been recognized as being then existing legal obligations, in accordance with the general plans of the board of public works, together with the work then required to complete the improvements in accordance with these plans upon the streets and within the limits covered by these contracts. Ten per cent. for contingencies.	Actual cost of the work from June 30, 1874, to date, under the commissioners, including the additional work which has been required upon the main sewers, and the cost of repairing old board work, under section 9 of the board contracts.
1	$3,624,595 09	$4,648,407 41	$4,488,995 00
2	74,941 98	460,121 49	564,292 37
3	1,430,923 74	.....	.....
4	2,548,291 90	.....	809,860 09
6	.....	.....	104,262 15
	7,678,752 71	5,108,528 90	5,967,409 61
Deduct cost of repairs under ninth section of contract		809,860 09
Deduct cost of work upon main sewers, necessary for their protection and preservation, and that of adjacent improvements		316,806 06
Deduct material on hand as asset		104,262 15
Total deduction		1,230,928 30	1,230,928 30
Expended upon the work of improvements			4,736,481 31
Estimated cost, &c			5,108,528 90
Difference in favor of commissioners' work			372,047 59

* Included in above.

† Miscellaneous work. Cash cost, with 20 per cent. profit expressed in 3.65 bonds at seventy cents, as per terms of contract for these items,

‡ This is the value of material on hand, added to make up the total of expenditures and liabilities. All of this, however, will be issued for the continuance of the work, and the whole amount is hereinafter deducted as an asset.

§ This is subject to deduction on account of inferior material or workmanship, upon final examination of the work.

NOTE 1. Contracts and extensions of board of public works recognized as being existing legal obligations on June 20, 1874, and extensions of the same by the commissioners where the original contracts are those which have appeared in the printed reports of the late board of public works.

NOTE 2. Contracts and extensions of board of public works recognized as being existing legal obligations on June 20, 1874, and extensions of the same by the commissioners where the original contracts are those which have not appeared in the printed reports of the board of public works.

NOTE 3. Contracts and extensions of board of public works, on which measurements have been made under the direction of the engineer of the District of Columbia, and at the request of the board of audit, the work having been completed under the board of public works.

NOTE 4. Expenditures for repairs of contract work under section 9 of the original contracts where the cost is to be collected by suit from the contractor or his sureties.

NOTE 6. Statement of material on hand July 8, 1874, received and issued since that time, and now remaining on hand.

REMARKS.

The comparison which is made between the footings of the last two columns of the "Summary" will be better understood with the following explanation: In the work done by the commissioners up to this date, the original plans of the board of public works have, in some instances, been modified so as to substitute a better class of work, thereby increasing the cost; as in the case of the sea-walls of the James Creek Canal, the pavement of the carriage-way of Maryland avenue southwest, and the foot-walks of the same avenue northeast, while the parking has generally been dispensed with and the grading materially reduced. No account is taken of the incidental saving to public and private property in the future improvement of intersecting and adjacent streets in consequence of the reduced amount of grading, although this is considerable. On the other hand, in the computation of the estimates for the perfection of the board work (column next the last) the general plans of the board of public works have in some cases been taken as a guide where the contract seemed inconsistent with them; as in the case of Maryland avenue northeast, where gravel foot-walks were provided because the board of public works were unable to purchase bricks for their paper; and upon the same avenue southwest, where a blue-rock pavement was provided for the carriage-way, although this class of pavement has been condemned and replaced by other pavements on less important streets, and that of Belgian blocks for the avenue was in harmony with the general plan of improvement. In such cases, of which there are very few, the increased expenditure under the commissioners is offset in the column of estimates being included in it. But where the modification was not in accordance with the plans of the board of public works, as in the case of the change in the character of the sea-walls of the James Creek Canal, the increased cost is not included in that estimate. To these estimates, as made at board rates for each class of work, according to its measurement, is added here the usual percentage for engineering work of this description.

Work remaining incomplete under contracts canceled in pursuance of the joint resolution of Congress approved March 14, 1876, and the circular-letters of the commissioners of September 30, 1875, and February 5, 1876, is as follows:

First. Work under contracts not otherwise forfeitable than in pursuance of the joint resolution of Congress approved March 14, 1876, and the previous circular-letters of the commissioners of September 30, 1875, and February 5, 1876, (with 10 per cent. for contingencies,) = $242,949.29.

Second. Work under contracts of doubtful obligation in other respects, the commissioners having terminated the work under the terms of the contracts, under the advice of counsel, (with 10 per cent. for contingencies,) = $210,244.52.

See explanation of tables in text of engineer's report accompanying this.

The report of the majority of the committee, submitted by myself, shows a large reduction in the bonded debt since the District commissioners have been in power to the amount of a million and a half and more, the greater proportion of which has been paid from the revenues of the District and not out of congressional appropriations. It also shows that the number of employés has been reduced from three hundred and seventy-one to one hundred and thirty-three, and that the reduction in expenditure on account of salaries has been over $288,000 annually. The report also shows, and such is the proof, that the financial affairs of the District generally have been managed with great care and to the manifest interest of the District and the Government, for all which neither the minority report submitted by Judge BUCKNER nor his speech utters a single word of commendation.

I desire now to call the attention of the House to the facts as developed by the testimony and upon which the report submitted by myself is based, and shall show in the same connection that there is no foundation either in fact or theory for such a report as has been submitted by Judge BUCKNER, and hence no foundation whatever or cause even for the delivery of such a speech as his upon this subject. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER] attempts to show, not only by his report and speech but by the conclusions of the joint committee of 1874, that the 3.65 bonded indebtedness of this District should not at this time exceed the sum of about $10,000,000, and he maintains, consequently, that the commissioners have contracted a debt without authority of law and wrongfully to the amount of four million dollars and over for which 3.65 bonds have been issued. He takes as the basis of his calculation the sum of $10,006,514.66, which, as he says, is made up of the following items:

Statement of certificates issued and unadjusted claims.

Class No.		Actual issue and estimate, December 1, 1874.
		Certificates issued and unadjusted claims.	Total.
1	Sewer certificates	$898,942 29
	Sewer certificates outstanding and unadjusted	204,600 00
			$1,103,542 29
2	Auditor's certificates, board of public works	4,170,030 63
	Auditor's certificates, board of public works, outstanding and unadjusted.	314,113 89
			4,484,144 52
3	Auditor's and comptroller's certificates of District of Columbia		1,897 06
4	Contract work, certified	1,088,757 84
	Contract work, unadjusted and outstanding	1,458,358 99
			2,547,116 83

Statement of certificates issued, &c.—Continued.

Class No.		Actual issue and estimate, December 1, 1874.
		Certificates issued and unadjusted claims.	Total.
5	General claims against the District, certified	82,547 43
	General claims against the District, outstanding and unadjusted	297,797 09
			380,344 52
6	Old material, property, not issued	Estimate	463,094 85
7	Damages to real property, certified	84,689 57
	Damages to real property, outstanding and unadjusted	383,996 50
			468,686 07
8	Sewer taxes refunded, certified	531,862 36
	Sewer taxes, outstanding and unadjusted	25,826 16
			557,688 52
	Total		10,006,514 66

Now, the gentleman admits that the 3.65 debt should be the above amount, but in order to obtain this amount he is compelled to allow as correct the sum of $2,547,116.83 which was expended entirely for work on contracts, and extensions of the same, of the old board of public works. The joint select committee reported, June 16, 1874, that $1,325,000 would complete all these contracts, while December 7, the same year, the commissioners had expended and found due on these contracts the sum of $2,547,116.83. This, Mr. BUCKNER says, is right. Now, this is the point. He claims the wheels of government should have stopped with the making of the report of December 7, 1874. This was impossible. Congress did not provide as was expected a new government, and on the 4th of March adjourned leaving the commissioners still in power with no change of law regarding their duties. On December 7, 1874, the date of their report, they had recognized ninety-nine contracts of the late board of public works as existing legal obligations on the 20th of June, 1874. At the date of the report work was progressing on some or all of them. Could it be stopped? Certainly not. Congress was the only power that could interfere. It was in session and took no action. Not only this, during the same session Congress passed a joint resolution continuing the board of audit until otherwise provided by law, and on the 15th of February, 1875, and during the same session, the board of audit reported that there had been presented for work done on these contracts since the date of their last report, December 7, 1874, claims to the amount of $706,776.54. This report also said: "This class includes the continuation by the commissioners of work under old contracts" which had not been fully completed prior to the change of the District government, and it also stated that additions would be made to class 4 by the continuation of work under old contracts.

Thus it will be seen that as late as February 15, 1875, and twenty days before Congress adjourned, Congress had full and official notice that work was still progressing on these contracts, and that the indebtedness under class 4 was being continually and daily increased; but it took no action, and it must be assumed fairly that Congress approved or acquiesced in the management of the commissioners and board of audit regarding District affairs. It certainly took no steps to prevent the further prosecution of the work. I desire further to state in this connection that the engineer reported on the 7th of December, 1874, that the cost to complete contracts resumed at that date payable in 3.65 bonds would be $1,721,270.11. Now, taking Judge BUCKNER'S basis of $10,006,514.66 as the 3.65 debt December 7, 1874, he certainly must admit that that amount should be increased by the sum of $1,721,270.11, as those contracts were completed and that sum was expended, and he does not question the validity of these contracts or the right of the commissioners to complete them and to pay in 3.65 certificates or bonds.

My friend has heretofore claimed that the $1,721,270.11 reported as the cost to finish contracts was a part of or was included in the $10,006,514.66. To put this question forever at rest, I will submit at this point a communication from the board of audit:

To the commissioners of the District of Columbia:

The statement in the report of the board of audit of December 7, 1874, (Executive Document, part 6, Forty-third Congress, second session, page 265,) is confined exclusively to claims of class 4.

The aggregate of claims as there given is $2,896,537.78. This was the actual amount of the claims of this class which had been presented and filed at the date to which that report was made up and is given in the report as "claims presented." Of this amount the board of audit had at that date issued certificates to the amount of $1,088,757.84, and there had been withdrawn and disallowed $349,421.05; total acted upon, $1,438,178.89; leaving the balance unadjusted $1,458,358.89, of which sum $56,166.24 was for percentages retained on accounts for contract work which had been allowed and certified.

It further appears from the report that this balance unadjusted did not include a large number of measurements for work then done which had been made by the engineer and returned to the board of audit too late to be adjusted and included in the report.

If it is possible that there can be any question it may be stated distinctly that neither the $1,088,757.84 of certificates issued nor the $1,458,358.89 of unadjusted claims included the sum of $1,721,270.11, or any part thereof, which is found reported as the engineer's estimate at that time of the cost of completing resumed contracts; neither, of course, could it have included any claim which had not then actually accrued or for work thereafter to be done.

The recapitulation on page 268 goes no further.

The amount of certificates issued of all classes	$6,858,727 18
Claims outstanding and unadjusted	3,147,787 48
Total	10,006,504 66

The latter covers nothing except claims which had then been presented, filed, and registered, but it is accompanied by the statement that "by a continuance of work under contracts, No. 4 will be ultimately increased."

It should be remembered that, subsequent to this report, Congress extended the time for filing claims of all classes, and also provided for the presentation and audit of claims not within the original jurisdiction of the board of audit, and the amount of the claims was thereby largely increased, and this of course would make an estimate of the actual ultimate indebtedness made prior to such action almost valueless.

The report of the board of audit of December 7, 1874, states that claims had been audited for work done under the commissioners, and that such work was still in progress, and it very clearly appears that the estimate submitted of the "ascertained debt of the District" was not intended as more than an approximate statement, and that estimate, so far as it relates to class 4, does not include any indebtedness except for work actually done or claimed to have been done prior to the date to which the report was made up.

The commissioners did not advise the board of audit at any time, officially, as to the work they intended to do; and no report of the board of audit embraced in the figures given any estimate of work to be done by the commissioners. The figures used by the board of audit included only the work that had been done, with the statement that by a continuance of work class 4 would be increased,

R. W. TAYLER.
J. M. BRODHEAD.

JUNE 12, 1876.

Now, sir, taking Judge BUCKNER's figures as a basis, namely, $10,006,514.66, and adding $1,721,270.11 which was expended to complete the ninety-nine contracts in progress December 7, 1874, and we have $11,727,784.77. Now, it will be observed that at this time only ninety-nine contracts had been recognized by the commissioners as legal existing obligations upon which work had been resumed. Since that date there have been sixty-four additional contracts of the board of public works recognized, upon which large amounts of work have been done. Now, these sixty-four contracts were of the same character and of the same legal force as the ninety-nine contracts, and if it was proper under the law to recognize and resume work under the ninety-nine contracts, and this Judge BUCKNER admits, it certainly was competent for the commissioners to recognize and resume work upon the sixty-four additional contracts.

In the report of the commissioners for 1875, submitted December 1 of that year, the engineer reports that sixty-four additional contracts of the board of public works have been recognized as existing legal obligations, which, with the amounts to cover work considered necessary, will further increase the cost by $2,146,580.86. He also states that the repair of contract work since the last report has cost $366,123.12; so that in fact the 3.65 debt on the 1st of December, 1875, would be made up as follows:

Amount December 5, 1874, as per report	$10,006,514 66
Estimated cost of completing ninety-nine contracts resumed at that date	1,721,270 11
Repairs of contract work since that date	666,123 13
Cost of sixty-four additional contracts resumed since that date	2,146,580 86
Total	14,540,488 76

This $14,540,488.76 does not represent the full amount payable in 3.65 bonds, as the board of audit has audited and allowed claims under their jurisdiction having no reference to contracts of the board of public works recognized by the commissioners. I am quite certain, yes, I have no doubt of it, Mr. Speaker, that I have established the fact by the proof and the record that the calculations, figures, and theory of my friend from Missouri in regard to the 3.65 indebtedness are entirely incorrect and worthless. But to go back: The gentleman from Missouri has said much in regard to the action and findings of the joint select committee, and has based his calculations mainly upon the conclusions arrived at in the report of that committee. Now, sir, if it becomes clear that that committee was led into error or was not in possession of all and the necessary facts which would lead them to correct conclusions as to the probable debt of the District, it certainly was not the fault of the commissioners or the board of audit. That committee relied largely for its information upon the answer of Governor Shepherd which was dated February 28, 1874.

On page 14 of the report of that committee, under date June 16, 1874, is an estimate of the amount of indebtedness that would probably be funded in the 3.65 per cent. bonds then proposed by the committee as a measure of settlement.

This estimated amount is $8,305,886.59, and includes under the second item an estimate of "amount due or to become due on incomplete contracts," amounting to $1,325,000.

Observe, this amount included work already done or to be done to complete contracts. Now in fact the board of audit has audited an amount of $1,717,000—I use round numbers—and the commissioners have paid in cash to laborers of contractors $75,000; making in all an amount of $1,792,000 paid for work actually done prior to June 20, 1874, and for which payment was actually due at the very moment the joint select committee made its report and presented its estimate of $1,325,000 as the amount required to pay for work done or to be done on incomplete contracts. This amount of $1,792,000 does not embrace one dollar expended under the commissioners.

Where did the committee obtain this sum of $1,325,000 as the amount due or to become due on incomplete contracts?

On page 465 of Governor Shepherd's answer under date of February 28, 1874, will be found an "estimate of cost to complete contracts on which work has been begun or is in progress," the amount there given being $1,325,911.62. The contracts embraced in this estimate are enumerated and are forty in number! They are embraced between numbers 702 and 1032 of the series of contracts of the board of public works. Subsequent to the date of this estimate, namely, February 28, 1874, and before June 20, 1874, the date of abolition of the board, sixty-seven contracts were signed, being numbers inclusive 1033 to 1099!

No estimate appears anywhere for the cost of work to be done under those sixty-seven contracts.

Moreover, beginning with page 340 of this same answer of Governor Shepherd, is a schedule of contracts of the board of public works, from No. 1 to 1032 inclusive, detailing or professing to detail the condition of work on each and every one of those ten hundred and thirty-two contracts, whether complete or incomplete, suspended or abandoned.

As a matter of fact, when the commissioners took charge of the District affairs July 8, 1874, work was found to be actually in progress upon many of these contracts enumerated in the schedule as complete, suspended, or abandoned.

In the estimate of Governor Shepherd nothing is included for work to be done on any but the forty contracts enumerated by him, and it is evident that the committee was led to suppose those forty contracts were all the existing, valid, incomplete contracts, and all on which work would at any time be done.

On page four of the report of the joint select committee reference is made to this estimate of Governor Shepherd, in which it is stated, "He also submitted a list of contracts not yet completed, with the estimated cost of the completion of the work under them, amounting in all to $1,325,911.62." It would seem, therefore, that the committee on June 16, 1874, the date of its report, considered the contracts included in that estimate to be all the contracts on which work was then being done or would thereafter be done, and that the amount of $1,325,000 would embrace all due or to become due on incomplete contracts from and after the date of the governor's answer, namely, February 28, 1874.

It is clear, too, that the committee, in its estimate (on page 14 of its report) of the amount of indebtedness that might be funded in the 3.65 per cent. bonds, quoted from the answer of the governor, which applied only to the forty contracts. There is no intention to attack or to unfavorably criticise the estimates of the committee, but to show that the committee was not advised as to the facts in the case. It does not appear to have been aware of the existence of the sixty-seven contracts made subsequent to the date of Governor Shepherd's answer, and the committee could not well be aware of the progress of work on other contracts reported in the answer as complete, abandoned, or suspended, nor on any other existing contracts, unless the fact was brought to its attention. My object is to show that the estimated amount of indebtedness was wholly unreliable. As an evidence, there has been actually paid, as an amount already due on incomplete contracts on the 20th of June, 1874, the sum of $1,792,000, or about half a million of dollars in excess of the estimate of what was due and to become due. In round numbers, about $10,000,000 has been audited by the board of audit as the indebtedness of the District on June 20, 1874, and fundable into 3.65 per cent. bonds under the act of that date, which amount of $10,000,000 includes nothing for work done under the commissioners. As a matter of fact, the commissioners have recognized one hundred and forty-six contracts instead of forty as valid existing contracts on June 20, 1874, and they have done work under the ninth article of seventeen contracts to a large amount, for the recovery of which amount suits are instituted or being instituted against the contractors and their bondsmen.

At this point I will publish a statement or table showing just what the debt was June 20, 1874, and the error fallen into by the joint committee in its estimate:

1. Auditors' certificates, amount certified	$4,390,600 94
2. Contracts due prior to June 20, 1874	1,788,258 54
3. Damages	827,625 68
4. Sewer certificates	1,035,385 24
5. Sewer tax	552,784 60
	8,594,655 00
Amount certified, class 3	1,897 06
Amount certified, class 5	385,869 25
Amount certified, class 6	151,551 69
Bowen claim	1,463 58
Due June 20, 1874, as certified by board of audit	9,135,436 58
Not presented, class 1	87,350 00
Not presented, class 2	15,160 15
Not audited, class 2	589 29
Not audited, class 5	314 00
Outstanding, class 8	4,938 48
Not audited, class 4	43,610 57
Audited and certified or to be certified to commissioners, class 6	199,377 09
Not certified and outstanding, class 6	116,611 72
Paid for labor by commissioners	74,782 65
Total indebtedness June 20, 1874	9,678,170 53
Committee's estimate, including incomplete contracts	8,305,886 59
Excess of actual indebtedness	1,372,283 94

The above is the statement I made to you in January last, corrected in accordance with the subsequent action of board of audit, and I believe it to be substantially correct. This does not include the $470,000 sewer bonds redeemed by commissioners.

SAM. M. WILCOX,
Late Assistant Accountant Board of Audit.

JUNE 6, 1876.

Now, I desire in this connection to state further that the cost of the completion of the forty-seven contracts resumed after December 5, 1874, and of all extensions or modifications of the one hundred and forty-six contracts on which work has been resumed at any time by the commissioners is only $1,933,338.39. This information has been furnished me by the commissioners of the District, and I have no doubt of its reliability.

I will now, Mr. Speaker, discuss a little further the question of extensions and modifications of contracts which seems so much to annoy my friend from Missouri. I have heretofore shown, I think, that the commissioners had power under the law to make modifications and extensions of contracts. Now, as to the expediency of making them there can be no doubt from these considerations:

First. It saved money to the District; and,

Second. It is shown by the facts that the work done under these modifications and extensions would prove to be of far greater value to the District than the work contemplated by the original contracts. The modifications consisted largely and almost entirely in transferring work from one street to another street or locality, or in the change of grade, or in the amount and kind of work to be performed. The commissioners of the District when considering a contract, if they became satisfied that the work if done would be of little or no real value to the District on account of location or for other good cause and the contractor demanded the right to proceed under his contract, invariably secured such a modification as would transfer the work to a locality where the same was actually needed and would result in immediate and permanent benefit to the District.

In this course I think the commissioners are to be commended, as when they came into power they found the streets and avenues in a very deplorable condition; streets graded, with no pavements; sidewalks, curb-stones torn up or partially laid, and this in many instances in the most populous portions of the city and where there were no contracts for completion. And in order to put these streets, avenues, and sidewalks in a proper condition for use, I maintain it was their duty to make such modifications and extensions as would transfer work to these localities where it was so much needed.

Upon this question the commissioners in their answer to interrogatories of the committee use the following language, and in it is a full answer also to the charge made by Judge BUCKNER, that certain work might have been done for less price than was paid for it.

Upon the recommendation of the engineer, who has under the law control and charge of the work of repair and improvements, we have modified many of the contracts as the public interest and necessities of administration required. These modifications consisted sometimes in the substitution of one kind of work for another; of work in one locality for that contracted for in another; of a diminution of work under contracts when such diminution was practicable, and the work could be dispensed with; of additional work considered necessary and important, and in other matters of detail. All these will fully appear in each case in tables 1 and 2 accompanying the engineer's report. The cost of these modifications is stated in detail in these tables. For some years past these modifications have been known in this District under the technical name of "extensions," which term has been accepted by contractors and others, and is in common use. It does not necessarily imply an increase of work, but designates all modifications of contract, whether by enlargement or diminution of the work in the original letter of the contract, or change of kind or locality. The extension has been given to the original contractor, except when it has been given to some third party by virtue of section 5 of the contracts used by the board of public works, when it considered the contractor as delaying unnecessarily the work or willfully violating his contract, to employ other parties to finish it at the expense of the contractor, or by virtue of section 9 of said contracts, which obliged the contractor to keep his work in repair for a limited period, generally three years, and empowered the board of public works upon the contractor's failure to so keep his work in repair after due notification of its defective condition to make the repairs at the expense of said contractor, and except, also, in the case of the approval by the commissioners of the assignment to other parties of his right by the contractor.

We know of but one case in which parties other than the contractor have offered to perform a contract at a less price than the sum named in it. The offer was informal in every respect. The circumstances attending it have been fully explained in the evidence taken before your committee; it related to a contract for Eleventh street east, which had been made with James Walsh, who had assigned it to William Hussey. An oral offer was made to a former member of this commission to do the work at a less rate than the terms of the contract. The commissioners had no authority to repudiate the existing contract in favor of the applicant. A proposition in writing was received for resurfacing concrete pavements at a lower rate than the price required by the terms of the contract already made for this work. But even if the commissioners had not been called upon to repudiate an existing contract for the purpose of accepting the offer, the bad character of the former work of the party making the offer, and the fact that he did not control either one of the two patents acceptable to the engineer for the concrete pavement, would have prevented its acceptance. We have recently heard that it is claimed that one Langdon made us an offer to do for nothing the repairs required on the work of Charles E. Evans, or the Evans concrete company. No such offer was made to us; we understand that a casual remark about an offer to repair was made by Mr. Langdon in a conversation with the engineer, and that he was invited by that officer to put his offer in writing; with this Mr. Langdon did not comply, but offered, as we are advised, soon after in writing, to the engineer to do the work for pay. He made, however, no allusion to any intention to repair the work of other contractors at his own expense. We are informed that at the time when it is claimed that the offer was made Mr. Langdon was suing Mr. Evans for an amount alleged to be due him on account of this work, and as the subsequent expenditures on account of the repairs on the Evans contract exceeded $200,000, we think it unnecessary to make further comment on the pretended offer.

The gentleman from Missouri has commented upon the acts of the commissioners in the purchase of sewer-pipe. Upon this subject they say in their answer that—

Two contracts were made after due advertisement for a limited quantity of sewer-pipe. The pay was to be in cash. These contracts are Nos. 13 and 15, new series, and are mentioned in table No. 5 of the engineer's report. They were subsequently canceled by mutual consent, and the pending orders under them annulled. It was not intended at the time these contracts were made to use the pipes in connection with contracts of the board of public works, as the contractors were under obligation to furnish their own material, but experience demonstrated that in order to secure good material, particularly that which was to be placed under ground, chiefly sewer-pipe, it was necessary that the engineer should furnish the pipe to the contractors. This course, therefore, was adopted by the commissioners on recommendation of the engineer, and orders of the late board of public works were extended to include the material required for the completion of the work in hand. No additional expense was incurred in consequence of these contracts or orders, as the new material was issued to the contractors at the actual cost in part payment of the work performed; it was in every case charged to them upon report of the engineer by the board of audit in the settlement of their account. This course was acceptable to the contractors, because it enabled them to secure material of quality good enough to pass a thorough inspection at a lower rate than they could purchase the material of commerce in open market. This method of doing business, in our opinion, better protected the interests of the District, and entailed upon it no additional cost for the work. The recommendation of the engineer was not adopted until after we had brought the matter to the attention of the board of audit and ascertained that in their view there was no legal objection to their auditing the accounts. The itemized statement called for will be found in table No. 6, engineer's report, transmitted herewith.

It would seem from this that this proceeding entailed no cost upon the District, but was beneficial, as it secured good material, and whatever its cost might have been it was charged up to the contractors. It made no difference whether the commissioners paid the contractor or other parties for this pipe.

Again, one of the remarkable admissions made by the honorable gentleman from Missouri is that nearly twenty miles of streets were improved during the year 1875 by the District commissioners in addition to the streets covered by the contracts of the board of public works. Taking this conceded fact in connection with the fact that the test in favor of the commissioners' work, as shown in the total cost at page 143 of the commissioners' answer to the interrogatories, as compared with that of the board of public works, was $372,047.09, we think the commissioners could ask no higher compliment to the official ability of their administration. But this is no more than the commissioners can honestly claim under the facts as presented by the evidence.

It is proper, however, that I should add as a still further evidence of his reckless statements and disregard of the facts and testimony, that on nearly one-half of the streets he enumerates no work whatever has been done by the commissioners, and, where indispensably necessary to be done, the work was given in lieu of other work taken from the contractor and for which he could hold the District responsible, and was strictly in pursuance of the second section of the act of June 20, 1874. And, furthermore, nearly all the work undertaken has been completed.

Another matter to which the gentleman has referred with much feeling and upon which he comments at some length is the work done by way of repairs of contract work, which amounts in all to the sum of $809,000. He characterizes this expenditure as the most inexcusable and reprehensible of all the acts of the commissioners, and says their construction of the law and the contracts in this regard is an insult to ordinary intelligence. Now the section in the contract under which this work was done is as follows:

Ninth. It is further agreed that if at any time during the period of —— years from the completion of this contract any part or parts thereof shall become defective from improper material or construction and in the opinion of the said party of the first part require repair, the said party of the second part will, on being notified thereof, immediately commence and complete the same to the satisfaction of the party of the first part; and in case of failure or neglect of the said party of the second part so to do, the same shall be done under the direction and orders of the party of the first part at the expense of the party of the second part.

Under this article in the contracts, and it was in all of them, the commissioners in accordance with its terms where work was defective gave notice to the parties to put the defective parts in repair, and on their failure to comply the commissioners would repair the work and charge it to the contractor. The words used are:

And in case of failure or neglect of the said party of the second part so to do, the same shall be done under the direction and orders of the party of the first part, at the expense of the party of the second part.

Now I maintain that as a matter of law the District could have no claim for the cost of such repairs until they were first completed. A suit for damages could not lie before the work was done, because the amount to be recovered must be its cost, and the language declares that the work shall be done by the party of the first part and at the expense of the party of the second part. It seems to me there can be no question about this. Now there is no pretension that it was not necessary to do this work or that it has not been done economically. But, says the gentleman, the commissioners had no right to pay for this work in 3.65 bonds.

Under the head of fourthly in the sixth section of the act of June 20, 1874, the auditors are authorized to audit claims "existing or hereafter created for which no evidence of indebtedness has been issued arising out of contracts, written or oral, made by the board of public works."

Now, it strikes me that there can be no question that these claims arose out of contracts and that they belong to that class which can fairly be said to be created after the 20th of June, 1874, for which no evidence of indebtedness had been issued, and that it was perfectly proper to pay for this work in 3.65 bonds; certainly when we contemplate the fact that no other means were provided by the law or otherwise for the payment of such work. For all the money thus expended suits have been brought in favor of the District, and I have no doubt will be prosecuted to a successful termination. So that in fact there will be no loss to the District on account of this expenditure.

In the report submitted by Mr. BUCKNER he says: "We do not question the power and duty of the commissioners to make these repairs under the authority to protect and preserve improvements, complete and incomplete, but the work of repair must be paid for in cash, and not in bonds," while in his speech he takes the ground virtually that they had no right to make these repairs under any authority. Now, let us see. The law says that the commissioners may make and incur such obligations and contracts as may be necessary to the faithful administration of the valid laws enacted for the government of said District, to the execution of existing legal obligations and contracts, and to the protection and preservation of improvements existing or commenced and not completed at the time of the passage of this act.

Now, the only means provided for paying for any of this class of work or indebtedness was the 3.65 bonds. If Congress had intended otherwise, it would have made an appropriation for that purpose. Congress did, in the act of June 20, 1874, provide money for District purposes by taxation, and also provided in section 4 of that act that the sums collected from taxation should be distributed, one-fourth to re-imburse the United States for its advances on account of interest which shall have been paid by the United States on the funded debt of the District of Columbia and Washington and Georgetown, due and payable July 1, 1874, and the remainder shall be used to pay deficiencies in the various funds for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874; and all the remainder of said taxes not required for the aforesaid purposes shall be distributed for the purposes and in the proportion provided by the act of the Legislative Assembly of the District of Columbia approved June 26, 1873, entitled "An act imposing taxes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874," so far as said apportionment is not inconsistent with this act. Now, the law of June 20, 1874, must be construed as a whole, and not by sections, and when thus construed there can be no doubt that Congress intended that every debt legally incurred under the act by the commissioners should be paid in 3.65 bonds, except where specific appropriations were made. In this view I am fully sustained by Hons. LYMAN K. BASS, J. M. Wilson, and J. A. HUBBELL, members of the joint committee which prepared and presented to Congress the act of June 20, 1874, and I submit at this time what they say upon the subject:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., May 15, 1876.

GENTLEMEN: In response to your inquiry of me as to my construction of certain provisions of the law of the last Congress approved June 20, 1874, providing for the government of the District of Columbia, and as to the intent of the joint committee which framed that law, in adopting and recommending such provisions to the favorable action of Congress, I beg leave to say that I think the answer is clearly and unequivocally found in the law itself. I find no ambiguity in its expressions. The object of the committee and the object of Congress was to abolish the then existing government of this District, as it provided in section 1 of the act, and to establish in its place a temporary government to exercise its functions until a new permanent form of government could be matured and adopted. By section 2 of the act certain substantial powers theretofore vested in the governor and board of public works were devolved on a commission to consist of three persons, under certain limitations. It was provided that they should make no contract nor incur any obligations other than such contracts and obligations as might be necessary to the faithful administration of the valid laws enacted for the government of said District, to the execution of existing legal obligations and contracts, and to the protection or preservation of improvements existing or commenced and not completed at the time of the passage of the act.

Thus power to make contracts and incur obligations for those three specified purposes was conferred upon the new commissioners, to wit:

First. For the purpose of administering the laws for the government of the District.

Second. For the purpose of carrying out the lawful outstanding contracts of the District.

Third. For the purpose of protecting and preserving existing improvements, or such as were commenced and were incomplete.

Congress in the performance of its duty in the premises could not well have done less. Not to have given the commission power to incur obligations in the administration of the laws, would have been equivalent to abolishing all government. Not to have conferred power and authority to carry out the lawful outstanding contracts of the District, would have been an attempt to repudiate and abolish such contracts in direct violation of the rights of citizens. The former government doubtless had the power to make valid contracts binding the District, and as to such contracts it was not sought to repudiate or annul them by legislative action. All questions as to what were or were not lawful contracts were remitted to the commission, as were such other questions as pertained to the methods of execution. The commission for these purposes and others was the executive authority of the District of Columbia, and was vested with lawful executive discretion in the exercise of its duties, such as is possessed by all executive officers. And if Congress had not given the commission power to incur obligations necessary to take care of existing property of the District, it would have been short-sighted indeed.

On reading your answers to interrogatories of the committee, I do not see that your construction of the law is different from that hereinbefore stated. The means for the payment of the obligations which might be incurred in performing existing contracts were provided for in sections 6 and 7 of the law, by which it is seen that the board of audit were required to audit and settle "fourthly, claims existing or hereafter created for which no evidence of indebtedness has been issued arising out of contracts written or oral made by the board of public works;" and for the amount of such claim so audited the sinking-fund commissioners were authorizd to deliver the 3.65 bonds at par in a like sum. No other provision is made by the law for meeting such indebtedness, and none other was contemplated by the joint committee, for reasons which are fully set forth in their report.

I believe the foregoing is a response to all your inquiries on this subject.

I have the honor to be, yours, very respectfully,

LYMAN K. BASS.

We have read the foregoing and concur in the views therein expressed.

J. M. WILSON,
JAY A. HUBBELL.

Honorables W. DENNISON, J. H. KETCHAM, S. L. PHELPS, Commissioners, &c.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I desire to say again that I look upon much of the speech of the chairman of the committee as uncalled for, unwise, and unfortunate. It exhibits that kind of animus and contains that kind of unjustifiable insinuation and that want of candor and wisdom which always weaken the efforts and greatly detract from the excellence of the real statesman. I cannot think, sir, that the sentiments uttered by the honorable gentleman are shared in by his committee or a single member of it, and I will say, sir, that a majority of the committee have deliberately, with a full knowledge of the facts, declared that the officers of the District are incorrupt, faithful men, and have done their work well, and for the best interests of the District.

If the theory of Judge BUCKNER is correct and the commissioners had carried it out, the District or 3.65 debt would to-day be thousands of dollars more than it is. They found themselves in possession of or parties to one hundred and sixty-three contracts for different kinds of work, and had they carried them out to the letter—and the gentleman both in his report and speech admits they had the power to do this—the burden upon the District would be greater than now, and many streets would have been improved when there was no need of improvement, and many of the streets in the populous and business portion of the city would have been to-day almost impassible. Not only this, sir; we would have had miles of short-lived wood pavements, when we now have durable concrete; a step, if taken, that would ultimately have increased the burdens upon the people of this District more than half a million of dollars.

Again, sir, if the contracts had been performed as they came to the hands of the commissioners, the damages to private property would have been a very large item, as all contracts required that the streets and avenues should be graded to the building line, while by the modifications made the grading was confined to the width of the carriageway and sidewalks, and by the modifications nearly all parking between the sidewalks and the building lines was dispensed with, which was a saving of a large amount to the District.

No, sir, this is the point: If the commissioners had carried out the contracts as they were written, which would have entailed larger debt and unnecessary work, then the gentleman from Missouri would have cursed these men for not exercising their discretion and better judgment. He would have been dissatisfied any way. If they had not made the improvement or repairs which they have to preserve and protect property and the streets and avenues of the District, he then would have denounced them for having allowed property to go to waste and become useless.

No, sir; these republican commissioners could not in any event have suited the gentleman from Missouri. There must be a campaign document arising out of this District investigation, and the gentleman has produced it; but it will do no harm. It is not sustained by the proof nor by a majority of his committee. It must fail of its purpose. I have said his speech is unwise and unfortunate. It is decidedly so in this, that it has the tendency to injure the credit of the District. The District is not in its present condition by the fault of the gentleman from Missouri nor by my fault, and it is our duty as members of Congress, and especially as members of the committee, to do all in our power to establish the credit of this District. The debt is about $22,500,000. Now, if the United States Government will pay its share, as it should do, owning more than one-half of the entire area of the territory here, the burden upon the District is not such as to impair its credit in the slightest.

Again, sir, the people of the District are entirely willing to pay their full share of this debt. They will do so cheerfully; and not only this: they are amply able. We find occasionally a citizen who is crying bankruptcy and that the District can never pay this debt; but this should cause no alarm, as the cry comes from chronic grumblers and generally from parties who refuse to pay their taxes or assume their share of the burdens of government.

I now consider District affairs to be in the best condition they can be, and firmly believe that the national capital has a promising future and that its credit is and always will be of that order which shall command the respect of the financial world. The investigation was for a purpose. The blow was aimed at the commissioners. It has failed of its mark and I have no hesitation in saying that these gentlemen as commissioners of the District have not only passed through the ordeal of a rigid investigation unscathed but have demonstrated the fact that the onerous and responsible duties committed to them have been honestly and judiciously performed, and with scrupulous regard for the best interests of the District and country, and such is the opinion of a majority of your committee. The resolutions are not presented as an arraignment of the commissioners, as the gentleman from Missouri says, by a majority of the committee. They had no such intention whatever and believe there is no cause for action against them.

District of Columbia Affairs.

SPEECH OF HON. A. H. BUCKNER,

OF MISSOURI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

July 1, 1876,

On affairs in the District of Columbia.

Mr. BUCKNER. I ask that the resolution accompanying the report of the Committee for the District of Columbia may be reported.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House be, and he is hereby, instructed to certify to the Attorney-General of the United States a copy of this report, with the accompanying evidence, for such action in the premises as he may deem proper under the law and the facts as developed in said testimony; that the Clerk of this House be, and he is hereby, further instructed to certify a copy of the evidence accompanying this report to the grand jury of the District of Columbia, with directions to investigate the criminal charges against parties referred to in said evidence as having been guilty of a violation of the criminal laws of the United States. And the Attorney-General is also directed, by the aid of such special counsel as he may appoint, to institute such proceedings as he may deem proper under the evidence to recover any and all sums of money which have been obtained illegally or improperly by any parties mentioned in said evidence.

Mr. BUCKNER. Personally I should have preferred a more emphatic condemnation of the official conduct of the commissioners, and not to have left the Attorney-General any discretion on the subject; but in this matter I yield to the opinions of the committee, who agree to this resolution unanimously. It is my purpose, as briefly as I may, to present some of the reasons which have influenced the committee to ask the adoption by the House of this resolution. It is intended as an arraignment of the official conduct of the commissioners of the District of Columbia since they have had the executive authority here, and it seeks to make these officers responsible on their bonds for the unauthorized increase of the debt of the District growing out of their illegal acts. They were required under the act of Congress to enter into bonds in the sum of $50,000 each, to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, for the faithful discharge of their duties. I make no doubt that these officers are amenable on their bonds for misfeasance and want of faithfulness in the execution of their duties; and the resolution which has been reported by the Clerk remits the matter to the Attorney-General for his judgment and action in the premises. If I do not make out a case against these commissioners on the facts I shall present to the House, the law which requires the execution of these bonds should be repealed without delay, and these bonds vacated and annulled.

I am admonished by many considerations not to trespass upon the time or the patience of the House, and I shall therefore confine myself strictly to the reasons which should influence the House to adopt this resolution. It is in the nature of an impeachment against these officers for dereliction of duty in illegally and unnecessarily increasing the debt of this District and adding to the burdens of an impoverished and plundered people. In the report made to the House the grounds upon which this action of the committee is based are set out with some detail both as to the commissioners and the board of audit. But as the resolution affects the commissioners alone, I will direct my attention to them and to the law giving them executive authority in this District. The act of June 20, 1874, after abolishing the former government of the District and the board of public works and vesting the commissioners with general and specific executive powers as to the collection and disbursement of the revenues and the payment of the expenses of the various departments of the government of the District, such as the schools, police, &c., says:

> But said commission, in the exercise of such power and authority, shall make no contract nor incur any obligation other than such contracts and obligations as may be necessary to the faithful administration of the valid laws enacted for the government of said District, to the execution of existing legal obligations and contracts, and the protection or preservation of improvements existing, or commenced and not completed, at the time of the passage of this act.

And in the same section it is provided that they shall not anticipate taxes by a sale or hypothecation of any such taxes or evidence thereof. With the exception of the provision in the third section of the act, that an officer of the Engineer Corps of the Army, to be detailed by the President, shall have the control of the repair and improvement of the streets, sewers, avenues, alleys, &c., in the District, "subject to the control and supervision of the commissioners," there is no other provision affecting the question of the powers of the commissioners than I have quoted above.

The second section contains both the grant of their powers and their limitation, and if the language I have given above does not grant to these commissioners the power to add to the debt of the District; if it does not give them authority to contract on behalf of the District, that its creditors or parties dealing with the District shall be paid in the bonds of the District, then they had no such power or authority.

It may be conceded that the second section above quoted gives the commissioners the power to enter into such contracts and incur such obligations as may be necessary to the faithful administration of the laws of the District and the execution of existing legal obligations and contracts, and the preservation and protection of improvements existing or commenced and not completed; but will it be pretended that they therefore had authority to authorize the issue of the bonds of the District in unlimited amount for the purpose of executing these legal obligations and contracts? The authority of an officer of the Government to contract for the issue of its interest-bearing obligations is never implied. The power must be expressly given or it cannot be exercised. The whole revenues of the District, amounting to two or three millions of dollars, were placed under their control, and most obviously here they were to find the means of executing these obligations and contracts and of preserving and protecting the improvements of the District, whether complete or incomplete. They were prohibited from anticipating the taxes by sale or hypothecation for any purpose; and yet will it be pretended that under the provisions of this second section they could bind the District to the issue of its bonds by the million?

But the real ground of complaint and censure of these commissioners is that it was not obligations or contracts existing at the passage of the act of June 20, 1874, that they concluded to satisfy in the 3.65 bonds of the District, and for which bonds have been issued amounting to between three and five million dollars, but contracts and obligations which they made themselves after that date—contracts which had no existence except by their act—and contracts but for their act without validity either against the District of Columbia or the board of public works. This is the accusation I bring against these unfaithful guardians of this District; it is for this flagrant violation of the law that I arraign them before the country and before this House, and demand that they shall be made responsible on their bonds for their dereliction of duty.

I have said that the second section of the act of June 20, 1874, with one provision in the third section giving the commissioners control and supervision of the public improvements of the District, contains the sole warrant and is the only chart of the authority of this commission.

The sixth section classifies the indebtedness of the District into eight classes, and transfers to the First and Second Comptrollers of the Treasury, as a board of audit, the duty of auditing, allowing, and certifying the then existing indebtedness of the District, and directs that the certificates thus issued may be converted into a fifty-year bond bearing 3.65 per cent. interest, payable semi-annually by another and independent board, the sinking-fund commissioners. The sinking-fund commissioners had no discretion but to issue the bonds when the certificates were presented to them. The board of audit had sole power to make audit of all "claims then existing or created thereafter, arising out of contracts, whether oral or written, of the board of public works or District of Columbia," where there was no written evidences of indebtedness as well as where there were written evidences of indebtedness. Their jurisdiction extended over the past, their power was limited to the then indebtedness of the District. Their duties were temporary, and they had no other power than to allow and certify the then existing indebtedness of all kinds of the District and of the board of public works as classified in the sixth section. Unquestionably they had power to audit claims arising out of the work already done and to be done on contracts of the public works not completed on the 20th of June, 1874. Their duties looked to the past exclusively, except as to the work necessary to complete these contracts, and their allowances were to be satisfied by the 3.65 bonds of the District, at the option of the claimant; while the duties of the commissioners looked to the future, and their obligations were to be discharged in cash derived from taxation and appropriations by Congress. The vain and artful attempt is made by the commissioners to cover up their delinquencies by throwing the responsibility of their illegal contracts upon the opinion of a distinguished Senator who was a member of the joint committee of both Houses that reported the act of June, 1874. But this effort is as weak and groundless as their acts have been unauthorized and antagonistic to the terms of this law and to the object of the creation of this temporary commission.

I do not doubt but that this law provides for the completion of the incomplete contracts of the board of public works, and the board of audit were authorized to issue these certificates for work done and to be done to complete them, according to the contract. The commissioners had nothing to do with this matter except to see, by their engineer, that the work was done according to the stipulations of the contract. This whole matter belonged to the board of audit, and the commissioners cannot protect themselves for their usurpations and violations of law by throwing the responsibility of their misconduct either upon this distinguished jurist and Senator, or upon the engineer of the District, or upon the board of audit. If they had examined the report of the joint select committee of the last Congress, which from the answers to the interrogatories of the committee they seem to have done very lately, they would have found that the joint committee which reported the act of June 20, 1874, estimated that it would only require the sum of $1,325,000 to complete these unfinished contracts. And if they had not yielded themselves to the malign and corrupting influence that has made the government of this District for the last few years a stench in the nostrils of honest men of all parties in this country, the fact that this sum was the amount estimated for this purpose should have caused them to hesitate before they authorized work to be done of this class exceeding $7,000,000, over four millions and a half of which was contracted for and done in 1875 under their order and direction. So sensible were they that they had exceeded their powers and had become the cat's-paws of the corrupt ring that has disgraced the national capital and brought shame and disgrace to the very doors of the Presidential Mansion, that they enter an apology in their last annual report for their wrong-doing. And they say, after referring to the report of Engineer Hoxie, "that the work and consequent expenditure, chiefly in fifty-year bonds exceed the expectation of the commissioners, as indicated in their last report; but the causes therefor growing out of obligations for the execution of existing legal contracts, the protection or preservation of improvements existing or commenced and not completed at the date of said act, and the enforcement of obligations of contractors for keeping avenues and street which they improved in good repair, fully explain the reasons for such work and expenditure."

Never, Mr. Speaker, in my knowledge, have I known guardians of a great public trust resort to such flimsy subterfuges, or attempt to cover up their flagrant abuses of power by such miserable and impudent pretexts.

I have said that, assuming that these legal obligations and contracts referred to in the second section of the act of June 20, 1874, included the obligations and contracts of the board of public works, (which I do not believe is a correct and fair interpretation of this statute,) that there was no express or implied power, that they could be discharged or satisfied in the fifty-year bonds, or that the commissioners had any power to contract for their execution in such securities. And the same is true of the authority given to them, to protect and preserve improvements finished or unfinished. All their contracts and obligations, of whatever nature, had to be met with cash derived from the revenues of the District or from appropriations by Congress. The law upon its face shows conclusively that Congress intended that the commissioners should run this District on a cash basis; the cash to be derived from the revenues of the District and appropriations by Congress, and not by shaving the fifty-year bonds at a discount, as I will show these commissioners have done in some cases. But if there should be any lingering of doubt on this question, as to the true construction of this act, it will at once be dispelled in the light of the facts surrounding its passage. The report of the joint committee that reported this act to the Senate and House leaves no room for controversy on this point. It stated that the District treasury was practically exhausted in all its departments; that the government was hopelessly bankrupt, and that this bankruptcy had been brought about in great measure by the disregard of law by the late Shepherd government, and its reckless manner of accumulating debt upon debt, and as a remedy for the then condition of things they abolished the old government, governor, Assembly, board of public works, and all, and recommended the appointment of a commission to manage the affairs of the District temporarily "under limited and restrained powers," and boards to audit and fund the indebtedness of the District at the passage of the act, including that necessary to finish the incomplete contracts.

Mr. Wilson, of Indiana, then chairman of this committee on the part of the House at the time this bill was acted on by the House, after stating the utterly bankrupt condition of the District government under the reckless and debt-contracting management of the Washington ring, headed by Shepherd, and the remedies proposed by the committee, said:

There are limitations, it will be seen, placed on these commissioners, such as will, in the opinion of the committee, protect the people from any further incurring of debts.—(Congressional Record, volume 7, page 5720, 1873 and 1874.)

And when he came to speak of the character of the security in which the floating debt of the board of public works and of the District of Columbia was to be funded under this act, he said they had fixed upon the 3.65 bond because the testimony showed that the prices had been increased, in some of these contracts 15 per cent. on account of the depreciated character of the certificates in which the contractors had been paid, and this 3.65 bond, payable in fifty years and free from all taxation, would make this matter "about right." The 3.65 bond was to be used to fund past indebtedness, to close up the demands then pressing upon the District, not to be resorted to by anybody as a means to satisfy and discharge contracts in futuro, and that had no existence until a year or more after the passage of the act. Congress supposed it was throwing limitations and restrictions upon the power of the District authorities to add a dollar more to the mountain of debt then oppressing the people of the District. By the same act it levied an unusual rate of taxation upon its property, and made large and liberal appropriations of money in order to extricate the District government from its pecuniary embarrassments; and yet by the false and nonsensical construction the commissioners pretend to have put upon their powers, they have been acting, so far as the streets, avenues, &c., are concerned, as if their powers were absolute and unrestricted, and the funded debt of this District is to-day $6,000,000 more than any one supposed it could be under the provisions of the act of June 20, 1874.

Was the joint committee of last Congress deceiving itself and deceiving Congress when it told us there could be no more incurring of debts. Was this committee, composed of some of the best lawyers of both Houses so incapable of expressing their intention in proper language as that an act designed to put a stop to the growth of the debt of this District can be construed into authority to increase it, to an amount that makes it utterly impossible for the District to pay it. I undertake to say, Mr. Speaker, that neither the joint committee nor Congress are amenable to any such imputation. The act of June 20, 1874, is plain enough and not at all difficult of comprehension or contradictory in its terms. It means that no more debts should be piled up here; it means that these commissioners should run the District on a cash basis; it gives them no power whatever to use the 3.65 bonds in payment for sewer-pipe or curb-stone bought by them, or to pay for any work or labor of their contracting in these bonds, either at their market or face value. It gives them no authority to make new contracts, whether called "extensions," modifications, or enlargements and pay for the work of such extensions in the 3.65 bonds of the District, alone authorized to be issued to pay debts due at the passage of this act or arising out of work to be done on contracts in force at that date. All the attempts made by the commissioners to shelter themselves behind the language used in the second section authorizing them to execute existing legal obligations and contracts, as giving them power to contract for the issue of the bonds of the District, is not only an afterthought but the merest pretense and baldest deception that ever was conceived by self-convicted culprits. And if they had not been breathing an atmosphere of peculation and plunder and had not been surrounded by bold, bad men, schooled in all the arts of public robbery and governmental thieving, backed up and supported by the friendship, power, and patronage of the President, I must do these commissioners the justice to believe they would never have departed so far from the path which the law required them to follow.

Mr. Speaker, I purpose to show by indisputable evidence, evidence derived from the reports and sworn answers of the commissioners, that they have contracted to pay in 3.65 bonds for work and labor performed on contracts which had no existence until they made them, and on others which had no legal validity whatever either upon the board of public works or upon the contractor; and will thus show the utter falsity of their miserable apology for the large expenditure during the year 1875. I shall only have time to call the attention of the House to a few of the more striking cases of gross and palpable violation of the words and spirit of the act of 1874. And I might point to the strange and inexplicable fact that while the commissioners are seeking to account for the heavy and unexpected expenditure in bonds of last year on the ground that they were required to execute existing legal contracts of the board of public works, that they are defending against some of these self-same "legal obligations and contracts" in the District courts, and so far successfully, on the plea that they were of no obligation upon the board of public works by reason of non-compliance with the law which required that no contract should be made by the board of public works without an antecedent appropriation. I will ask the Clerk to read from the report of the attorney for the District, December, 1875:

The Clerk read as follows:

Several suits have been brought against the District based upon contracts of the late board of public works by parties who were not successful or were dissatisfied in the prosecution of claims before the board of audit. It is believed that upon legal grounds the defense is complete in these cases. In one of them a demurrer to the declaration upon the ground that it did not aver that the work was done in pursuance of an antecedent appropriation by law was sustained. This decision is, it is believed, fatal in its effects upon other cases; for, though the defect may be corrected in pleading by averring such appropriation, it is believed that in none of the pending cases can it be shown that such appropriation had been really enacted.

Mr. BUCKNER. So that these contracts were sufficiently valid to justify large expenditures in bonds by the commissioners, but wholly invalid when the District is required to respond in damages for a violation of this legal obligation. But many of these contracts, on which about $3,000,000 was expended last year, had no existence whatever on the 20th of June, 1874, but were entered into subsequently to that date, and the larger portion of them during the year 1875. They are called "extensions" in the report of the engineer, and whether that is the proper designation or not there can be no doubt what an "extension" is. To all intents and purposes, it is a new contract, out and out, in the great majority of cases.

Let me give some specific contracts by number and trace their history, as I find it in the reports of 1874 and 1875, and the answers of the commissioners accompanying the report of the committee. I find contract No. 582 was given to James W. Walsh, October 23, 1872, to grade Eleventh street east, between Pennsylvania avenue and H street north. It was estimated that the grading of this street would cost $15,000, and very little work had been done and there was some question as to its having been abandoned, and at one time it was determined not to complete the work for this and other reasons. A. R. Shepherd is the principal witness to prove there was no abandonment, and the original contractor having assigned his contract to Hussey, another witness, the matter is submitted to the attorney of the District for his opinion, and he tells the commissioners "that there is no privity of contract between the assignee and the commissioners, and it is within the discretion of the commissioners to recognize or not to recognize the assignment." In other words, there is no existing obligation upon the part of the District that Hussey should do this work. Hussey, however, gets an "extension" to finish the grading under this contract, but at 33⅓ per cent. more than another party had agreed to do it for, and to whom Mr. Blow, then of the commission, promised the contract. This contract, No. 582, was afterward extended by five different contracts or extensions during the last year, embracing almost every variety of street work, as well on the part of Eleventh street east, where the grading was done, as on other parts of that and adjoining streets, and on streets full a mile distant in the northwestern part of Washington. No one of these "extensions" had any reference to the original contract, except the first, which was to finish the grading. The remaining four extensions were in every sense new contracts entered into by the commissioners, and signed by them and Hussey, for doing other and different work and in different localities from the original contract, and instead of costing $15,000, as originally estimated, this favored contractor was paid on this contract 582 and its extensions the sum of $104,440.95 in 3.65 bonds. Here, then, is a contract having no valid obligation on the commissioners, and which they were under no legal obligation to recognize in the first place, but which they did recognize, and entered into four additional contracts for new work, which had no existence until the commissioners made the contracts and agreed to pay for the work in 3.65 bonds. Such is the character of the legal obligations and contracts existing June 20, 1874, which these guardians of this plundered District were forced by law to execute!

I call attention to another contract in which a character now becoming notorious as one of the noble army of plunderers of the Freedman's Bank figures as the original contractor. I allude to John O. Evans, contract No. 916, to lay Scharf pavement on B street north, between First and Second streets east. The commissioners' report of 1874 shows that this contract was completed under the board of public works at a cost of $10,163.34. In the report of 1875 this completed and lifeless contract it seems was assigned on May 20, 1875, to the executor of W. C. Murdock. Murdock is still living, and what is meant by giving him an executor while living I am not prepared to say, unless it is intended to notify the world that Evans is his executor and is the real responsible party and beneficiary, which, I doubt not, is very near the truth. On the same day of the assignment we have an extension of this completed and lifeless contract to lay this Scharf pavement, of which Evans, the companion and friend of his late excellency Governor Shepherd, and of the much-indicted General Babcock, claims to own the patent, on streets too numerous to mention, and scattered over the north half of Washington. These extensions, or, in the language of the commissioners, "existing legal obligations," include parts of fourteen or fifteen streets, miles distant from B street east, and have no more connection with the original contract than they have with Wall street, New York, and among these extensions is the taking up of cobble-stone pavement in an alley in square 248 and replacing it with concrete pavement. This business of extension for the benefit of this distinguished member of the Washington ring has cost the District the nice little sum of $113,659.56. If I were to state who are the owners of square 248, for whose benefit a concrete pavement was substituted for a cobble-stone pavement at a cost to the District of between six and seven thousand dollars, I might be suspected of impeaching the motives of these commissioners in thus expending this money without pretense of law or authority. I am not now inquiring into their motives.

I have brought this contract 916 to the attention of the House as irrefutable evidence that these extensions are but another name for new contracts that had no existence when they assumed the executive authority of the District, and which they signed and sealed nearly a year after the passage of the act abolishing the late government, and after the original contract had been completed and had no assignable quality whatever. It is difficult to conceive of a more glaring instance of deception and concealment of the real facts than has been shown by the commissioners in their effort to shield themselves from censure by claiming that the work done under these extensions was in the execution of legal obligations existing June 20, 1874.

Mr. Speaker, I know these details are dry and uninteresting to this House, but I must beg its indulgence in presenting other facts not less conclusive as to what are termed "existing legal contracts" by the commissioners when, unfortunately, they were placed in charge of the government of this District. I call attention to the history of contracts No. 561, John J. Shipman, contractor; No. 860, Birch and Fletcher, contractors, and No. 1050, Thomas Kerby, contractor, to be found on pages 448 to 453 of the testimony taken before the committee. All of these original contracts of the board of public works were for work in various parts of the District, and their "extensions" made by the commissioners were given to these several contractors on the testimony of Shepherd and other members of the board of public works; which, if it proved anything as to a contract, showed that there was no pretense of a contract between these favorites of the deposed governor and the board of public works. They are called "oral contracts," not even proved by the sworn statement of a witness, and the facts as stated by Shepherd absolutely disproving the existence of anything like a contract binding either upon the contractor or the board of public works. Here is the unsworn statement of Shepherd and two other members of the board of public works as to one of these "oral contracts:"

It was the understanding and agreement between the late board of public works and the contractor for Boundary street that it should be improved from North Capitol street to Massachusetts avenue northwest; the contract should be completed.

It was completed by the commissioners according to the order of the late governor. These oral contracts, on such evidence as I have given above, were recognized as "existing legal obligations" of the board of public works; and these extensions added to the debt of the District as follows: Extension of 561, $118,583.01; extension of 860, $52,982.92; extension of 1050, $58,939.03; total, $230,304.96. And it is worthy of remark that the work done under one of these oral contracts, construction of a road up the Potomac, west of Georgetown, has cost the District the sum of $70,000 per mile! It will thus be seen that a mere understanding or conversation, not reduced to writing, with no terms stated or prices fixed or estimates made, with no bond or obligation of the contractor to do the work, and not a line on the subject on the records of the board of public works or among its papers, is recognized as a legal obligation existing on the 20th of June, 1874, which is enforced against the District by its faithless agents, by the execution of a contract signed and sealed by them, that the work shall be done according to such stipulations as they might impose, the contractor to be paid in 3.65 bonds at par. With such a construction of the law, under which the commissioners acted, it is a matter of wonder, as well as congratulation, that a much greater number of "oral contracts" were not brought to life and recognized as valid and binding contracts on the District. We may account for the anxiety of the boss of the Washington ring to have these oral contracts recognized when it is known that he has been engaged since his deposition from power in the business of supplying the contractors of the commissioners with houses and lots, and that the records of deeds show that among other purchasers, who were contractors, his sales to these three contractors have amounted to about $80,000 within the years 1874 and 1875, but by what principle of law or common sense the commissioners have come to treat these "oral contracts" as binding upon anybody passes all comprehension. The truth is that they have acted in this matter of "extension" as if they had unlimited power, with no restrictions or checks upon their sweet wills. The engineer in his report of last December in fact admits this. After referring to the powers conferred upon the commissioners, he says:

Accordingly, the work considered necessary has been covered by modification and sometimes by extension of certain contracts of the late board of public works.

This is what was done in 1875. They have performed work, graded streets, paved sidewalks, concreted carriage-ways wherever such work was considered necessary, and the attempted justification of the commissioners that they were enforcing legal obligations and contracts is a miserable pretense and a disreputable deception. The board of audit had power to audit and certify certain claims growing out of oral contracts made by the board of public works; but the commissioners were confined to enforcing existing legal obligations and contracts; and, until they can show that these contracts sought to be established by Shepherd were legal and valid obligations, this authority specially given to the board of audit cannot avail them. There was very good reason why executed oral contracts should be satisfied which did not and ought not to apply to these pretended oral contracts on which not a day's labor had been spent or a cubic yard of earth excavated or removed, and hence the difference in the powers given to the board of audit and the commissioners.

But, Mr. Speaker, I must condense what I have to say further on this pretended execution of the legal obligations and contracts of the board of public works existing on the 20th June, 1874. It would have been far more truthful and honorable in these officers if they had said that they had conceived that it was their mission to carry out the grand and comprehensive plan of public improvements inaugurated by the territorial government, and this unexpected and unlooked-for expenditure of work and bonds was necessary to this end. We should have understood that and we should have known how to deal with this hallucination. But, bad as such a confession would have been, it would have been far more creditable both to the head and the heart of these gentlemen than the attempt to shield themselves by the false and deceptive statement that this great addition to the District debt was incurred in executing the legal obligations of the District in force when they entered upon their duties. Never was there such a bold and impudent imposture sought to be palmed off upon unsuspecting credulity. In additional proof of this statement, I charge that under one of the extensions of contract 760, Thomas Joyce, contractor, De Sales street was graded, curbs set, and brick pavements laid, and the same street was concreted by Murdock, alias John O. Evans, at a cost of $15,282.83, and the records of the board of public works do not show that ever a dollar was expended or contracted to be expended on this street.

Again, contract No. 384, D. R. Smith contractor, was extended, so as to tear up a well-graveled street and brick sidewalks on I street, between North Capitol and New Jersey avenue, and to concrete the same, after this contractor had assigned his contract to John O. Evans' man Murdock, at a cost of $41,556.65 to the people of the District. Both of these illegal and unwarranted extensions (under contracts 384 and 760) were undisguised jobs, principally for the benefit of the property of Shepherd and his friends, fronting and contiguous to these streets. But this is not all the profit derived by him from the subservience of the commissioners. It so happens that each of these contractors had a fancy to a house and lot owned by the notorious boss of Washington, and the record of deeds develops the fact that one pays $7,500 and the other $6,500 for the lot of his fancy. And to crown all the wrong-doing of these imported guardians of the District, I have in my hand a list of contract extensions, which I will publish as a part of my remarks, from which it will be seen that during the year 1875 nearly twenty miles of streets in this District were torn up and grading commenced during last year, so that owing to their unauthorized "extensions" the streets in many parts of the District are to-day in as bad and incomplete condition as they were during the spring of 1874, when the Shepherd government was displaced.

Street improvements, primarily undertaken under "commissioners' extensions," since report of December, 1874.

No. of original contract.	Name of contractor.	Street.	Between—
243	Daniel A. Connolly	C st. N. E.	4th and Boundary sts.
	Do	A st. N. E.	3d and Boundary sts.
	Do	Delaware avenue	C and Boundary sts.
	Do	E st. N. E.	1st st. and New Jersey ave.

Street improvements, primarily undertaken under "commissioners' extensions," since report of December, 1874—Continued.

No. of original contract.	Name of contractor.	Street.	Between—
	Daniel A. Connolly	1st st. N. E.	C and Boundary sts.
	Do	D st. N. E.	1st and 4th sts.
	Do	6th st. N. E.	Mass. ave. and E. Capitol st.
264	E. E. Barnes	M st. S. E.	3d st. and James Creek Canal.
294	Steeps & Follansbee	Alley	In square 70.
316	John G. Stafford	N st. S. E.	1st and 2d sts.
357	W. Z. E. Vermillion	South Carolina ave.	New Jersey ave. and 6th st. S. E.
388	Dillard & Moulton	R st. N. W.	7th st. and New Jersey ave.
403	Hugh Murray	23d st. N. W.	E st. and canal.
413	E. E. Barnes	3d st. S. E.	Virginia ave. and Eastern Br'h.
	Do	N st. S. E.	2d and 4th sts.
	Do	C st. S. E.	South Capitol and 3d sts.
	Do	D st. S. E.	S. Capitol and New Jersey ave.
415	Patrick McNamara	9th st. N. E.	Maryland ave. and C st.
	Do	10th st. N. E.	Maryland ave. and C st.
	Do	A st. S. E.	3d and 9th sts.
558	Del. Hudnell	5th st. N. W.	O and Q sts.
582	William Hussey	Tennessee ave	Lincoln Sq. and 15th st. N. E.
	Do	15th st. N. E.	H and East Capitol sts.
	Do	5th st. N. E.	H and K sts.
	Do	6th st. N. E.	H and K sts.
	Do	F st. N. E.	New Jersey ave. and 7th st.
	Do	Boundary st	11th and 15th sts. N. E.
	Do	4th st. N. W.	N and O sts.
723	David Roche	23d st. N. W.	M and N sts.
754	Thomas Kirby	1st st. N. W.	M and Boundary sts.
757	M. J. Laughlin	25th st. N. W.	E st. and Canal.
760	Thomas Joyce	De Sales st.	17th st. & Connecticut ave. N.W.
765	George Neitzey	Water st., Georgetown.	High st. and Aqueduct.
766	C. H. Moulton	T st. N. W.	14th st. and Vermont ave.
770	John S. Baldwin	Extension of 8th st.	Grant ave. & Col. Orph. Home. Grant ave. and Boundary st.
	John S. Baldwin	A st. N. W.	12th st. and New Jersey ave.
795	P. H. Finley	E st. S. E.	2d st. and North Carolina ave.
	Do	Virginia ave.	New Jersey ave. and 6th st. S. E.
	Do	1st st. S. E.	North Carolina ave. and F st.
819	Andrew Gleason	4th st. N. E.	E and Boundary sts.
	Do	5th st. N. W.	Q and Boundary sts.
	Do	M st. N. E.	North Capitol and 1st sts.
826	Stephen Talty	K st. N. E.	3d and 7th sts.
835	O. O'Hare	Beall st.	High and Monroe sts.
838	John Lyons	6th st. S. E.	E. Capitol st. & N. Carolina ave.
853	A. L. Nesmith & Co	Canal st. S. W.	H and I sts.
899	W. Fletcher	26th st. N. W.	G st. and River.
	Do	27th st. N. W.	G and L sts.
929	Do	24th st. N. W.	N st. and Rock Creek.
1050	Thomas Kirby	Boundary st. N. W.	6th and 9th sts. 16th st. and Massachusetts ave.
	Do	Grant ave.	7th and 9th sts.
1058	Sylv. Gleason	S st. N. W.	11th st. and New Jersey ave.
1074	Albert Gleason	Q st. N. W.	12th and 14th sts.
	Do	12th st. N. W.	P and Q sts.
	Do	Vermont ave.	P and Q sts.
	Do	13th st.	P and Q sts.
1094	Do	Corcoran st.	14th and 16th sts.
	Do	R st.	14th and 16th sts.
	Do	Samson st	15th and 16th sts.
	Do	17th st.	Massachusets ave. and P. st.
	Do	Q st.	Massachusetts ave. and 16th st.

These streets represent in the aggregate a length of nearly twenty miles, which length is obtained by the data furnished by the commissioners and taking the dimensions from the map of the city.

What escape is there for these officers? Will they pretend, now that I have shown that these "extensions" were not, as asserted by them, legal obligations of the board of public works, that the concreting contracts given to Murdock, the oral contracts given to Shipman and others, and the twenty miles of grading new streets were necessary to protect and preserve the improvements already made? This would be a subterfuge in keeping with the statement that they were valid obligations of the board of public works. But it is their only hope of escape, vain and groundless though it be; and I will not insult the intelligence of this House by attempting to prove that the grading of miles of new streets was necessary to preserve or protect improvements contiguous thereto or in other parts of the District.

If, Mr. Speaker, I have not satisfied this House that the apology of the commissioners for the heavy expenditure of last year and the consequent increase of the debt of the District is false and unreal, and the statement that this expenditure has grown out of the exercise of the power vested in them to execute legal obligations and contracts of the board of public works existing on the 20th of June, 1874, is utterly groundless and untrue in fact, it is not because of the absence of evidence at my command, but because I have not made a proper presentation of that which I have. I reiterate, and I would emphasize the statement, that of the work done by the commissioners in 1875 under what is called "extensions" there is not one which was a legal contract or obligation, binding upon the board of public works at the passage of the act of June 20, 1874. They are, without exception, so far as my examination has gone, new contracts made by the commissioners for new work, at no time contracted to be done by the board of public works; and it is an impudent attempt at deception when the commissioners assert that these extensions were legal and outstanding obligations and contracts which they were bound to execute and enforce. Even if it be assumed that they had the power to contract for the issue of the 3.65 bonds in the execution of existing obligations and contracts, which is utterly untenable, these extensions had no existence as contracts until they made them, and to all intents and purposes were new contracts and for new work which the board of public works had never authorized or contracted for.

It is my purpose now to show that the commissioners are absolutely without excuse for the increase of the 3.65 bonded debt of the District beyond about the sum of $10,000,000; and that this increase has been brought about by submitting themselves to the dominion and control of the men who made the late District government a hissing and a scorn to the whole country, and by yielding to the pressure of a people dependent, in great measure, for their prosperity on large expenditures by the Government and heavy disbursements from the Treasury. The commission authorized by the act of June 20, 1874, entered upon their duties about the 1st of July, 1874, and made their report to the President at the second session of the last Congress.

Among the first acts of the commissioners was the adoption of a resolution that all contracts in future should be let out to the lowest and best bidder, and that contractors should no longer be furnished by the District with such materials as were needed in the work of public improvement. Under the authority conferred by the second section of this act they had reduced the number of officials connected with the District government, and thus cut off a large source of expenditure under the late territorial government. In the report made to the President, in December, 1874, so far as I have been able to discover after a careful examination of it, these expenditures were confined strictly to the completion of the incomplete contracts of the board of public works, though some of these contracts are not included in the list of such contracts reported by the joint committee on the evidence of the late president of the board of public works. At the date of this report it was estimated by them that the completion of contracts then in operation would require $1,721,270.11 to finish them. There were also $184,408.84 estimated for contracts of doubtful obligation, which, if completed, would be payable in 3.65 bonds, and also work amounting to $548,383.25 had been done on contracts payable in 3.65 bonds, from July 8, 1874, to date of last measurement. The report of the board of audit, made at the same time, goes much more in detail, and states the amount certified and allowed in each class of indebtedness, with the amount of outstanding and unadjusted claims in each of the eight classes provided for by the sixth section of the act of June, 1874. I herewith give the tables taken from their report.

Statement of certificates issued and unadjusted claims.

Class No.		Actual issue and estimate, December 1, 1874.
		Certificates issued and unadjusted claims.	Total.
1	Sewer certificates	$898,942 29
	Sewer certificates outstanding and unadjusted	204,600 00
			$1,103,542 29
2	Auditor's certificates, board of public works	4,170,030 63
	Auditor's certificates, board of public works, outstanding and unadjusted.	314,113 89
			4,484,144 52
3	Auditor's and comptroller's certificates of District of Columbia		1,897 06
4	Contract work, certified	1,088,757 84
	Contract work, unadjusted and outstanding	1,458,358 99
			2,547,116 83
5	General claims against the District, certified	82,547 43
	General claims against the District, outstanding and unadjusted	297,797 09
			380,344 52
6	Old material, property, not issued	Estimate	463,094 85
7	Damages to real property, certified	84,689 57
	Damages to real property, outstanding and unadjusted	383,996 50
			468,686 07
8	Sewer taxes refunded, certified	531,862 36
	Sewer taxes, outstanding and unadjusted	25,826 16
			557,688 52
	Total		10,006,514 66

They say:

The unadjusted claims, classes 1, 2, 7, and 8, may be regarded as fixed claims against the District and subject to but slight variation. Classes 4 (contract work) and 5 (claims against the District) will probably be diminished when audited, but by a continuance of works under contracts No. 4 will be ultimately increased.

In a preceding part of their report, after excusing themselves for not being able to comply fully with the requirements of the act of Congress, they say:

The result presents a very nearly accurate and reliable statement of the indebtedness of the District.

And this result was made up as we have seen of—

Certificates issued	$6,858,727 18
Claims outstanding and unadjusted	3,147,787 48
Total	10,006,514 66

and is "a very nearly accurate and reliable statement of the 3.65 indebtedness." So nearly did they consider this $10,000,000 as the amount of the 3.65 bonded debt that they make the following aggregate of the ascertained debt of the District, namely:

Funded debt	$8,883,940 43
Eight-per-cent. certificates	1,522,400 00
Certificates of the Board of Audit	6,858,727 18
	17,265,067 61
Adding the unadjusted claims	3,147,787 48
Makes a total of	20,412,855 09

Executive Document No. 1, part 6, Forty-third Congress, second session, pages 268, 269.

It must be borne in mind that this was in December, 1874, five months after they had been examining into the affairs of the District and two months after all claims could be presented for audit. That both the commissioners and board of audit believed that this sum of ten millions would about cover all the 3.65 debt seems beyond dispute. Nor was it supposed probable, from anything said or stated by either board in the reports of 1874, that class 4 (work on contracts) would be increased. They no doubt believed that $3,147,855 would cover all the unadjusted and outstanding claims. Congress at that session extended the time for presenting the claims in two of the classes, (not class 4,) which increased the debt of these classes somewhat. But, excluding class 4, the whole amount ultimately certified in all the seven other classes was less by $114,000 than the board of audit estimated for these classes in December, 1874.

In making these reports these officers either intended to inform the President accurately as to the probable amount of the District debt or they made their reports to deceive him and the country. I do not doubt that at that time they believed that the estimate I have given as having been made by the board of audit, and confirmed as far as the commissioners went by their report, would cover the 3.65 bonded debt of the District, and at that time it never entered into the heads of any of these officers that during the ensuing year they would add to this debt in contract work alone the enormous sum of between three and five millions of dollars. As late as February, 1875, they asked for an appropriation of money to pay the interest on this debt for the fiscal year from June, 1875, to June 30, 1876, and in this estimate they put the principal at $10,000,000. And nowhere and at no time during the second session of the last Congress is there a whisper or intimation from either the commissioners or the board of audit that there was so large an amount of obligations or contracts of the board of public works then outstanding and unexecuted which required enforcement at the hands of these watchful guardians of the interests of the District.

I am now on the subject of the contract work—not the repair work—and I affirm that, if they knew of the existence of the obligations and contracts which they now set up as being in existence and binding on them as the successors of the board of public works, it was their duty to have so advised the President and Congress. Is it possible that, if they knew of such contracts and obligations, binding alike on the tender consciences of these commissioners and the defunct board of public works, they could have remained silent and not made known their number and character and the sum required to execute and enforce these contracts and obligations? Why should they not have made report of these unexecuted obligations? Why should they not inform the President that instead of $1,721,000 being estimated to complete the contracts in hand, that there were other obligations to be executed and other contracts to be enforced which would require three or four million dollars additional in 3.65 bonds?

The naked truth, Mr. Speaker, is they never dreamed during the last session of the Forty-third Congress of what the ring required them to do during the summer of 1875. There were no such contracts or obligations existing June 20, 1874. It is a wicked deception, an unmitigated imposture, to call these extensions of last year obligations of the board of public works. After being made the tools and instruments of Shepherd and his corrupt crew, they have the audacity to attempt to justify themselves for grading near twenty miles of new streets and concreting Commissioner Ketcham's alley, and dozens of streets in the neighborhood of the property of the real-estate pool, by the deception that these extensions were but the enforcement of contracts and obligations existing June 20, 1874. We have seen how the commissioners attempted to carry out the recommendations of the joint committee of 1873; how they abandoned the vicious system of giving out contracts to friends and favorites without competition; how they advertised all contracts to be let out to the lowest bidder; how they refused to furnish sewer-pipe, curb-stone, &c., to the contractors of sewers and streets, as their predecessors had done; and how they, after five months' investigation of the affairs of the District, reported what they had done and how much it was estimated the debt of this bankrupt District would be.

But very soon after the adjournment of Congress in March, after making a liberal appropriation of over a million of dollars to the use of the District, a marked change takes place. All the cash contracts which had been given out in 1874 were canceled, extensions of old contracts multiplied rapidly, the old favored contractors under the Shepherd government come to the front again; sewer-pipe which had been contracted to be paid for in cash is now paid for in 3.65 bonds; and these securities, which by the law were intended to fund the indebtedness of the District, become the means of discharging newly created obligations entered into for the first time by the commissioners themselves. It is questionable whether in any year since the District had its infamous governor and Legislature and board of public works in full blast there was so much activity, so many streets graded and improved, so many employés about the engineer's office, so many certificates issued, and so much money expended. Shepherd was nominally displaced only for the term of six months. During the whole of last summer and fall he was as fully in the control of the improvements of this District as if he were one of the commission, without any of the responsibility attaching to the office. By his mere ipse dixit he converts verbal contracts binding upon no one into obligations of the commissioners under which they pay hundreds of thousands of dollars in the bonds of the District for the execution of these verbal contracts. The men to whom he makes sales of real estate in Washington, amounting to $250,000 within the last two years, by some strange and singular coincidence, are the fortunate contractors who obtain extension upon extension, and the commissioners during the whole of the season of 1875, losing sight of the limitations of the act which gave them their authority, seem to have had no other thought than to carry out the "comprehensive plan" of the board of public works and pile up a debt upon a bankrupt people so utterly out of all proportion to their ability to pay that they have lost all sense of their obligation to pay it.

But, Mr. Speaker, the most inexcusable and the most reprehensible of the unlawful expenditures of the commissioners during the last year is to be found in the repair work authorized by them, at an expense of $809,000 in the 3.65 bonds of the District. It is tainted with the vice of want of power, of extravagant cost, wasteful favoritism, and every other characteristic of a shameless job. There is not one redeeming feature about it, and it is impossible to resist the conclusion that it is anything but a scheme of plunder and theft of the people of this District, unsurpassed in its enormity by anything that has ever transpired here since Shepherd and Babcock have had undisputed sway in its government. I am far from charging that either of the commissioners have pocketed a farthing of the cost of this repair work. In the absence of any positive and direct proof that they were interested in these contracts, I give them the benefit of the presumption of innocence of any corrupt practice or improper conduct in respect of this illegal and inexcusable outlay. But all the facts touching this wrongful expenditure show conclusively that they should be held accountable on their bonds for their gross misfeasance and culpable mismanagement of the credit and resources of the District growing out of the contracts for this repair work and the execution of those contracts; otherwise nothing short of criminal misconduct on their part can render them amenable on the bonds required to be executed by the commissioners.

It seems to me an insult to the most ordinary intelligence to assert that because the contractors under the board of public works had failed to comply with the stipulations of their several contracts to keep in repair the streets which they had paved, for a term of years, and because they had been notified in the fall of 1874 to make these repairs and failed to do so, that therefore this state of facts constituted a debt against the District at the passage of the act of June 20, 1874, which could be allowed and certified and converted into 3.65 bonds. For this is the naked proposition in all its absurdity. I grant that they had the power to protect and preserve; in other words, to repair improvements finished and unfinished, and to pay for the same in cash. But here is a proposition to put into the funded debt of the District a claim of the District against the contractors for a failure to comply with the covenants of the original contract with the board of public works, and which was capable of being put into a judgment by the verdict of a jury. So far from these contractors or their assignees having any claim or debt against the District, the debt was due to the District and not by the District to the contractors.

To make the matter still worse, if by any construction or distortion of the statute it could be made to include this repair work, the fact still remains that the work was done more than nine months after it was possible, under the law, to present this pretended claim for audit and certificate. It was only by first making an unauthorized contract with some of the henchmen of Shepherd to do this repair-work, to be paid for partly in cash and partly in 3.65 bonds, that the shrewd and unprincipled tricksters of the Washington ring manipulated this last grand raid upon the tax-payers of the District and increased its funded debt more than three-quarters of a million of dollars. That the commissioners made these repair-extensions in violation of law, and that they knew, in thus adding to the debt of the District, they were committing a fraud upon the act of June, 1874, and upon a confiding Congress, there can be no reasonable doubt. All this repair-work done in 1874 had been paid for in cash.

Speaking of these repairs, the engineer in his report, and made a part of the report of the commissioners, says:

> The precaution that work shall be guaranteed for a term of years has been taken by the board of public works, and under this provision notifications have been sent out by me to various contractors that repairs were needed. The majority of these notices have received no attention, and it has been necessary to do the work and charge it to the contractor. Provision must be made for doing a large proportion of this work, and suits must be brought to recover the amount expended from the delinquent contractors and their sureties.

He says these repairs had been done and the cost charged to the contractors, and his accounts show that the District had paid the cost of these repairs in cash out of its own funds.

There is no pretense that up to December, 1874, any "extension" had been made by which the cost of these repairs had become a part of the funded debt; and in the same report he makes an estimate of the cost of repairs that would be required up to June 30, 1875, and asks a "cash" appropriation of $57,941.77. So also in his estimate of the current expenses of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, he estimates the "cash" expenditure of $109,217.53 necessary to be advanced by the District and to be charged to the contractors. But in order to leave no possible escape to these faithless guardians of the District, I will ask the Clerk to read from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 10, page 1604, of the last Congress.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE COMMISSIONERS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, D. C., February 18, 1875.

SIR: Agreeably with your request, we send you herewith a detailed tsatement of the items included in the general fund in our estimate of expenditures for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, with a copy of the statement of aggregate of the estimates for the same year. We will thank you to show the inclosed to General Chipman, as an answer in part to a letter received from him this morning.

Very respectfully,

W. DENNISON,
J. H. KETCHAM,
S. L. PHELPS,
Commissioners District of Columbia.

Hon. A. R. COTTON,
Chairman Subcommittee.

Detailed statement of the items comprised under heading of general in estimate for fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, based upon the reports of heads of Bureaus.

Washington Asylum supplies, &c	$32,417 50
Georgetown Asylum supplies, &c	2,439 40
Reform School, support of inmates	14,000 00
Board of health District proportion	32,320 00
Fire department, salaries and contingencies	84,683 00

Salaries of officers and employés of the District of Columbia other than fire department, Metropolitan police, school-teachers, as follows:

Commissioners' office	$20,760 00
Auditor's office	6,720 00
Attorney's office	5,040 00
Comptroller's office	11,180 00
Collector's office	12,630 00
Superintendent of assessment and taxes	15,050 00
Board of audit	51,465 00
Coroner's office	1,666 00
Deputy comptroller in charge of assessments	6,160 00
Commissions of sinking fund	3,700 00
Treasurer's office	3,900 00
Engineer's department, including surveyors, overseers, clerks, levelers, rodmen, laborers, &c	115,800 26
Sealers of weights and measures	400 00
Harbor-master	100 00
Water department	7,123 00
Markets, Washington and Georgetown	8,424 00
Garbage collectors	15,552 00
Washington Asylum	3,870 00
Georgetown Almshouse	500 00
Payment of physicians and apothecaries	8,000 00
Total payment of salaries	298,040 26
General advertising	25,300 00
Sweeping streets, per estimate of engineer	80,000 00
Support of insane paupers	5,826 00
Repairs to wood pavement, per estimate of engineer of District of Columbia	63,298 93
Repairs of concrete pavement, per estimate of engineer of District of Columbia	45,918 60
Repairs to county roads and bridges, per estimate of engineer of District of Columbia	6,667 00
Repairs to pumps, per estimate of engineer of District of Columbia	9,975 00
Cleaning alleys, per estimate of engineer of District of Columbia	29,000 00
Cleaning sewer-traps, per estimate of engineer of District of Columbia	7,200 00
Removal of ashes, per estimate of engineer of District of Columbia	10,200 00
Expenses of parking commission, per estimate of engineer of District of Columbia	12,000 00
Gas-lamps and repairs, per estimate of engineer of District of Columbia	1,930 00
Extension of sewers, laterals and connections, per estimate of engineer of District of Columbia	83,334 00
Erecting five hundred new street-lamps, per estimate of engineer of District of Columbia	10,000 00
Purchase of machinery for repairs of concrete pavements, per estimate of engineer of District of Columbia	30,000 00
RENT OF PUBLIC BUILDINGS.
Schools	$13,880 00
Station-houses	2,340 00
Morrison building	3,600 00
	19,820 00
REPAIRS OF BUILDINGS.
School buildings	25,500 00
Markets	3,000 00
Station-houses	3,700 00
Engine-houses, Washington and Georgetown, asylum and Columbia buildings	4,200 00
	36,400 00
Commissioners' office, contingent expenses	3,400 00
Auditor's office, contingent expenses	320 00
Comptroller's office, contingent expenses	1,008 00
Collector's office, contingent expenses	3,062 00
Water department, including repairs to water-mains, labor, and material for same, &c	94,000 00
Surveyor's office	608 04
Board of audit contingent expenses	5,240 00
Attorney's office expenses	1,002 50
Judicial expenses	846 40
Superintendent assessment of taxes	5,460 00
Coroner's office	500 00
Deputy comptroller in charge of special assessments	$1,085 00
Treasurer's office	190 00
Relief and transportation of paupers	950 00
Fuel account, including gas for offices	4,200 00
Markets, cleaning, labor, carts, &c	2,400 00
Insurance, public buildings	1,843 37
Commissioner's sinking fund	1,200 00
Engineer department proper	5,838 00
Total general District fund	1,074,823 00

FITZHUGH COYLE,
Comptroller District of Columbia.

Mr. BUCKNER. It will be seen from this itemized statement made by the commissioners that they asked for $109,217.53 "to pay for the cost of repairs to wood and concrete pavements for the year ending the 30th June instant," and Congress subsequently appropriated, not only this sum, but nearly the entire sum asked, namely, $1,060,000, in order to enable the commissioners to maintain the government of the District for the present fiscal year and to do this repair-work, make sewer-connections, buy concrete-machinery, &c. It is thus made apparent that the commissioners then construed their powers as I do now, and that they understood that the protection and preservation of improvements were to be paid for in cash, and not in bonds. Instead of using this money for this purpose, they were induced to resort to the fraudulent and deceptive system of "extension," by which W. C. Murdock, alias John O. Evans, and Cranford & Hoffman monopolized all this repair-work, except a small contract given to Jonathan Taylor for repairing Pennsylvania avenue east, at a cost of $809,000. Notwithstanding there were other parties ready to do this work at much less cost—one in fact offering to do it at little or no cost to the District—it was given to these parties at private contract, without advertisement and without competition.

It will appear from an examination of table 4 of the answers of the commissioners accompanying the report of the committee that this work on the streets repaired in 1875 was done in 1872 and 1873 at a cost to the District of $2,548,291.90, and within three years it has been repaired at a cost of $809,860.09, and we have the authority of the engineer that it will require an outlay of 10 per cent. of this cost annually to keep it in repair. But this is not all of the reckless mismanagement of the commissioners as to these repairs. Not only is it true that several experts in this business of concreting have testified that work which the commissioners contracted to pay for in bonds at $1.40 a superficial yard could be done at from fifty to eighty-five cents in cash, with a good profit to the contractor, but it appears that these pet contractors and favorites of the defunct board of public works were to receive in cash the cost of the necessary personal labor in removing the old wooden blocks and preparing the dilapidated concretes for the resurface, with 20 per cent. added for profit.

Inasmuch as Congress had made a cash appropriation for doing this repair-work, included in the appropriation of $1,060,000, it is hard to assign any sufficient reason why this part of this contract was not paid out of the District treasury, especially as the treasurer reports as having on hand of this appropriation the sum of $885,000 on the 1st of last December. This sum to be paid these favored contractors in cash amounted to $69,862.55; but how was it paid? Not out of the cash in the Treasury, appropriated by Congress, but by selling the 3.65 bonds at a discount of 30 per cent., or at seventy cents on the dollar. Yes, sir, these vigilant guardians of the interests of District, with an overflowing treasury, with money given to them by Congress for the express purpose of making these repairs, in order to raise money to discharge the cash part of an iniquitous and illegal contract, discount the 3.65 bonds of the District at the rate of seventy cents on the dollar!

But this is not the only operation of the kind in which they are shown to have been engaged. They advertised for sewer-pipe to be paid for in cash, and bids for the various kinds of pipe to be used by contractors were accepted, and among these bids twelve-inch pipe was to be furnished at thirty-two cents. These contracts were subsequently canceled, and the sewer-pipe contractors were paid in 3.65 bonds, and it appears from the evidence before us that 89,809 feet of twelve-inch pipe was paid for in bonds, costing $50,303.04, whereas the cost of twelve-inch pipe at the price at which it was agreed to be furnished (thirty-two cents) would have been $28,728.88, making a difference in favor of cash on this item of twelve-inch pipe of $21,574.16, and in all the sewer-pipe purchased of $36,036.90.

If there were no question as to the power of these commissioners thus to use the bonds of the District, if they had been vested with unlimited discretion to increase the debt of the District, they should be made accountable on their bonds for this improvident, wasteful, and shameful use of the 3.65 bonds. What would be the judgment of any court which should find a trustee of an estate thus wasting the assets intrusted to his charge? What defense can be made for a guardian of an estate who, with a large bank account belonging to his ward, should thus misuse the securities of his ward in the payment of the ordinary current expenses of his ward? And shall these commissioners be held to a less rigid accountability, when they have obligated themselves to a faithful discharge of their duties? In fact, their prosecution on their bonds is but a corollary to the action of the Senate and the House in the passage of the joint resolution of the 14th of March last. One of the series of resolutions put into it in the Senate made it a penal offense for any officer hereafter to increase the debt of the District, and no one understood better than these commissioners that it was intended as a rebuke to them for their illegal increase of this debt during the last year. It said in language too plain to be misinterpreted that "We cannot punish you for what you have done, but for the future be warned that if you are guilty of this offense again we will send you to the penitentiary." Is this House prepared to go back upon this action of both Houses of Congress?

It is said in justification or apology for this large outlay in the repairs of the streets last year that it was found that the sum appropriated for that purpose by Congress was wholly insufficient, and it became necessary that they should fall back upon the issue of bonds, which it seems was only limited by the discretion of the commissioners and the board of audit.

On the 18th of February a little upward of $100,000 in cash was estimated to be sufficient to do this repair-work, but in three months thereafter it was discovered that the pavements and carriage-ways, both concrete and wood, were going to pieces so rapidly, and disintegrating and decomposing so fast, that the most active measures and the most liberal expenditures were absolutely essential to the preservation of the health of the people and the repair of these pavements. For the first time it was then discovered that they had the power to do this repair-work and pay for it in bonds, and not in cash. The condition of the pavements and not the act of Congress now became the chart of their powers. But what a telling commentary is here presented as to the value of these pavements and the work done on them, for which the District has paid the sum of over $800,000! The larger portion of these pavements, both wood and concrete, were laid down in 1872 and 1873, and within three years, we are told, such was their ruinous, decayed, and dilapidated condition that it was absolutely necessary to expend one-third of their original cost in repairing these worthless pavements. And now, after the expenditure of $800,000, under the influence of the first rays of a summer's sun, many of them are giving unmistakable indications of absolute worthlessness, and they are fast reaching the consistency of baker's dough or glazier's putty. Conceding that they had the power thus to add to the debt of the District, can there be any doubt that such a large outlay in renewing these worthless pavements was a reckless waste of the credit and resources of the District? Does any one believe that these streets were in any worse condition than many other streets which they did not repair? And is it possible that they could not have served the purpose of carriage-ways until the meeting of Congress? No, Mr. Speaker, all the circumstances attending this repair-work and its payment in bonds show that it was a shameless job put up in the interest of the contractors and their friends, without the semblance of law to support it, or any immediate necessity for its execution, and with the almost absolute certainty that within three years at furthest they will need another heavy expenditure to save them from total destruction.

The enormous debt of this District, now but little short of one-fourth of the entire assessed value of all its real property, not alone concerns the people of the District, but comes home to every taxpayer of the Union. The funded debt of the District bearing interest is composed of—

The old funded debt, (December, 1875)	$8,441,113 43
The 3.65 debt	13,743,250 00
Total	22,184,363 43
On which the annual interest is	1,129,628 00

To this must be added the unfunded and floating debt in the shape of—

Certificates of the board of audit not converted into bonds	$758,238 53
Measurements certified by engineer	297,235 74
Estimates of work done and not certified by engineer	121,535 15
Total	1,177,009 42

Which last sums would have been converted into 3.65 bonds but for the passage of the joint resolution of March 14, 1875.

In addition to this sum of ascertained indebtedness, amounting to $23,301,372.85, should be included damages for injuries done to real estate by the unauthorized contracts of the commissioners in changing the grades of the streets and other claims for which provision must be made and to ascertain which a bill has already passed this House on the recommendation of the District Committee. What will be the sum of these claims I have no means of ascertaining, nor have I included in this estimate of indebtedness the sum of $1,165,250, being the balance of 8 per cent. certificates commonly called greenbacks, which will be provided for out of the special improvement fund if this fund is collected and paid in. It will thus be seen that with the present funded debt, the unfunded but ascertained debt, and the probable amount of claims yet to be allowed, the District debt will not fall much if any short of $24,000,000, to be borne by a population not so large as that of many of the congressional districts represented on this floor, and with no more taxable wealth.

It is a vain and idle hope that this District can provide for the payment of this debt. It will be an insupportable burden to defray the ordinary expenses of a municipal government and to pay the interest on the funded debt. It is believed that the valuation of the real estate of the District is much beyond its cash value, and when it is remembered that the real estate of the District is chargeable or has paid one-third of the cost of the improvements that have been made within the last five years, it becomes simply impossible for the people of this District to pay the interest on this debt and provide for the ultimate payment of the principal. Congress has in the last few years appropriated $10,859,600 for the general purposes of the District, exclusive of appropriations for public buildings, the asylums, and other Government property, the Botanic Garden, and the grounds attached to these buildings and grounds; and the startling fact confronts us, that in this District of the ninety millions dollars' of real estate, at least one-fifth of it is now held by the District government and the banks as purchasers under sales for the non-payment of general and special taxes. Another sale of lands, delinquent in the non-payment of taxes, has lately been advertised, covering twenty-seven pages of the National Republican newspaper, and unless some relief is afforded to these people very soon the larger part of the real property of the District will pass into the ownership of the District government and the banks. This failure in the payment of the taxes levied to carry on the government of the District affords conclusive proof that the individual indebtedness is pressing upon the people with equal weight with the public debt, and when it is known that a very large proportion of the wood and concrete pavements laid down within the last four years will necessarily have to be renewed within a very short time, thus entailing additional taxation, it will soon be a question with many property-owners whether it will not be wiser to abandon their property to the District government than to retain it with its incumbrances.

Mr. Speaker, I have brought these facts to the attention of the House in order that they may understand that this District debt concerns our constituents no less than the people of this District, and that they may fully appreciate the gross wrong that has been done to the tax-payers of the country and of this District by the commissioners in needlessly and illegally adding to the volume of that debt. In the report of the majority of the committee this illegal and unauthorized addition to the debt is put down at $3,091,046.13—I believe it is, in fact, in the neighborhood of four millions and a half—and that the entire 3.65 debt ought not to have exceeded $10,500,000. This would be allowing three millions and a half for the completion of the unfinished contracts of the board of public works, and is in excess of the estimate of the joint committee by the sum of $2,175,000. In fact, no such sum as three and one-half millions was spent in the completion of these unfinished contracts of the board of public works.

It is worthy of remark that in all the eight classes of indebtedness, excluding the fourth, the aggregate estimate, made by the board of audit December, 1874, was less by $114,000 than the amount audited and certified in the seven other classes; nor did their estimate differ very materially from the estimate of the joint committee of the last Congress; but it was in the fourth class, embracing claims for completing unfinished contracts, as well as extension and repair work, that the actual amount of certificates audited exceeded fourfold the estimate of the joint committee and is three times greater than the estimated amount of indebtedness in that class according to the report of the board of audit of December, 1874.

If these commissioners had not been controlled by some malign influence, if they had not been seduced by some spirit of evil or yielded to the dominion and authority of bad and unscrupulous men, why did they not cease to increase the debt of this District when they saw they were so far exceeding the calculations and estimates of the committee of the last Congress? How was it possible for sane men to conceive that they were carrying out the will of Congress by expending seven millions when the framers of the law by which it was expended only intended they should expend a million and a quarter? How does it happen that they never thought of taking the opinion of the Attorney-General as to their power to make new contracts for new work and pay therefor in 3.65 bonds, or as to that construction of the contracts of the board of public works which enabled them to put three quarters of a million of dollars in the pockets of two of the pets of the deposed board of public works without competition and at ruinous prices to the District? How can they explain the extraordinary fact that after Congress made them an appropriation for repairing the wood and concrete pavements up to the 30th of this month they failed to use the money so appropriated, and expended eight times the sum asked for and appropriated in the bonds of the District for the same purpose without authority and without law? What apology can be found for their adopting in 1875 a system of awarding contracts which they had repudiated in 1874, and which had been condemned by the report of the joint committee of the last Congress? How will they justify themselves before the country for obtaining an appropriation from Congress for over a million of dollars for the general purposes of the District, and with this sum of money to their credit and unexpended make a contract to be paid in cash, and in order to raise this cash sell the bonds of the District at a shave of seventy cents on the dollar?

Mr. Speaker, such acts of illegality and unfaithfulness in the exercise of the authority conferred upon these officers by Congress can neither be explained, excused, or justified, and it seems to be about time that Congress shall do something to vindicate the authority of the laws of the land on the officials of this District government. It is not denied that much of the debt authorized to be funded in 3.65 bonds by the act of June 20, 1874, was incurred in defiance of law and against the clear and explicit intention of the law-making power. The joint committee of Congress, composed of men of both parties, so reported unanimously. But the parties thus guilty of usurpation of authority and violation of the law were permitted to escape almost without a censure or a reprimand. The men who had brought the District to the verge of bankruptcy were driven from place, and the exclusive authority of the District was transferred to the present incumbents under such limitations and restrictions as absolutely stripped them of power to add a dollar to the debt of the District. No one doubts but that such was the intention of Congress, and I maintain that no man can come to any other conclusion from reading the act of June, 1874, to say nothing of the circumstances surrounding its passage. But strange to say, these commissioners were seized with an insane impulse to disregard the law which gave them being, and have construed that law as if it gave them unlimited power to increase the debt of this District, so that increase was for the purpose of improving the streets and sidewalks and otherwise beautifying this capital. Instead of the 3.65 bond being confined to liquidate and fund indebtedness existing on their advent to power, it has been construed practically to pay for work authorized by them and in execution of contracts that never had any existence until signed and sealed by them. By this false and unreasonable construction of the law they have added to the debt of this District from three to five millions of dollars; and the question arises whether this House will pass this matter by with a mere reprimand or censure of these officers.

It is not simply for a misconstruction of the law that I insist these officers should be turned over to the courts. Their offense is not merely that they have misconstrued the law, but that by their misconstruction they have wasted the resources of the District. And in this respect, under the terms of the bonds which they executed, they do not differ from other trustees. In fact, they were not only executive officers, but they were assignees in bankruptcy of this debt-burdened District. The guardian who should sell the securities of his ward at a heavy discount to pay an obligation of his ward when he had plenty of cash on hand belonging to his ward would be held responsible for waste of the estate. He must construe the law applicable to his duties at his peril, and if by his misconstruction of his duties he injures the estate of his ward, he must be held responsible. So in this case, these officers have not only violated the law, especially when they contracted to pay for the repair-work of last year in 3.65 bonds, but by giving the work to favorites it cost one-third more than it was worth, and instead of paying for the cash part of the contracts with money asked for and appropriated for that purpose, and which they had unexpended in the Treasury, they caused to be issued the bonds of the District and sold them at their market value in order to raise the cash with which to comply with their illegal contract. If this is not such wrong-doing and waste of the resources of the District as constitute a breach of their bond, I can conceive of no state of facts short of absolute proof of corruption that would make them amenable on their official bonds. And if there is any place in the United States where public officers should be held to a strict and rigid accountability, it is in this District. I do not believe that if these commissioners had been required to exercise similar functions outside of this District, and free from the powerful and controlling influences surrounding them here, that they would ever have departed so far from the path which the law prescribed for them.

The population of this District differs in many respects from that of any other in the Union. Without commerce, trade, or manufactures, with scores of bold, unscrupulous adventurers ready to engage in any raid upon the national or District treasury that promises success, and with but a comparatively small proportion of its people who are not directly or indirectly dependent upon the Government for the means of living, there is of necessity a powerful interest here in behalf of lavish expenditures and liberal disbursements of public money. Official delinquency that opens the doors of the Treasury, or that promises to improve the city and beautify the capital of the nation at the expense of others, if not openly approved, is silently connived at. It was the pressure of such a public opinion, encouraged and directed by the man who organized corruption in this District as never before—who when rejected by the Senate for a place on this commission never abandoned his purpose to control it in his interest and that of the cormorant crew that follow his lead and obey his orders, to which the executive officers of this District in an evil hour yielded. It would not surprise me to learn that he dictated the appointment of a part of this commission of which the Senate refused to consent that he should be one. Nor need the public be surprised to learn that there has been a continual conflict in this commission between those who yielded willingly and those who resisted this malign influence.

But be this as it may, we cannot fail to comprehend the magnitude and extent of the influence brought to bear upon these commissioners by the head of the Washington ring, occupying the relation of a confidential friend of the President and of his late private secretary. That they have disregarded the plain provisions of law and added to the burdens of the people of this District unnecessarily and without justification or excuse is beyond question; and if we would vindicate the law and require implicit obedience to its commands in this District as elsewhere, these commissioners should be required to answer for their delinquencies before the courts of the country, and the Attorney-General will fail, in my judgment, in the discharge of his duty if he neglects to institute legal proceedings against each of the commissioners for a breach of the condition of their several bonds.

Protection to American Citizens Abroad—Germans and Irish—Parties and Platforms.

SPEECH OF HON. SAMUEL S. COX,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

July 15, 1876,

On the bill (H. R. No. 2245) to carry into execution the provisions of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution concerning citizenship and to define certain rights of citizens of the United States in foreign countries and certain duties of diplomatic and consular officers, and for other purposes.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, platforms are proverbially unreliable. When parties go before the country on great issues, it is pleasant to find them agreeing on certain points. When such points involve the sacred rights of citizenship, so prized since the proud Roman epigram, Civis Romanus sum, and so often fought for between nations of modern times, citizenship then becomes an exultation worthy of national anthems. The platforms of the republican and democratic parties read much alike on this high theme. I place them side by side:

Republican Cincinnati platform.

It is the imperative duty of the Government to modify existing treaties with European governments, that the same protection shall be afforded to the adopted American citizen that is given to the native born, and that all necessary laws should be passed to protect immigrants in the absence of power in the States for that purpose.

Democratic Saint Louis platform.

Reform is necessary to correct the omissions of a republican Congress and the errors of our treaties and our diplomacy, which have stripped our fellow-citizens of foreign birth and kindred race recrossing the Atlantic of the shield of American citizenship and have exposed our brethren of the Pacific coast to the incursions of a race not sprung from the same great parent stock, and, in fact, now by law denied citizenship through naturalization as being neither accustomed to the traditions of a progressive civilization nor exercised in liberty under equal laws. We denounce the policy which thus discards the liberty-loving German and tolerates the revival of the cooly trade in Mongolian women, imported for immoral purposes, and Mongolian men hired to perform servile labor contracts.

CHINESE QUESTION.

It is not my purpose to discuss the Chinese question. It affects as yet only the Pacific coast; but it is in no sense the question of healthful and vigorating immigration, such as has made America great. The 150,000 Chinese are not assimilated and cannot be assimilated with our people. They are a menace to our industry and a drain upon our resources. Besides, they are a peril as foul as leprosy. They are and ever will be an alien element.

Eliminating, then, the reference to the Mongolian, who is by his habits and his industry driving the Pacific coast with its advancing civilization almost to despair, let us examine the practice of the two parties in reference to this question.

MODIFICATION OF TREATIES.

This republican platform has the effrontery to call for a modification of existing treaties with foreign governments. Why? In order that the same protection shall be afforded to the adopted citizen that is given to the native born; that all necessary laws should be passed to protect emigrants in the absence of power in the States for that purpose!

Never in the history of political parties was there so gross an insult to ordinary intelligence as this platform. This I will proceed to show. What treaties are referred to in it? Is it the treaty with Great Britain or the treaty with the German Confederation? If it is the treaty with Great Britain, the credit, if any, confessedly does not belong to the present administration; and if it did, that treaty needs no modification unless republican zealots desire to make it conform to the outrageous treaty made by George Bancroft with the German Emperor in 1868. The British treaty was celebrated in the administration of Andrew Johnson. Then our Secretary of State instructed Reverdy Johnson, our minister to England, on the 23d of September, 1868, to place this matter of protection or allegiance above all others in importance. He ordered it to be considered before any other diplomatic question. The San Juan boundary and the Alabama claims questions, then pending, were to be held in abeyance until "the naturalization question should be satisfactorily settled by treaty or by law of Parliament." The American principle, once advocated by Cass, Marcy, and other democratic statesmen, was then and thus laid down by the administration of Johnson:

The principles to be settled are, that it is the right of every human being who is neither convicted nor accused of crime to renounce his home and native allegiance and seek a new home and transfer his allegiance to any other nation that he may choose; and that, having made and perfected his choice in good faith, and still adhering to it in good faith, he shall be entitled from his new sovereign to the same protection, under the law of nations, that that sovereign lawfully extends to his native subjects or citizens.

Our minister to England followed these instructions, and the result appears in the first article of the protocol, which is as follows:

Such citizens as aforesaid, of the United States, who have become, or shall become, and are naturalized according to law within the British dominions as British subjects, shall, subject to the provisions of articles 2 and 4, be held by the United States to be, in all respects and for all purposes, British subjects, and shall be treated as such by the United States. Reciprocally such British subjects as aforesaid who have become, or shall become, and are naturalized according to law within the United States of America as citizens thereof, shall, subject to the provisions of articles 2 and 4, be held by Great Britain to be, in all respects and for all purposes, American citizens, and shall be treated as such by Great Britain.

Mr. Johnson subsequently, in reviewing the negotiations he had conducted in London, thus disposes of the matter of naturalization:

The English doctrine is so wholly unfounded in reason that his lordship did not hesitate to abandon it. Growing out of a feudal policy, it is unsuited to the rights of a free people. It assumes that allegiance is due to the soil upon which a man is born. It makes him therefore a political serf, and denies to him the power to change for the better his condition. No free people can consent to such a doctrine, and notwithstanding the uniform decisions of Her Majesty's courts, hoary with age, and never for a moment questioned by any judicial decision, even up to the moment when our protocol was signed, it fell at once before the light of British and American freedom.

To Andrew Johnson and Reverdy Johnson is due the merit which belongs to this recognition of the protection which our Government owes to a citizen who has fixed his fortune with us and contributed to the development of our greatness. They held aloft the idea that he should not against his will, forfeit the protection of our Government; so that this treaty, which is a triumph of democratic policy, needs no "modification" and is its own best encomium. Does the republican platform propose to modify it?

GERMAN TREATY.

Mr. Speaker, I presume the republican platform which I have quoted did not contemplate this treaty. Perhaps it referred to the very extraordinary treaty of Bancroft made under the republican administration of General Grant. By that treaty the doctrine that a naturalized citizen is entitled under the law of nations to the same protection that a native subject is, was shamelessly abandoned. A German naturalized citizen is thereby remanded to the authority of his fatherland if he should return there and remain beyond a period of two years. This treaty expires next year; but every moment that it remains it is a national disparagement and disgrace. Under its provisions already a German-American citizen, Steinkauler, has been placed in the Prussian army and deprived of our protection.

Not once nor twice, but thrice, have the President and his Secretary of State asked Congress for legislation to carry out this un-American treaty. The bill now before the House, to which I am speaking, is one of this character. It is almost a copy of the bill of Hon. E. R. Hoar of the last two Congresses. That bill I have had the pleasure and the honor thus far to assist in defeating. Whenever it is called up in this House it will be promptly tabled. Of that I am assured. It should be called a bill to "denaturalize" our citizens, to "discourage" immigration. The distinguished editor of the Illinois Staats-Zeitung wrote to me in April, 1874, and thus describes a similar bill and pictures some of its results:

Upon the subject of the denaturalization bill which, in your speech of April 22, you have opposed, I have written quite a lengthy letter to Mr. Orth, of Indiana, and I wish you would read that letter if Mr. Orth should not have destroyed it. There are a few points in it which, in my opinion, have not yet been as thoroughly ventilated as they should be. One is that, by the Bancroft treaties, a naturalized citizen residing in his native country two years may be considered as having relinquished his American citizenship. When this treaty was before the then North German Diet, Bismarck stated expressly that the German government did not intend to make use of this provision except in such cases where mala fide emigration (for the purpose of evading military service) was clearly proven. But by the present bill the United States would actually cast out of their citizenship all naturalized citizens who should reside two years in their native country, thus out-Bismarcking Bismarck considerably.

The other point is that in regard to alien women marrying American citizens and thereby becoming American citizens themselves except as to the country of their birth. That provision, in spite of all Mr. HOAR says in its defense, is a brutal and stupid outrage upon all marriage legislation of all civilized countries. According to it, if my wife, after having become the mother of half a dozen native Americans, should, as a widow, live ("continue to live") with her relations in Germany, she would lose her American citizenship after having lost her German one by marrying me; would, in fact, be an outcast.

The title of the bill should read: "A bill to declare all naturalized citizens citizens on sufferance, to make them hate the United States as their stepmother country, and to repudiate the pledges given by the Republic to her naturalized citizens."

Yours, respectfully,

HERMANN RASTER.

Since the treaty expires on the 19th of November, 1878, it may not be necessary to carry out the very tardy and dishonest suggestion of the republican platform to "modify" it for the protection of adopted American citizens. But, in the language of the democratic platform, "reform is necessary to correct these errors which have stripped our fellow-citizens of foreign birth of the shield of American citizenship." The advent of a democratic administration will allow no diplomacy which thus discards the liberty-loving German from partnership in our franchises and prosperities. We can illy afford to pursue any policy which would close our ports to emigration from an empire which has 43,000,000 of thrifty people.

I have already, Mr. Speaker, on the 22d of April last, given my reasons against the attempt to make laws here to execute this un-American policy and treaty; but the importance of the question in connection with our presidential campaign and the platforms of our parties constrain me as the representative of a district containing a large majority of people, foreign-born or of foreign descent, and including some 30,000 German people, to add other suggestions against this proposed legislation.

THE ORIGIN OF THIS PROSCRIPTIVE, ANTI-GERMAN LEGISLATION.

What is the source of this proscriptive legislation against our naturalization? It began with our Executive, his Secretary of State, and Mr. Bancroft, minister to Berlin.

The President of the United States in his last annual message to Congress speaks of persons "who, if they have remained in this country long enough to entitle them to be naturalized, have generally not much overpassed that period, and have returned to the country of their origin, where they reside, avoiding all duties to the United States by their absence, and claiming to be exempt from all duties to the country of their nativity and of their residence by reason of their alleged naturalization."

FEUDAL AND "FEDERAL" DOCTRINES.

The doctrine underlying this paragraph of the message is abhorrent to every thinking man of republican feelings. It is essentially the old feudal doctrine of a government represented in the person of the monarch having all the rights, and the subject being the bounden servant, on whom are heaped all the duties. It is essentially the old feudal doctrine that no subject can go from the country where he is without the consent of his master, the government. It is essentially the old feudal doctrine that man is created solely to pay taxes and carry the lance or musket in the service of his owner, the government. It should bring the blush of shame to the face of every true American to hear the President of the Republic in this centennial year discussing the question of citizenship from the stand-point of an absolute king. Nay, the relations of the citizen of the United States, whether native or naturalized, to the Government of his country are of a wholly different character than what the President seems to assume. The Government of this country is in the people thereof, under the Constitution, and every citizen, at home and abroad, is an integral part of that Government. The President of the United States, the heads of the various Departments, the Senate, the House of Representatives, are only the servants of the people to execute their will. No citizen of the United States owes any higher duty to the Government than he owes to himself. He is personally a part of that Government; even the man who defrauds the revenue only defrauds himself and his fellow-citizens in the end. It is logically said in political economy that the wealth of a nation is composed of the wealth of individuals. Fully to the same extent does republican government rest upon the republican spirit of the citizens who compose, maintain, and direct it, and who really constitute the Government by sending us here to take care of—what? Of the rights of the Government as a distinct, separate entity? No; but of the rights and interests of the people, of the aggregate of those who enjoy the proud name of citizens of the United States, wherever they may be on the face of the earth.

OUR CITIZENS ABROAD AND THEIR RELATION.

An alien, becoming a citizen of this Republic according to its laws and by the adjudgment of a court of competent jurisdiction, does not by going abroad, no matter where, avoid any duties to the United States. He may not pay taxes nor serve in the Army; but there are millions upon millions in the country who pay no taxes nor enter the Army, some not even in the militia; yet they are good, faithful citizens. Their will must find expression here. But the men who, on being naturalized, return to their original home, claiming to be American citizens under the protection of the American Republic—and it is this class about which so much clamor has been raised—may be divided into two categories: one honestly attached to republican principles, the other not, but seeking fraudulently the cover of American citizenship to escape some hardships in their native country. As to the latter class, there is a plain legal course open. Any person claiming the protection of American diplomatic or consular representatives as a naturalized citizen must, as a universal rule, exhibit an exemplified copy of the decree of the court adjudging him a citizen, under the signature and seal of the clerk or prothonotary. If the document be fraudulent on its face or circumstances indicate that fraud had been committed in obtaining it, information to the State Department should at once set in motion the United States attorney for the district where the decree was procured to apply to the same court to have it canceled. The rules of practice, as every lawyer knows, authorize every court to make the required orders for the service of motion-papers and for taking proof. A single case of the rescission of a decree of naturalization obtained by fraud, either absolute or proven such by subsequent circumstances, would suffice to relieve our representatives abroad of all further trouble.

But those who become bona fide citizens, who as the act of 1802 requires, "absolutely and entirely renounce and abjure allegiance and fidelity to every foreign prince, potentate, state, or sovereignty whatever, and particularly, by name, the prince, potentate, state, or sovereignty whereof he was before a citizen or subject," and who also makes oath that he is "attached to the principles of the Constitution of the United States and well disposed to the good order and happiness of the same"—when such a naturalized citizen goes abroad, even to the country of his birth, we should look upon him as a missionary of republicanism. To the return of thousands of just such men and their more or less protracted residence at the home of their youth, proclaiming themselves in all places and at all times as citizens of this Republic, and in their own persons bearing testimony to the ennobling influences of the democratic system—to such men and to their missionary labors we owe many millions of our most thrifty population. Besides, do we not owe them a large share of our miraculous growth? They serve their adopted country well, far better than those who, after accumulating wealth here, go abroad, resume their first allegiance, and become the lick-spittles of aristocracy, or those who born here, and having wealth, go abroad to show everything else but American manners and principles, and who deride and defame this country beyond measure.

But the naturalized citizen who proves his attachment and fidelity to the United States not only by taking the oath in good faith, but by holding his citizenship dear while abroad, is doing, instead of avoiding, his full duty to the United States, and such men should and must be protected at all hazards.

THE AMERICAN DOCTRINE.

In this respect the course of the State Department has been distinguished by too much anxiety for technicalities. I disclaim all design of being invidious or personal in this remark; but the fact is, nevertheless, that those in authority allowed themselves to be overmuch beclouded by the old English common law on the question; what Vattel said, and Puffendorf, and Grotius, and other European writers on international law, and what the obiter dicta had been in some of our courts. Never for a moment was the thought, entertained of late, that as the American Revolution upset all the old European notions of government, so did it also, in its successful course, establish a new American common law regarding allegiance, expatriation, and naturalization. The United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and the Austro-Hungarian Empire have recognized substantially the American doctrine enunciated by General Cass; and if we only persist, all the nations on the globe will do it also. The German Empire is striving hard to prevent it, and the treaty of 1868 was but a means to that end. If fears that by obeying the treaty of 1828, insuring freedom of residence and security and protection to all American citizens alike, the missionary labors of Americans of German birth would draw hither too many emigrants from that country. A friend has shown me a letter from Bremen, dated December 20 last, which says that peremptory orders are said to have been issued by the minister of commerce at Berlin to all the local agents of transatlantic steamship companies in Germany, that they must, under penalty of fine and imprisonment, give no information about America to any inquirer, but confine themselves to give only the price of passage, names of vessels, and dates of departure. From this, if true, it would seem that America is a forbidden theme, and that even to talk about us in the United States is a punishable offense in Germany. All the greater, therefore, is the reason why we should retaliate by insisting upon the full observance of the treaty of 1828, and demanding that a native German, legally naturalized here by a court of competent jurisdiction, returning to Germany, returns as an American citizen and in no other character, and remains such until he shall have voluntarily assumed a new allegiance. This is the American common law, and should be resolutely maintained not only in respect to Germany, but all nations of Europe. England and Austria have virtually adopted it, and other governments will follow in time. America was the first to proclaim the principle that free ships make free goods, and by the treaty of Paris of 1856 all Europe accepted it. So will the American doctrine of allegiance, expatriation, and naturalization be accepted if the representatives of the American people are faithful to their duty. Then we shall see free American colonies springing up everywhere and dotting every country on the face of the globe, reverencing the flag that shields and protects them, and bearing witness to the world in a thousand tongues, that to be an American is to be truly a free man!

There is, however, one fundamental objection to the principle which underlies this bill and the argument in its favor. The United States have neither the right nor the power to prescribe where any of their citizens shall reside. If the free movement of the citizen to go where he listed can be restricted in one case it may be restricted in all, and he would then hold his citizenship and his personal liberty and independence at the mere pleasure or caprice of a government that would cease to be republican. It would be to resuscitate the old feudal doctrine of the subject bound to the service of his master, the king; precisely what the German government claims and what the United States have so long and so strenuously resisted.

STEINKAULER CASE.

The report upon which this bill is predicated, in its opening paragraphs, says that "the natural right of emigration affirmed by that treaty, with all the consequences of acknowledging that right, have been fully recognized," and toward the close it is again said that "this treaty recognizes the full right of a German subject to renounce his allegiance to the land of his birth, and through our naturalization laws to acquire a new nationality in the United States." This is true, but only in a very qualified sense, as has been seen in the case of young Steinkauler, whose birth on American soil as the son of an American citizen did not save him from being held as a German subject liable to military duty in spite of the protest of his father, who claimed for him protection by right of his American citizenship. This recognition on the part of Germany of the natural right of emigration and expatriation resolves itself into this: As long as a native German, naturalized in the United States, remains away from his native land and beyond the power of its authorities, he is looked upon as an American citizen, and his nationality and protection graciously surrendered to the United States; but the moment he touches German soil his original character revives, and thereafter he holds his naturalized citizenship dependent on the good-will of the German government. That, in a general way, is the kind of recognition which this treaty has secured from Germany for the principle which America has so long maintained, and for which recognition we are requested to be so thankful.

PRACTICAL WORKING OF THE GERMAN TREATY.

A few words as to the practical working of the treaty in relation to the thousands of German-Americans who annually visit their old country for weeks or months and return to the United States without being molested. In his letter to the State Department of June 30, 1874, Mr. Bancroft states their number at "from 10,000 to 15,000" who "come yearly to their mother country now, without suffering the least anxiety, where before many of them, in order to see their friends, were obliged to remain on the other side of the frontier or come into Germany stealthily, running the risk of arrest every hour." This may be so; but if it proves anything, it only shows that the German or rather the Prussian government has not lived up to its obligations under the treaty of 1828, which insured protection and security to all American citizens sojourning in Prussian dominions, and made no distinction as to the country of their nativity.

I am aware, Mr. Speaker, that international law does not relieve an emigrant from the consequences of an offense committed in the land of his birth prior to emigration, when he returns there, after being naturalized in another country; and I know, also, that under Prussian law since 1814, and re-enacted in the penal codes of 1842 and 1851, emigration without permission of the government was an offense punishable with fine and imprisonment, and subjecting the emigrant to military service at whatever age he may have returned. If the United States are prepared to accept this doctrine of Prussia as valid, then the treaty of 1868 may be defended as a slight concession. But I claim that this country has emancipated itself from this rule of feudalism, and has announced and should maintain the truly American principle of international law as to the indefeasible right of emigration and expatriation. That doctrine is, no man can be bound in any service to a government whose citizen or subject he has ceased to be by voluntary naturalization elsewhere. It is this principle that the treaty of 1868 offends against, out of undue deference to the penal code of Prussia. It is therefore wrong. It is an attempt to assimilate the relations subsisting between the free American citizen and his self-chosen government to those of the Prussian subject to his inherited and anointed king. In this respect the treaty is essentially un-American, un-republican, and contrary to the principles that should guide the intercourse of our people with foreign nations.

OUR EARLY POLICY ON IMMIGRATION.

The importance of a national and just policy of protection to our citizens abroad needs no extended remark. It has been the true policy of the Government always from the beginning to encourage immigration. Indeed, before we were independent States, it was a complaint against the British king that he discouraged immigra on hither. It was a capital grievance against King George, formu ted in the indictment of the great Declaration.

After the Revolution, and when parties were forming, the hated alien law was a result of the crystallization. The Federal party was its champion; the democratic party was its opponent. It extended the time of naturalization, and would have continued the proscriptive policy of King George, against which we contended.

In the various questions connecting itself with the war of 1812, and since and down to the Koszta case, the democracy defied foreign aggression upon this subject. Our flag was held as a cover and our land an asylum from the persecutions and tyranny of the Old World. The millions who have come to us from Ireland and Germany, as well as from other foreign countries, bringing with them their muscle, mind, and means, and declaring their intention to cast their lot and that of their children with us, made it imperative that a system should be instituted having for its basis the recognition of the changes and chances upon our earth by locomotion. Men will come and go. Wars and taxes will be levied. They drive from the roof-tree the children of every clime. It has been fixed as a rule of democratic action that no backward step should be taken to lessen the name of the American citizen in the world, and no policy started to render less attractive the forces which draw the men of other lands to ours.

RELIGIOUS BIGOTRY.

Besides this question of proscription, which broke out in Know-Nothing times, is now as then gradually associating itself with sectarian matters and all the bitter fruits of such policies. The message of the President of the United States at the beginning of this Congress, the amendment of the present Senator from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE,] now in the Judiciary Committee, and the reference in the republican platform as well as in the letter of acceptance of Governor Hayes, all point with no unmistakable index to a sinister sentiment of religious bigotry. It becomes liberal men to watch it heedfully. It is no unmeaning hint that a so-called religious paper gives, when it says that the struggle next fall is of great and far-reaching importance, because the Roman Catholics will be on the one side and all the Protestants worthy of the name on the other. We know what it means when it denounces our Irish and German citizens, and thus lashes passion into fury:

Had the hordes of priest-ridden Irish Roman Catholics and atheistical Germans which have since invaded the land come a century sooner, a stable republic would have been no more likely here than in Mexico; and the question arises now, How much strain can the good element in our nation bear?

If these intimations from the political Pharisees have any significance they point to a coarse, emotional, vindictive campaign which would not only attack religionists of every sect who do not agree with the writers, but would raise a barrier against that thorough unity of sections, religions, and races which is the pride, strength, and glory of our institutions.

A BLOW AT IMMIGRATION.

Even yet, when the best body and mind of Ireland has been mingled with that of our own country, and when the Irishman competes with the German in filling up the vast spaces which our territory allows for accession by immigration, it is no mere guess to say that a system of proscription, a system which would discard naturalization, strikes at one-half of our 45,000,000 of people who are either by foreign descent or home adoption imbound with our Republic. But it does more, it strikes at the grand future which is in store for us, by which we will be enabled to fill up our immense area of land with useful, industrious, patriotic men.

When our nation began its first century it had but a population of 2,750,000. Its area has been extended from 800,000 miles to 3,603,844 square miles. Annexation has quadrupled our area since the Revolution. But with all our purchases of Florida, Louisiana, New Mexico, California, and Alaska we gained fewer than 150,000 inhabitants, while the acquisition of Texas and Oregon merely restored to citizenship those who had emigated from the United States. In more senses than one, therefore, should we rely upon immigration to develop the vast resources, mineral, agricultural, and manufacturing, which tend to make a country great and prosperous.

What a commentary, therefore, in this view is the false platform and narrow policy of the anti-naturalization and anti-immigration party.

Since our nation began, frequent efforts have been made by parties, to impede naturalization and to detract from the value of citizenship when acquired.

OBSTRUCTIONS TO NATURALIZATION.

Is it not fresh in our recollection that a recent republican Congress endeavored to administer upon the estate of its Federal predecessor by enactments which obstructed naturalization? A bill was introduced from the Judiciary Committee which took away from State courts the power to naturalize and vested it in United States courts. It provided that applicants must first file an application with the clerk of the court which should state full particulars of birth, parentage, residence, arrival in the country, &c., and give the names of two citizens who knew him personally, and after four years of subsequent continuous residence in the United States, six months of it in the State and thirty days in the parish where he claims residence, he might be admitted to naturalization upon proof of all the facts, moral character, &c., by two witnesses.

Had this bill become a law, the naturalization of foreign-born citizens would have ceased for four years at least. Even those who had made their first declarations under existing laws would have to begin anew under this law, which was framed on purpose to obstruct naturalization in every way possible. Applicants would have had so far to go to get naturalized, not to mention the expense of taking witnessess with them and the delay and difficulty, that very few would ever have attempted it.

This scheme was not based upon any principle of right, justice, or public welfare, but solely upon base partisan considerations. It aroused the indignation and excited the execrations of every man possessed of any regard for common honesty and common decency. It was defeated by democratic vigilance.

Easy, indeed, was it to permit the millions of African ex-slaves to citizenship and suffrage. Easy, indeed, to hurry them to the polls, however illy prepared for intelligent suffrage, even though born in Canada or the West Indies; but it was another question when the Irishman or German came forward to attest his fidelity to our Government and to renounce his allegiance to Queen and Kaiser.

The bill referred to as urged upon a recent Congress was intended to interrupt naturalization for four years and six months. It was intended as a penalty on certain citizens for adhering to democracy. By restricting the authority to grant naturalization to the Federal courts, that measure denied the right to all except those who happen to reside in the vicinity of the places where such courts are held, and denies it even to a majority of those who have that advantage. There are in the United States nine circuit judges; and generally one district judge in each State, but in some of the larger States two. So small a number of judges could not attend to all the cases of naturalization. Naturalizations could be granted only in term time, and the person must apply at least twenty days before the beginning of the term or session of the court. In every case evidence must be heard; one or more witnesses must be brought by the applicant and examined by the court in relation to the facts and circumstances. And any person who chooses to come into the court and oppose the application is entitled to offer counter-testimony and produce a set of witnesses and have them examined. Each individual case may thus be prolonged into a trial; and, with so small a number of courts, not a hundredth part of the applications could be heard and decided.

OTHER OBSTRUCTIONS TO NATURALIZATION.

Other obstructions were contrived by the authors of this bill. The distance which applicants would be compelled to go to attend the court, and the expenses and delay incident to the proceedings, would discourage the greater number. If the applicants should be numerous and the court full with other business the applicant might be detained for weeks with his witnesses; his bills growing, his wages stopped at home, his witnesses accumulating demands against him for their loss of time. He would have to take his turn like grangers at a grist-mill among the applicants. Under such a law naturalization would be so expensive, dilatory, and vexatious that few would apply for it; and this was the object for which this bill was concocted.

A DEMAND FOR AMERICAN RIGHTS.

Our contiguity to Cuba and the conflicts in that unhappy isle have contributed to many urgent diplomatic efforts to guard our interests and protect our citizens. Out of these efforts came the law of July 27, 1868. (Revised Statutes, page 352.) It is quoted as a sample of that policy which was the result of democratic success against Federal sycophancy to foreign powers:

SEC. 2000. All naturalized citizens of the United States, while in foreign countries, are entitled to and shall receive from this Government the same protection of persons and property which is accorded to native-born citizens.

SEC. 2001. Whenever it is made known to the President that any citizen of the United States has been unjustly deprived of his liberty by or under the authority of any foreign government, it shall be the duty of the President forthwith to demand of that government the reasons of such imprisonment; and if it appears to be wrongful and in violation of the rights of American citizenship, the President shall forthwith demand the release of such citizen; and if the release so demanded is unreasonably delayed or refused, the President shall use such means, not amounting to acts of war, as he may think necessary and proper to obtain or effectuate the release; and all the facts and proceedings relative thereto shall as soon as practicable be communicated by the President to Congress.

It will thus be seen that by this act of Congress the Executive is bound to "demand," not request, not beg, not sue for clemency or relief, but "demand" the liberty of the American citizen wrongfully detained abroad by foreign power. Without this "demand" the polite phrases of diplomacy are of no avail. They are evidences of puerility and weakness, unbecoming a nation of a hundred years and utterly inconsequential for practical remedy of the wrong.

Without going further into the history of this and kindred legislation, it may be well to make a comparison of the practice of the two parties in this matter.

AN IRISH CASE—CONDON.

I refer now to an Irish case. What is its history? Who is Edward O'M. Condon? The history of the Condon case is the history of a mockery of justice. England herself has admitted that the trial was a farce. The Department at Washington know this fact to be true, and although he is an American citizen, he has been allowed to sink under British imprisonment.

What is the history of this case? In September, 1867, Captains Kelley and Desey, two Irish-American officers, were charged with being in a Fenian conspiracy. They were arrested for favoring an independent, republican Ireland. While being conveyed from Manchester to the county jail at Salford they were set at liberty by those who sympathized with them. A policeman was killed by the accidental discharge of a pistol. Irishmen at that time were arrested everywhere in England on suspicion. Among the men seized for the rescue of Kelley and Desey, was Condon, who was then visiting friends in Manchester, along with four others, Allen, Larkin, Maguire, and O'Brien. He was tried before two unscrupulous judges specially selected to convict. On the 2d of November, 1867, they were all convicted and condemned to death. After conviction the members of the press memorialized the home secretary of England for the enlargement of Maguire. There were not five separate verdicts but one indivisible verdict, which was clearly illegal. To hang anybody on such a verdict was murder. Maguire received his liberation, and thus the verdict, which was indivisible, was proclaimed a nullity.

CONDON—A VICTIM.

British opinion at that time demanded some one should be a victim, and although there were many points made it was decided to make an example. True Mr. Secretary Seward interfered to save Condon from the gallows, though the other three, Allen, Larkin, and O'Brien, were hanged.

The testimony taken in the case shows that Condon was convicted on the testimony of five among a batch of ten proven perjurers. They were of the most disreputable character. It is unnecessary to go into the testimony in detail. The State Department neglected his case and American citizenship seemed to be worth nothing. The case concerns the dignity and honor of this country. It concerns as much the personal liberty of Condon. It is not a question of British clemency, but of American national courage. Not hanged, only imprisoned, sinking under the effect of wounds from a cowardly mob and a worse police, with blood flowing from his lacerations under his manacles, he remains still in British custody, a conspicuous example of foreign perjury, and for his imprisonment no adequate reparation can ever be made. What a commentary on the republican platform at Cincinnati!

It is shrewdly suspected that Condon is kept imprisoned by way of example, and not because he is guilty of any crime against the British law. The last message that we hear from him in his imprisonment speaks a spirit like that of Emmett: "They may kill my body, but they cannot kill the aspirations of my heart or alter its love of country."

Looked upon in his prison as an Irish rebel, he has every indignity heaped upon him. We are told that he has one consolation. It is a copy of Virgil's Æneid. He may solace himself with the classics and with other books which his friends have asked for him, but there will be no solace to the American people, whose soldier-citizen he was, until he has a full and ample justification and release.

MOCKERY OF ENGLISH JUSTICE.

The question may be asked, wherein consists the mockery of this trial? The answer is that perjury was committed, that prejudice existed at the time in England against all Fenians, and that the trial had a political aspect. And was not this trial and its results more than a mockery, since this scholar, gentleman, and soldier has been held in durance with the lowest class of English criminals? The political animus will appear when it is stated that Maguire, a British soldier, was released entirely, while three of his associates in a joint indictment were hung, and the anomalous condition of the case, owing to the combination of all the defendants in the one indictment and trial, makes it clear that it was neither technically legal nor morally just.

Condon was a soldier in the Federal Army. He served four years gallantly. After the surrender of General Lee he went to Cincinnati. There he remained until 1867. He was sent over to Ireland on business relative to an estate left by his father. He was in Manchester to see his relatives, and most unfortunately he was there at the time of the rescue of Kelley and Desey and the murder of Sergeant Brett. The trial was as hurried as it was cruel and unfair. Little or no opportunity was given for defense, and shortly after conviction sentence of death was passed. It is the old sad satiric story of the Irish felon before the proverbial select British jury.

It is not denied that he was a citizen of the United States, for was he not duly naturalized and in every respect entitled to as much consideration under the law of 1868, and our treaty with Great Britain and the law of nations, as a native-born citizen? Who dare make the distinction? Ah! had he been an American native born, or even a British subject and convicted in a British or United States court, would he have been subjected to the injustice of such a trial, the perjury of such a cloud of testifying frauds, and to the degradation and incarceration which he has suffered? In such a case would nine gloomy years have passed over his head, silvering his hair daily for the grave, without some honest effort for his release by a patriotic administration? In his case what a Mephistophelian sneer curls upon the lip of Disraeli, as he regards our prayer and imbecility before British power and arrogance.

AMERICAN INTEREST IN IRISH PRISONERS.

It is not a new thing for the American Government to take an interest in Irish prisoners. Every generous heart will recognize the fact that Ireland and her destiny cannot be dissociated from her warm-hearted sons in this country. From the time of Cromwell and his attempt to root out the Celtic-Irish with his penalties, down to the present time, millions of Irishmen have had their property confiscated, their families scattered, and their bodies killed to gratify some unreasoning and bigoted vengeance on the part of her Anglo-Saxon enemies and rulers. But her spirit has never been conquered. It is impossible for a true Irishman, unless you rend his heart and paralyze his brain, not to love Ireland.

The people of my district, Mr. Speaker, a large portion of whom are descended of those who emigrated thence, would find me derelict in my duty did I not sympathize with their sympathy. By cable and steamship and by the thousands of letters and messages of affection, by whole clans and counties, they are interweaving the island of Manhattan with the island of Ireland. This sympathy is quicker than the sub-ocean lightning. It is the instinct of son and daughter for mother and father. It has been enlarged, warmed, and fused into a heavenly radiance. Again and again, are the wrongs of Ireland spoken of most significantly in public meetings and at the domestic hearth.

The history of Ireland is not alone the history of her religious faith, but the history of political independence and civil freedom. Before the time of the Tudors, before the time when the King's writ ran beyond the pale about Dublin, down through harsh penal laws and ecclesiastical establishments, foreign to her best emotions about the seen and unseen world, through evictions, land laws, and trade exactions, she has been galled without cowardly wincing, but galled at times into courageous revolt.

ENGLISH TYRANNY OVER IRELAND.

The injustice of the English government toward Ireland blackens every page of English history. The refinement of legal dialectics and obsolete statutes have been called into being to crush the Mitchels, Meaghers, O'Briens, Stevenses, Mahoneys, Collinses, Rodgerses, McCaffertys, Mullinses, Rossas, Meaneys, Burkes, McClures, O'Connors, and the procession of scholars, soldiers, and patriots, who honor the land of Emmett, Grattan, and O'Connell. The ends of the earth have been used, oftentimes, but, thank God, often in vain, to colonize them in penal servitude. Not merely Mount Joy, Mill Bank, and Chatham prisons, but the far off South Sea lands under British dominion, have been used to break the spirit of Ireland. The scouring of penitentiary flag-stones, the picking of English oakum, and the worse humiliations branded upon Irish gentlemen and scholars in the living graves of English prisons have wakened a sympathy which the Irish heart will never willingly let die. Out of this sympathy, and not out of defiant breaches of international law, have come the petitions which the American Congress has frequently been called upon to consider on behalf of her citizens immured and transported by English power.

ACTION OF CONGRESS FOR IRISH PRISONERS.

On the 14th of December, 1869, Mr. Speaker, I offered a resolution in this House relating to the treatment of American citizens then held in prison under English authority, condemning the harsh usage of such prisoners and demanding immediate intervention for their amelioration or release. This was done at the instance of Mr. John Savage, one of Ireland's accomplished sons. On the 2d of February, 1870, the Committee on Foreign Affairs reported back the resolution and asked for information from the State Department. At that time I addressed this House, and begged them to give their moral if not their legislative sanction and emphasis to this most benevolent object. I called to the mind of members the protest of Gladstone against King Bomba in Naples, in 1851, and how he then demanded for the sake of humanity that the English Parliament and all classes of English society should be aroused for long-suffering and imprisoned young Italy. At that time I alleged what has since proven to be true: that political prisoners in England suffered from inadequate clothing and food and inattention of doctors. They were chained to hideous criminals, some foul and idiotic, others beastly and base; they were compelled to wear the clothing of criminals who had suffered from the most loathsome diseases, and, although they were men of delicate physique, were given tasks only fitted for muscular burglars and common convicts. This treatment was pursued for no other reason than that of humiliating the generous spirit of the Irish prisoners. Far worse was this treatment than that against which Gladstone protested in Naples.

This class of prisoners embraced American citizens by birth and adoption. These tortures drove the prisoners to imbecility, insanity, death, and yet we looked on them and their sad fate without the active intervention of our Government. This is another commentary on the Republican platform.

The law of 1868 was then existing. I quoted it then, as now. It was not heeded by the republican party or its organs. It is not heeded now. Some mitigation was made of the condition of these prisoners through the efforts of our minister, Mr. Reverdy Johnson, but as a general rule the Irish-American was left to his fate.

Then, sir, from all parts of the land came protests in favor of Captain O'Connor, Colonel Richard Burke, Colonel W. G. Halpin, O'Connell, McClure, and others, as this session they have come, for the hapless Condon. But all that could be done in their behalf, if indeed anything was done, was the sending of the silent prayer to the God of mercy to relieve from their horrible doom, those brave unfortunates, whose only crime, even as alleged by their enemies, was in loving their sad green isle, not wisely, but too well.

THE INDIAN EMPRESS AND IRISH AMNESTY.

When recently Mr. Disraeli, the premier of England, proposed to decorate the brow of Queen Victoria with an imperial crown, in which should sparkle all the jewels of her oriental satrapies, it was said that the occasion of such an enhancement of her realm and such a brilliant accession to her crown would be followed by an amnesty to Irish political prisoners. These hopes turned out to be a delusion if not a snare. The melancholy fact remains that nothing has been done to relieve these patriotic men from their dire condition. What a commentary, therefore, are these facts on the respective resolutions of the two parties upon this centennial year, regarding the protection of American citizens abroad? Fifteen years of republican rule and scarcely a note of patriotic defiance against British dictation.

No case ever attracted such universal sympathy as that of Condon. From every State, petitions and from almost every Legislature, resolutions came expressing desire for action for his release.

ACTION IN CONDON'S CASE.

I had the honor on the 9th of March, 1876, to present to this House a resolution based on the law hereinbefore recited. It was not a request for amnesty or clemency. It was a demand, or an inquiry for a demand, for instant release. That resolution reads thus:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be requested to inquire into the case of Edward O'M. Condon, alleged to be a citizen of the United States, who has undergone for nine years penal servitude in an English prison, and what efforts, if any, have been made by the Executive Department to secure his enlargement; and if no successful efforts have been made in that behalf, then that said committee examine and report whether or not the case comes under sections 2000 and 2001 of the Revised Statutes, which provide for the same protection of all naturalized citizens while in foreign countries as native-born citizens, and authorize the President to demand of any foreign government the reasons of such imprisonment and the release of the citizen.

It was sent to the Committee on Foreign Affairs with other resolutions on this subject. It was reported back, with some modifications. It went to the Senate. There it was weakened and emasculated, so as to make it read:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President be requested only to intercede with her Majesty, &c.

Finally it passed on the 7th of July. But mark its tame words

Whereas Edward O'M. Condon, a citizen of the United States, is now and has been for some time closely confined in prison under the sentence of a British court; and whereas an earnest and profound desire, evidenced by resolutions of State Legislatures and petitions numerously signed and addressed to Congress, is entertained by a large and respectable portion of the people of the United States that he should be speedily released: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to take such steps, as in his judgment, may tend to obtain the pardon or release of the said Edward O'M. Condon from imprisonment.

Thus Condon is still left to the tender mercies of republican diplomacy!

HOME RULE IN IRELAND.

Our sympathies belong to Ireland, for our revolution was hers. Ireland, too, had her revolution; but unsuccessful revolutions are called rebellions; but did she not contend, and does she not, through Isaac Butts, O'Connor Power, and others, to-day contend for the principle of her early day when Grattan thundered and Emmett died? Did she not contend, not alone in her own land, but here, and wherever the sword of Erin flashed, for the banner above all battle-flags: representation, and no taxation without it. Concord, Monmouth, Saratoga, Valley Forge, Yorktown, all testify of deeds done in liberty's name, but deeds done for man's capacity for home-rule. Jefferson taught the truth, which Irishmen loved to champion, that feudality in form or substance was tyranny; that absenteeism was robbery; that vassalage was cowardice, and independence courage; and that the fire and smoke of war are simple butchery unless beneath there is the pure molten white heat of patriotic devotion. Jealous of power, confiding in the people, and instinct with a love of country, he gave his theory and his conduct to the illustration of that heaven-imaged scroll of stars, moving in harmony about the central sun, the type of our stately cluster about the Union and its splendid ensign.

THE DEBT OF AMERICA TO IRELAND.

To Ireland, America is indebted as well for her prosperity in a great degree as for her early settlement. After the English revolution of 1688, when the barbarous Orange policy inaugurated by England drove men from their island home, a tide of emigration set in toward the American colonies. Irish trade and manufactures were destroyed and wars and penal laws drove Irishmen across the ocean. They filled our colonies with their emigrants. At least a million of the three million who inhabited the thirteen colonies at the beginning of the Revolution were Irish by birth or descent. They spread and multiplied in our land from the Potomac to the Ohio, from the Saco to the Juniata. They enlivened the land with their humorous spirit, their cheerful industry, and their alacrious belligerency. When independence came to be our only prospect, the first undaunted rebel was John Sullivan, who with his Celtic band marched upon the fortress of William and Mary, in New Hampshire, and captured it. This was the first blow of the Revolution. In May, 1775, the O'Briens, six in number, fought the first naval battle of the war, and won it. The names of gallant Irishmen shine like stars all through the murk of the Revolution. To recount them is to recount the stories of Monmouth, Saratoga, Bennington, Valley Forge, Stony Point, and Yorktown. Why, one of the charges against the Irish in England was that 16,000 of them fought on the side of America. This was one of the pretexts for refusing redress to the Catholics of Ireland. A steady influx of immigration since has filled our confines with 14,000,000 of Celtic blood. The names of Barry, Montgomery, Jasper, Warren, Clinton, Rutledge, Wayne, and Jackson but feebly portray the gorgeous galaxy of Irish patriots who gave to America their fervor and their fighting, their bravery and their blood.

CENTENNIAL HOPES.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, while we cannot but notice the growth of bigotry and proscription up to if not in this centennial year; while we cannot refrain from observing not merely an anti-Catholic but an anti-Hebraic and an anti-constitutional spirit of resistance to the religious and political freedom of this land radiating out of the Federal and into the State constitutions; while we know that, openly and in secret, narrow-minded men are banding and have banded together to turn back the tide of progress which has marked our country since our soul-liberty Constitution was born, still may we not look with hope, even if mixed with anxiety, into our future, trusting and believing in the better aspirations of our nature which have found expression in our centennial oratory and poetry, as the splendid confirmation of our Constitution. The key-note of these aspirations may be coldly expressed in the motto which I have prefixed to this speech—that naturalization is empire!

ASSIMILATION OF RACES IN AMERICA.

Another thing not less reasonable may be said, that the enormous emigration from Europe has not so tainted our political communities as to call for organized bigotry or retrograde politics; for is it not easily assimilated with our native stock? Is it now a strength and not a peril to the Republic? Are we compelled to stint our welcome to men of all lands? Shall we not still hail them and entreat them to share our liberties and prosperities? Whom have we not welcomed to our soil? The Irishman, the German, the Pole, and the Hungarian, and all the nations of the planet. Here they meet on equal terms. The reflux influence of our welcome is seen most in Ireland, for on the last Fourth of July was not our centennial celebrated in its capital? Does not our land still represent to the Irishman his ideal of freedom, and does not the voice of Dublin echo that of New York? One of our metropolitan orators, Dr. Storrs, held up the ægis of our Republic when he said that our policy could never insult other nations or oppress its citizens, and that some Captain Ingraham would always appear to lay his little sloop of war alongside the offending frigate with shotted guns and peremptory summons. And the gifted Evarts could not but notice the various roots and kindreds of the Old World which had settled and transfused in their cisatlantic home into harmonious fellowship in the sentiments, the interests, the affections which develop and sustain love of country in this land. He found the impulse and attractions which moved the emigrants to come hither to be public, elevated, moral, and religious, and that the search for civil and religious liberty had animated Puritan, Churchman, Presbyterian, Catholic, Quaker, Huguenot, Dutch, Waldenses, German, and Swede, and that these made up our colonial population. He further found that our experience and fortunes since then have done nothing to change but everything to confirm the views which brought them hither.

OUR MOSAIC.

Mr. Speaker, it is in this mosaic, made up of all races and nations, in which we find our growth, happiness, and unity. The streams of thought and feeling from the Old World have made us something more than a congeries of British colonies or a unity of selfish States. Our very motto, "From many, one," indicates the cause of our greatness as well as of our growth; it speaks of our varied vitality fused with united patriotism.

Our centennial poet in singing of the centennial day, its stately dawn, the triumphant noon, and the peace of the vesper skies, could not omit from his lofty verse the splendors of that land which welcomed cavalier, Huguenot, and Quaker, and which beckoned the children of the danger-girdled race of Holland to blend their thrift with that native to our soil. The cold processes of our imperial naturalization become eagle flights in the muse of our democratic republican laureate when he sings:

She took what she gave to man:
Justice, that knew no station,
Belief as soul decreed,
Free air for aspiration,
Free for independent deed!
She takes, but to give again,
As the sea returns the rivers in rain,
And gathers the chosen of her seed
From the hunted of every crown and creed.
Her Germany dwells by a gentler Rhine;
Her Ireland sees the old sunburst shine;
Her France pursues some dream divine;
Her Norway keeps his mountain pine;
Her Italy waits by the western brine;
And, broad-based under all,
Is planted England's oaken-hearted mood,
As rich in fortitude
As e'er went worldward from the island-wall!
Fused in her candid light,
To one strong race all races here unite;
Tongues melt in hers, hereditary foemen
Forget their sword and slogan, kith and clan:
'Twas glory once to be a Roman;
She makes it glory now to be a man!

But no one struck the harp and evoked richer strains of music at rhetoric than the gifted Irish orator Richard O'Gorman, of New York. His language cannot be paraphrased, it can only be quoted:

From the thirteen parent colonies thirty-eight great States and Territories have been born. At first a broad land of forest and prairie stretched far and wide, needing only the labor of man to render it fruitful. Men came; across the Atlantic, breasting its storms, sped mighty fleets, carrying hither brigades and divisions of the grand army of labor. On they came, in columns mightier than ever king led to battle, in columns millions strong, to conquer a continent, not to havoc and desolation, but to fertility, and wealth, and order, and happiness.

They came from field and forest in the noble German land; from where amid cornfield, and vineyard, and flowers, the lordly Rhine flows proudly toward the sea. From Ireland; from heath-covered hill and grassy valley; from where the giant cliffs stand as sentinels for Europe, meet the first shock of the Atlantic, and hurl back its surges broken and shattered in foam. From France and Switzerland, from Italy and Sweden, from all the winds of heaven, they came; and as their battle-line advanced, the desert fell back subdued, and in its stead sprang up corn and fruit, and the olive and the vine, and gardens that blossomed like the rose.

Of triumphs like these, who can estimate the value? The population of three millions a hundred years ago has risen to forty-five millions to-day. We have great cities, great manufactures, great commerce, great wealth, great luxury and splendor. Seventy-four thousand miles of railway conquer distance, and make all our citizens neighbors to one another. All these things are great and good, and can be turned to good. But they are not all. Whatever fate may befall this Republic, whatever vicissitudes or disasters may be before her, this praise, at least, can never be denied to her. This glory she has won forever, that for one hundred years she has been hospitable and generous; that she gave to the stranger a welcome; opened to him all the treasures of her liberty, gave him free scope for all his ability, a free career and fair play.

And this it is that most endears this Republic to other nations and has made fast friends for her in the homes of the peoples all over the earth. Not her riches, not her nuggets of gold, nor her mountains of silver, not her prodigies of mechanical skill, great and valuable though these things be. It is this that most of all makes her name beloved and honored: that she has been always broad and liberal in her sympathies; that she has given homes to the homeless, land to the landless; that she has secured for the greatest number of those who have dwelt on her wide domain a larger measure of liberty, and peace, and happiness, and for a greater length of time than has ever been enjoyed by any other people on this earth. For this reason the peoples all over the earth and through all time will call this Republic blessed.

It is not possible, Mr. Speaker, to roll back the shadow on the dial-plate of time. The sun will not stand still at human voice. This immigration from the Old World, with its thousand elevating and assimilating qualities, will go on. No Bancroft treaties ignoring the rights and principles of American citizenship, no indifference of a republican administration to our citizens abroad and in prison, no jealousy or hate of the principles of naturalization and religious liberty, which give our new Atlantis its imperial scepter, its prosperity, population, and glory, can stop that car of progress which it has ever been the privilege and fortune of the American democracy to impel and control. No sectarian bitterness or bigoted hate can turn away the people of this country from the belief in the principles of religious freedom fixed and eternized down in their organic laws.

The election in November will vindicate the large-minded and liberal policy of the democracy. It will inaugurate, as in 1787, for America in the next hundred years, a progress rivaling if not surpassing that of the past century. God grant that this may be the result; and God save the Republic!

The Hawaiian Treaty.

SPEECH OF HON. PHILIP F. THOMAS,

OF MARYLAND,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

May 8, 1876.

The House having under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 612) to carry into effect a convention between the United States of America and His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands, signed on the 30th day of January, 1875—

Mr. THOMAS said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I regret that it has not been in my power to concur with the majority of my colleagues of the Committee on Ways and Means in their report recommending to the favorable action of the House the bill now under consideration, designed to give effect to the treaty of reciprocity between the United States and the King of the Hawaiian Islands.

I have bestowed upon the subject all the reflection which its importance demands, and I propose now, in as brief a manner as possible, to state the reasons which have impelled me to dissent from the conclusions to which a majority of the committee have arrived.

Before proceeding to notice the commercial, financial, and political advantages which, in the opinion of the friends of the measure, are likely to accrue to the United States from its adoption, I shall pause to consider a proposition of a very grave character which, in the later stages of this debate, has been confidently asserted and pressed upon the attention of the House with all the apparent earnestness of sincere conviction, and which, if it finds any sanction whatever in the letter or spirit of the Federal Constitution, ought at once abruptly to terminate all further discussion upon the merits of the treaty before us.

That proposition imputes to the President and Senate, in the exercise of the treaty-making function with which the Constitution has invested them, absolute omnipotence over every other Department of the Government, and renders them, in that relation, the absorbents of many of the powers conferred by that instrument exclusively and alone on the Federal Congress.

It asserts that a treaty, when made by the President with the concurrence of two-thirds of the Senators present, and duly ratified and proclaimed, becomes, eo instanti, the supreme law of the land; supreme alike over the several States of the Union and over each and all of the co-ordinate Departments of the Government; that, as between the parties to the compact, it operates proprio vigore, a repeal of existing laws in conflict with or repugnant to its stipulations; that, so far as the contracting powers are concerned, it requires no legislative aid to impart vitality to its provisions; that the sole object of congressional legislation in aid of a treaty is to confer authority upon the domestic officers charged with the execution of the laws with which it conflicts, to give effect to its provisions, and that, when Congress engages in such legislation, it does so under a moral obligation which divests it of all legislative discretion and admits of no escape from the performance of an imperative and paramount constitutional duty. Such, Mr. Speaker, is the proposition, subversive, as in my opinion it is, alike of our Federal system and of public liberty, that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] has asserted and, in an elaborate and studied argument, endeavored to maintain as sanctioned by the Federal Constitution and by the practice of the Government during more than eighty years of its existence.

To prevent all misunderstanding, I will quote the proposition of the gentleman as he himself has stated it. He says:

This is my proposition: A treaty made by the President with the concurrence of two-thirds of the Senators present, under the authority of the Constitution, is the supreme law of the land, as obligatory upon Congress as it is upon the people.

And again:

In my opinion, when a treaty has been made under the authority of the Constitution, the legislative authority is bound to execute it. It is a moral obligation.

The treaty between the United States and the King of the Hawaiian Islands, to which the bill under consideration is intended to give effect, professes to be one of commercial reciprocity.

In consideration of rights and privileges therein conceded, the United States, as an equivalent therefor, agrees to admit certain enumerated articles, being the growth, manufacture, or produce of the Hawaiian Islands, into all their ports free of duty. The same articles which the treaty exempts from the payment of duties are, under existing laws, without exception, subject to duty when imported from foreign countries, and its provisions are therefore in direct conflict with existing revenue laws of the United States.

Under these circumstances, it is claimed that the treaty operates a repeal of those laws, or, what is the same thing, that the House of Representatives, in which alone revenue laws can originate, is morally and constitutionally bound, without the exercise of the discretion that pertains to all legislation, to repeal or so to modify them as to give full effect to the treaty, whether its provisions be wise or unwise, advantageous or injurious to the public interests.

On this question I take issue with the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS,] and shall endeavor to demonstrate that this monstrous and dangerous construction of the treaty-making power, though in the earlier history of the Government, on more than one occasion, advocated by public men of the federal party, is wholly unsanctioned by the Constitution, and has never, at any time, met with the approval of the House of Representatives. It rests for its support on two provisions of the Federal Constitution: first, that which confers on the President power to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur, and, secondly, that which declares all treaties made under the authority of the United States to be the supreme law of the land.

The language of article 2, section 2, of the Constitution, defining the powers of the President, is:

He shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur.

And it will be, in candor, conceded that this grant of power is, in its terms, unlimited and undefined, and seems to embrace all manner of treaties which the policy or interests of the United States might dictate in their intercourse with other nations.

In so far as the subject-matter of treaties is involved, it may, indeed, be admitted that the treaty-making power, in a constitutional sense, extends to and embraces all subjects of international compact not forbidden by the Constitution or destructive of the Government itself.

The Government of the United States is, however, one confessedly of limited powers, derived from a written Constitution, and distributed among three great departments—legislative, executive, and judicial—each, within its legitimate sphere, independent of the other and entitled to the exclusive exercise of the several powers delegated to it.

The legislative powers confided to Congress and the judicial powers conferred upon the courts, are as exclusively vested in each, as is the treaty-making power delegated to the President subject to the approval of the Senate; and in the event of a conflict of authority between either of these departments, such a construction must be given to the fundamental law as will secure to each the undisturbed possession of the several powers intrusted to it.

This sound rule of constitutional construction is clearly and forcibly stated by Justice Story in his Commentaries on the Constitution, and its application, in the present instance, will furnish a perfect solution of the question now under discussion. He says:

A power given by the Constitution cannot be construed to authorize a destruction of other powers given in the same instrument. It must be construed, therefore, in subordination to it, and cannot supersede or interfere with any other of its fundamental provisions. Each is equally obligatory and of paramount authority within its scope, and no one embraces the right to annihilate any other.

Under this rule of construction the general and undefined power of making treaties granted by the Constitution, is limited by positive constitutional prohibitions, or restrained by grants of power to other departments, while at the same time the scope of the treaty-making power may reman undiminished. Thus, by the seventh paragraph of section 9 of article 1 of the Constitution it is provided that—

No money shall be drawn from the Treasury, but in consequence of appropriations made by law.

And by article 1, section 1, it is declared that—

All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives.

The treaty-making power is an executive function, and is reposed in the hands of the President. The legislative authority is vested solely in Congress, and under the clause which prohibits the drawing of money from the Treasury except in consequence of an appropriation made by law, no money can be appropriated by any other authority than by that of an act of Congress. The prohibition, therefore, operates as a limitation upon the undefined power to make treaties, and controls, although it does not diminish it in its full constitutional extent.

The rule of construction laid down by Story leaves the treaty and law making departments of the Government in the full and harmonious possession of their respective constitutional powers, while the opposite doctrine, as contended for by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS,] strips the House of Representatives, in which alone bills for the appropriation of money can originate, of all participation in the appropriation of money under treaty stipulations, ignores its great conservative, constitutional function of originating money bills, and enables the President and Senate, two of the three law-making branches of the Government, under the guise of a treaty containing stipulations for the payment of money in the form of a subsidy or otherwise, and by the substitution of a foreign government in the place and stead of the House of Representatives, to appropriate the public treasure received from taxation of the people without limit in its purpose or amount.

Again, the general and undefined power of making treaties is, under the same rule of construction, checked and restrained by affirmative grants of power to other departments of the Government. Thus, in addition to the exclusive grant of legislative power, Congress is also empowered by article 8 of the Constitution to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises; to borrow money; to regulate commerce with foreign nations; to declare war; to raise and support armies, on condition that no appropriation of money shall be for a longer period than two years; and to provide and maintain a navy. That it is within the scope of the general treaty-making power to negotiate conventions with foreign nations, whereby commercial advantages not possessed by others may be conceded to them, is beyond all question. It is equally undeniable that treaties of alliance may be constitutionally made containing stipulations for subsidies in men and money; but if such treaties become to be the supreme law of the land and are obligatory upon the Government from the period of the exchange of ratifications, if no legislative aid is required to impart vitality to their provisions, or if Congress is deprived of all legislative discretion, and morally and constitutionally bound to enact laws to give them effect, then it inevitably follows that the President and Senate, with the co-operation of any foreign government, under the form of a treaty may lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, regulate commerce, declare war and appropriate money to prosecute it for a longer term than two years, and provide and maintain a navy, and in short, usurp and consolidate in their own hands every power which the Constitution, for the maintenance of the rights of the States, for the protection of the people against oppression, and for the security and perpetuity of public liberty, has confided exclusively to Congress.

From the view I have thus taken I think it clear, Mr. Speaker, that the general and undefined authority to make treaties delegated by the constitutional provision to which I have referred, to the President, with the concurrence of two-thirds of the Senators present, is, under the rule of constitutional construction laid down by Justice Story, so limited by express constitutional prohibitions and checked by grants of exclusive powers of legislation to Congress, that a treaty which provides for the payment of money, or for the abrogation or modification of existing laws regulating commerce, or for subsidies of any sort in men or money, or is in any other manner in conflict with the powers granted to the legislative department, is not effective or obligatory upon the Government until it receives the sanction of Congress; a sanction which Congress has a right to withhold if the stipulations of the treaty are believed to be injurious to the public interests.

Nor, Mr. Speaker, does the doctrine contended for by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] find support or sanction in that other provision of the Federal Constitution which, as he says, declares a treaty to be the supreme law of the land, and which he deems to be entirely conclusive of the view which he has taken of the power in question. It is not the first time that that provision of the Constitution has been cited in support of the unlimited extent of the treaty-making power which, in this debate, has been claimed for it.

A recurrence to the language of that provision, and to the causes which led to its adoption, will serve to dispel all doubt as to the meaning of its framers and the extent of the power it was intended to confer; and it will be found that those who insist that it confers unlimited power have given to the article itself a too hasty and superficial perusal.

The Constitution does not declare that treaties alone shall be the supreme law of the land. The provision is found in the second paragraph of the sixth article of the Constitution, and is as follows:

> This Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding.

Surely, no one gifted with the most ordinary intelligence, will, after a critical reading of this clause, ascribe to it a meaning which would confer upon a treaty supremacy over both the Constitution and laws made pursuant thereto. Three things in the order in which they are named are declared to be supreme: First, the Constitution, because it is the fundamental law controlling all other laws; secondly, the laws of the United States made pursuant thereto, emanating under the Constitution from the law-making power; and thirdly and lastly, treaties, not from the period of the exchange of ratifications, but when made "under the authority of the United States," that is, if in conflict with legislative powers granted to Congress, from the time when the assent of Congress is given thereto. Over what, then, are these three things made supreme? Certainly not a treaty over either the Constitution or laws, for it is clearly subordinate to both; but the Constitution and laws made pursuant to it and treaties made under the authority of the United States are to be supreme over the Constitution and laws of the several States. Without such a declaration every one knows that the Constitution and laws enacted pursuant thereto, and treaties made under the authority of the United States, would be the supreme law of the land over the people of the United States; and in the absence of a substantial reason for such an express declaration, the wise men who were the architects of our system of government would be justly liable to the imputation of extreme folly. There was a reason for the declaration, and that reason shows over what the Constitution, laws, and treaties were intended to be supreme. The General Government sprang out of and superseded the government of the confederacy, which was a mere league or compact between the States, under which most of these sovereign powers were retained. Under the new form of government, many of these powers were by the Constitution delegated to the Federal Government, and it was, therefore, proper and necessary to declare not only that the Constitution, but the laws enacted pursuant thereto and treaties made under the authority of the United States, should be the supreme law of the land; not treaties supreme over laws or laws over treaties, but that, subordinate to the Constitution, both should be supreme over the constitutions and laws of the States; and hence the latter clause of the provision was inserted declaring that "the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding;" and thus a positive and necessary provision was made declaring, in case of a conflict between the Federal and State governments, which authority should be supreme.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] has insisted that a treaty ratified by the Senate and proclaimed by the President becomes from that moment the supreme law of the land, to which every department of the Government must yield absolute and implicit obedience. The Constitution contains no such provision; but it does provide that a treaty made "under the authority of the United States," that is, in subordination to the Constitution and laws of the United States, shall be supreme over the several States of the Union as well as over the people of the United States.

The true and sound construction of the extent of the treaty-making power as conferred by the Constitution is, that it embraces within its scope all subjects of compact between nations not forbidden by the Constitution; but, to use the language of Mr. Gallatin in the debate in the House in 1796 on the British treaty, commonly known as Jay's treaty:

> If a treaty embraces objects within the sphere of the general powers delegated to the Federal Government, but which have been exclusively and specially granted to a particular branch of government, say to the legislative department, such a treaty, though not unconstitutional, does not become the law of the land until it has obtained the sanction of that branch.

And this view of the extent of the treaty-making power was, in the same debate, fully sustained by Mr. Madison. The report of his remarks is as follows:

> He came next to the fifth construction, which left with the President and Senate the power of making treaties, but required at the same time the legislative sanction and co-operation in those cases where the Constitution had given express and specific power to the Legislature. It was to be presumed that in all such cases the Legislature would exercise its authority with discretion, allowing due weight to the reasons which led to the treaty and to the circumstances of the existence of the treaty. Still, however, this House in its legislative capacity must exercise its reason; it must deliberate, for deliberation is implied in legislation. If it must carry all treaties into effect, it would no longer exercise a legislative power; it would be the mere instrument of the will of another department and would have no will of its own. Where the Constitution contains a specific and peremptory injunction on Congress to do a particular act, Congress must of course do the act because the Constitution, which is paramount over all the departments, has expressly taken away the legislative discretion of Congress. The case is essentially different where the act of one department of government interferes with a power expressly vested in another, and nowhere expressly taken away. Here the latter power must be exercised according to its nature, and, if it be a legislative power, it must be exercised with that deliberation and discretion which are essential to the nature of legislative power.

Such are the opinions on this grave subject of two of the most eminent men of the country, the last of whom participated more largely in the formation of the Constitution than any other member of the convention by which it was framed, uttered on the floor of the House within a few years after the Government went into operation, and it will be seen that they are far from sustaining the opinion which the gentleman from Massachusetts has expressed as to the unlimited power of the President and Senate to make treaties. The opinions of Mr. Gallatin and Mr. Madison were embodied in a resolution which was concurred in by a majority of the members of the House of Representatives of the Fourth Congress, passed in March, 1796. The commercial treaty with Great Britain, negotiated in 1794 by Mr. Jay, contained stipulations which were repugnant to our revenue laws, and it was laid before Congress by President Washington, in order that the laws of the United States might be modified in conformity to it. The House of Representatives, holding that it was within its discretion to pass or reject a bill to give effect to the treaty, by resolution requested the President to lay before it a copy of the instructions to the minister who negotiated the treaty, together with the correspondence and other documents relative to it. The information asked for was refused by President Washington, upon the ground maintained by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS,] "that the power of making treaties is exclusively vested in the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur; and that every treaty so made and promulgated thenceforward becomes the supreme law of the land." In response to the President's message, the House, by a vote of 57 yeas to 35 nays, passed the following resolution, which fully vindicates the rule of constitutional construction for which I am contending:

Resolved, That, it being declared by the second section of the second article of that Constitution, the President shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur, the House of Representatives do not claim any agency in making treaties; but that where a treaty stipulates regulations on any of the subjects submitted by the Constitution to the power of Congress, it must depend for its execution as to such stipulations on a law or laws to be passed by Congress. And it is the constitutional right and duty of the House of Representatives in all such cases to deliberate on the expediency or inexpediency of carrying such treaty into effect and to determine and act thereon as in their judgment may be most conducive to the public good.

Every one who is at all familiar with the history of the country knows that the commercial treaty negotiated by Mr. Jay in 1794 with the King of Great Britain, known as the British treaty, was received by the people of this country with an amount of indignation which no treaty before or since that time has encountered, and such was the odium that attached to it that its negotiator was publicly burned in effigy within sight of his own home. When the treaty was submitted to the House of Representatives, to the end that it might originate and pass a law to give effect to such of its provisions as were deemed to require legislation, the House, by the resolution to which I have referred, called upon the President for such imformation as would enable it to consider the treaty upon its merits and, after a free and full exercise of its discretion, determine whether it was or was not entitled to legislative sanction, without which many of its provisions could have no effect. The President, as already stated, refused to communicate the desired information, for the reason that the treaty was the supreme law of the land, and that, therefore, Congress could exercise no discretion in the enactment of a law to give it effect, but was constitutionally bound, without discretion, to pass the required law.

Did the House of Representatives accept the opinion of the President as to its rights and duties in this grave emergency? The resolution had been passed after a debate which lasted, daily, for more than a month, involving the identical question now under consideration of the nature and extent of the treaty-making power, the federalists of the House taking the views of the President—General Washington—the democrats, or as they were then called, republicans, among whom were Madison and Gallatin and very many other distinguished statesmen of that day, advocating the opposite doctrine, and passing by a large majority, as a response to the President's refusal to furnish information, the resolution which I have quoted, disavowing all claim by the House to any agency in making treaties, but insisting that when a treaty contains stipulations, on any subject submitted by the Constitution to the power of Congress, it must depend for its execution as to such stipulations on a law or laws to be passed by Congress; and that, in all such cases, it was the constitutional right and duty of the House of Representatives to deliberate on the expediency or inexpediency of carrying such treaty into effect, and to determine and act thereon as in their judgment might be most conducive to the public good.

Nor did the House in its action stop at this point. It proceeded to deliberate on the expediency or inexpediency of carrying the treaty into effect; and after a further debate, which was protracted through another month, in which the merits of the treaty were fully discussed, it passed a resolution, by a close vote of 51 yeas to 48 nays, declaring it expedient to carry the treaty into effect. An analysis of the vote, to be found in the Annals of Congress, Fourth Congress, first session, 1795–'96, shows that the House exercised the discretion claimed for it in giving effect to the treaty. I quote from it as follows:

RECAPITULATION.

For declaring the treaty highly objectionable	48
Against this declaration	48
The Speaker decided in the negative.
For declaring the treaty objectionable	49
Against the declaration; some because they did not consider it objectionable; others because they feared making the declaration would be injurious; and others because so opposed to the treaty as to object to compromise	49
The Speaker decided in the negative.
For carrying into effect the treaty; some because a good one; others because best to execute it under existing circumstances	51
Against carrying it into effect, because bad in itself, and notwithstanding existing circumstances	48
Majority	3

It is useless to comment further upon the resolution of the House or its practical action thereon. Both show the opinion of the democratic statesmen of that day as to the nature and extent of the treaty-making power under the Constitution, and vindicate the constitutional construction for which I contend, against that entertained and advocated by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS.]

But the gentleman from Massachusetts has asserted that—

Although the discussion of the question involved has been since often renewed, the views of Washington as to the right of the House to call for information have never been re-asserted.

He further says:

It is conceded that the House has the right to inquire, if a treaty is made under the authority of the Constitution, whether or not it calls for legislation to execute its provisions. No treaty can be made which changes in any form the nature of the Government or annuls any of its provisions. We have therefore a right to call for any information that relates to it, in order that we may correctly understand its purpose and its results. But if it be within the purposes and made in pursuance of the Constitution, we are morally bound to execute it.

If the gentleman means, as he necessarily does, that the right of the House to call for information and to exercise discretion in matters of legislation to give effect to treaty stipulations, irrespective of its constitutionality, as asserted in the resolution of 1796, has never been re-asserted and re-affirmed, then I take issue with him on that point, and shall proceed to show that he is wholly mistaken. The treaty and conventions of 1803, for the acquisition of Louisiana, were negotiated under the administration of Mr. Jefferson, and provided, among other things, for the payment to France of a large sum of money. In his annual message of that year, Mr. Jefferson, referring to them and to their stipulations, said:

When these shall have received the constitutional sanction of the Senate, they will without delay be communicated to the Representatives for the exercise of their functions as to those conditions which are within the powers vested by the Constitution in Congress.

Upon the exchange of ratifications, President Jefferson, in a message to the Senate and House, communicated the treaty and conventions in the following language:

These, with the advice and consent of the Senate, having now been ratified, and my ratification exchanged for that of the First Consul of France in due form, they are communicated to you for consideration in your legislative capacity. You will observe that some important conditions cannot be carried into execution but with the aid of legislation, and that time presses a decision on them without delay.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] has referred to Mr. Jefferson as authority for the extraordinary opinions he holds in reference to the unlimited extent of the treaty-making power under the Federal Constitution. Had Mr. Jefferson been in accord with him when the messages to which I have referred were prepared, would he have written as he did in the first, that the treaties when sanctioned by the Senate "would be communicated to the Representatives for the exercise of their functions as to those conditions which are within the powers vested by the Constitution in Congress;" and, in the second, they are communicated to you "for consideration in your legislative capacity;" they contain "some important conditions which cannot be carried into execution but with the aid of the Legislature?" Or would he not rather have told Congress, and particularly the House of Representatives, that the "treaty and conventions are communicated in order that you may, without delay, and without the exercise of your usual discretion, proceed to enact laws to give them effect, as it is your moral and constitutional obligation to do?" If he coincided in opinion with the gentleman from Massachusetts on this subject, surely he would so have expressed himself in his messages.

And what did the House do upon the receipt of the President's message? President Jefferson had transmitted with his message every paper and all the information connected with the negotiation deemed necessary to enable Congress to judge and decide whether or not the treaties should be carried into effect. Mr. Griswold, of Connecticut, a federalist and a distinguished member of the House, moved a resolution, which was afterward modified to read as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before the House a copy of the treaty between the French republic and Spain of the 1st of October, 1800, together with a copy of any instrument in possession of the Executive showing that the Spanish government has ordered the province of Louisiana to be delivered to the commissary or other agent of the French government.

The treaty, a copy of which was asked for, was concluded at St. Ildefonso, the 1st of October, 1800, by which Spain ceded to France the province of Louisiana, which in 1803 was ceded by France to the Unitde States. The resolution, introduced by a federalist and supported by the federal party of the House, the same party that in 1796, with President Washington, denied the right of the House to call for information to enable it to judge whether or not effect should be given to the "British treaty," sought no information at all necessary for the solution of any question involving the constitutionality of the treaty and conventions. The constitutionality of a treaty, as of a law, can be determined only by an inspection of the instrument itself and a comparison of its contents with the provisions of the Constitution. The language of the resolution shows plainly its purpose and object. In the minds of the mover of the resolution and of those who supported it, doubts existed as to the title of France to the province of Louisiana. To solve these doubts and to obtain satisfactory evidence of a good title in France to the ceded territory, and thereby to enable the House to determine whether or not the treaty and conventions should be made effective by legislation, the resolution called for a copy of the treaty of cession and also of any instrument showing that the possession had passed to France.

That the resolution had reference purely to the title to the territory to be acquired, and not to the constitutionality of its acquisition, is manifest from the remarks of Mr. Griswold himself in support of its passage. Referring to the message of the President respecting the treaty and conventions concluded between the United States and the French government, he said:

He recommends to the immediate attention of Congress the passage of some temporary laws. This being the case, and the subject being about to be brought before the House, it became important that they should know distinctly what they had obtained by the treaty, and whether there were any territory belonging to the United States to take possession of, or any new subjects to govern. Inasmuch as if no new territory or subjects were acquired, it was perfectly idle to pass even temporary laws for the occupation of the one or the government of the other. He believed it would be admitted that by the express terms of the treaty the United States had neither acquired new territory nor new subjects.

The resolution was lost by a vote of 57 yeas to 59 nays, the democrats opposing it for the reason that the information asked for was wholly unnecessary to enable the House to act; but in the debate members of the majority re-asserted the principle established by the resolution of 1796 in regard to the British treaty, and recognized it as finally settled.

Among others, Mr. John Randolph, of Virginia, said:

There had been negotiated a convention between us and the French republic, stating in the most unequivocal terms that there does exist on her part a right to the country in question, which is supported by the strongest possible evidence, and pledging herself to put us in possession of that right so soon as we shall have performed those stipulations on our part in consideration of which France has conveyed to us her sovereignty over the country and people. From the nature of our Government, those stipulations can only be fulfilled by laws to the passing of which the Legislature alone is competent. And when these laws are about to be passed, endeavors are made to impede or frustrate the measure by setting on foot inquiries which mean nothing or are not connected with the subject, and this is done by those who have always contended that there was no discretion vested in this House by the Constitution as to carrying treaties into effect.

Mr R. begged the House not to impute to him any disposition to countenance this monstrous doctrine, whose advocates now found it so difficult to practice; on the contrary, he held in the highest veneration the principle established in the case of the British treaty and the men by whom it was established: that in all matters requiring legislative aid it was the right and duty of this House to deliberate, and upon such deliberation to afford or refuse that aid, as in their judgments the public good might require. And he held it to be equally the right of the House to demand such information from the Executive as to them appeared necessary to enable them to form a sound conclusion on subjects submitted by that department to their consideration.

And Mr. Nicholson, of Maryland, in the same debate, remarked, that he "was extremely glad to find that gentlemen on the other side of the House (the federal side) had at length abandoned the ground which they had taken some years ago. He was rejoiced that they were now willing to acknowledge, what they had heretofore strenuously denied, that the House of Representatives had a constitutional right, not only to call for papers, but to use their discretion in carrying any treaty into effect."

After a lengthy debate, in which the principle established in the case of the British treaty was re-asserted and re-affirmed, the House proceeded to enact laws to give effect to the Louisiana treaty and conventions which were afterward passed by the Senate. From the history of the debates and proceedings of the House of Representatives, as I have given them, in the cases of both the British and Louisiana treaties, it is manifest that the extraordinary doctrine contended for by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS,] that a call on the Executive for information can only be made where the constitutionality of a treaty is involved, but if the treaty be "within the purposes and made in pursuance of the Constitution we are morally bound to execute it," has no sanction whatever either in the practice of the House or in the opinions of a majority of its members from the beginning of the Government down to its action upon the Louisiana treaty of 1803.

Descending in the progress of time to a later period, with a view to test the soundness of the doctrine of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS,] as to the nature and extent of the treaty-making power and the moral and constitutional obligation on Congress to provide for the execution of treaty stipulations where legislative aid is necessary, I beg to call the attention of the House to the action of Congress upon the commercial treaty between the United States and Great Britain of the 3d of July, 1815. Ratifications of the treaty were exchanged on the 2d of December, 1815, and on the succeeding day it was communicated to both Houses of Congress by President Madison, recommending "such legislative provisions as the convention may call for on the part of the United States."

By existing laws of the United States, a higher rate of tonnage and impost duties was imposed upon British vessels, and merchandise imported in them, than on vessels and merchandise imported in vessels of the United States. The treaty, among other things, provided for the abrogation and equalization of these duties and imposts.

The Senate, consisting of a majority of federalists, originated and passed a bill declaring that all laws in conflict with this treaty should be held as null and void, upon the principle, as stated by Mr. James Barbour, of Virginia, a distinguished member of that body, "that the treaty, upon the exchange of its ratification, did, of itself, repeal any commercial regulation incompatible with its provisions existing in our municipal code."

The House of Representatives, composed of a majority of democrats, re-asserting the principle of the resolution of 1796 in the case of the British treaty of 1795, as to its rights and duties in the matter of treaty stipulations in conflict with its constitutional powers of legislation, without considering the Senate bill, passed a bill of its own to give effect to the treaty, which was subsequently rejected by a party vote of the Senate of 10 yeas to 21 nays.

Thereafter, the Senate bill was taken up in the House and amended by substituting for it the bill of the House, in which amendment the Senate refused to concur, and a committee of conference was appointed by each body.

The report of the House committee of conference shows most clearly the views, upon this most interesting and important question, of both branches of Congress, and the result of the conference fully sustains the principle for which I am contending.

The report was made by Mr. John Forsyth, of Georgia, one of the most distinguished of the public men and leading democrats of that day. I quote from it as follows:

Without entering upon an extensive inquiry in relation to the treaty-making power, the committee will venture to define, as accurately as they can, the real line which at present divides the contending parties. * * * They are persuaded that the House of Representatives does not assert the pretention that no treaty can be made without their assent; nor do they contend that in all cases legislative aid is indispensably necessary either to give validity to a treaty or to carry it into execution. * * * On the other hand, the committee are not less satisfied that it is by no means the intention of the Senate to assert the treaty-making power to be in all cases independent of the legislative authority. So far from it, that they are believed to acknowledge the necessity of legislative enactment to carry into execution all treaties which contain stipulations requiring, or which migh bind the nation to lay taxes, to raise armies, to support navies, to grant subsidies, to create States, or to cede territory; if, indeed, this power exists in the Government at all.

The conference ended in the passage of a law to give effect to the treaty in the following words:

That so much of an act as imposes a higher duty of tonnage, or of imposts on vessels and articles imported in vessels of Great Britain, than on vessels and articles imported in vessels of the United States, contrary to the provisions of the convention between the United States and his Britannic Majesty, the ratifications whereof were mutually exchanged the 22d day of December, 1815, be, from and after the date of the ratification of the said convention, and during the continuance thereof, deemed and taken to be of no force or effect.

The speeches of democratic members of the House in the progress of the debate upon the treaty, reflect clearly the sentiment of the party as to the extent of the treaty-making power as then advocated by the federalists, and now by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Among others, Mr. Forsyth remarked that—

In the long, animated, and lucid discussion of the treaty-making power in the year 1796, it was contended by the federal minority, first, that a treaty once ratified was binding on the nation, and that Congess was as much bound to pass the laws necessary to carry such treaty into effect as the President and courts were to execute its provisions; secondly, that if there was any discretion in Congress, it was limited to the special act required of them, to the propriety of making appropriations, of regulating duties, &c., and that they had no right to take into consideration, as a motive of dissent, other parts of the treaty which avowedly required no legislative sanction. The determination of the representatives of the people at that period—I mean the republican majority—was still more clearly contradictory to this new doctrine.

Sir, what an extraordinary spectacle our Government would exhibit to the world if these positions are true. To-day the President and Senate without our assistance can do nothing affecting the happiness or security of this people. In a matter highly interesting and important, deeply affecting the national interest, the national honor, the President and Senate, in their legislative capacity, are desirous a particular system should be adopted; this House refuses its concurrence, the system necessarily fails. To-morrow a constitutional juggle is played off, and the system is fixed eternally upon us.

A foreign government or Indian tribe makes a contract or treaty (the terms are convertible) with the President; he sends it by his Secretary to the Senate; the doors are closed; the Eleusinian mysteries are celebrated; and after the required sacrifices in the temple of secrecy, the contract is ushered into the world. To borrow the metaphorical language of the gentleman from Maryland, it starts into life the supreme law of the land; either establishing a new system obnoxious to and rejected by the representatives of the people, or overturning all the systems heretofore established with their concurrence. The Constitution of the United States, so much the object of our admiration and the praise of other nations, does not deserve the eulogiums bestowed upon it if such practices are consistent with its principles.

Another democratic member, Mr. Jackson, in an equally pointed manner remarked:

I say, sir, that the doctrines advocated do annihilate the legislative powers of Congress, and convert us into a mere registering body.

And again he said:

I admit we cannot have a treaty unless it is through the executive agency. What I contend for is that when the treaty embraces a subject requiring legislation, either by a promise to pay money or that a law shall cease to operate, in all cases Congress must act to render the treaty effectual; that to repeal a law is as much an act of legislation as to pass a law appropriating money or for raising taxes, &c.; and that you cannot legislate by treaty, because it is declared by the Constitution that all legislative powers therein granted shall be vested in Congress.

Such, Mr. Speaker, were the sentiments of the democratic party of this House in the Fourteenth Congress, and such were the arguments and illustrations of the evils resulting from the federal doctrine of the absolute omnipotence of the President and Senate in the exercise of the treaty-making power, which induced the Senate to recede from its bill declaring that the treaty of 1815 repealed and abrogated the revenue laws with which it conflicted, and to unite with the House in the passage of the law I have quoted in aid of the treaty.

Thus far, then, Mr. Speaker, it is apparent that the principle of the resolution of 1796 has been re-asserted and re-affirmed by the House of Representatives in the cases of the Louisiana treaty of 1803 and the British treaty of 1815, the only instances in which the subject had been submitted to its consideration; and it is equally apparent that the opposite doctrine, which, after a sleep which it was supposed knew no waking, has in this debate been revived by the gentleman from Massachusetts, derives no countenance whatever either from the practice of this House or from the principle on which such practice rested.

One more instance, Mr. Speaker, occurring at a much later period in the history of this Government, remains to be cited, from which it will appear not only that a limitation was put upon the treaty-making power far beyond that contained in the resolution of 1796, in the instance of the British treaty, but that, by necessary consequence, the principle announced in that resolution was fully vindicated and sustained. In 1844, under the administration of President Tyler, a commercial treaty was negotiated between the United States and Prussia and the other states of the Germanic Association of Customs and Commerce, by which, in exchange for concessions on our part, in relation to certain articles of export, the product of the skill and industry of those countries, reductions were to be made in duties on tobacco and other agricultural productions of the United States. This treaty was communicated to the Senate by President Tyler for its advice and consent, with the remark that—

Inasmuch as the provisions of the treaty come, to some extent, in conflict with existing laws, it is my intention, should it receive your approval and ratification, to communicate a copy of it to the House of Representatives, in order that that House may take such action upon it as it may deem necessary to give efficacy to its provisions.

The treaty was referred by the Senate to the Committee on Foreign Relations of that body, by which it was reported to the Senate and recommitted to the same committee. Subsequently that committee, through Mr. Choate, of Massachusetts, reported that the Senate ought not to advise and consent to the ratification of the treaty. The report proceeds to state the reasons for this recommendation, as follows:

In submitting this report the committee do not think it necessary to say anything on the general object sought to be accomplished by the convention, or on the details of the actual arrangement; nor to attempt to determine, by the weight and measure of the reciprocal concessions, which Government, if either, has the best of the transaction.

These subjects have not escaped their notice; but they propose to confine themselves to a very brief exhibition of another and single ground upon which, without reference to the particular merits of the treaty, they advise against its ratification.

The committee, then, are not prepared to sanction so large an innovation upon ancient and uniform practice in respect of the department of Government by which duties on imposts shall be imposed. The convention which has been submitted to the Senate changes duties which have been laid by law. It changes them either ex directo and by its own vigor, or it engages the faith of the nation and the faith of the Legislature, through which the nation acts, to make the change. In either aspect, it is the President and Senate who, by the instrumentality of negotiation, repeal or materially vary regulations of commerce and laws of revenue which Congress has ordained. More than this, the executive department, by the same instrumentality of negotiation, places it beyond the power of Congress to exceed the stipulated maximum of impost duties for at least three years, whatever exigency may intervene to require it.

In the judgment of the committee the Legislature is the department of Government by which commerce should be regulated and laws of revenue be passed. The Constitution in terms communicates the power to regulate commerce and to impose duties to that department. It communicates it, in terms, to no other. Without engaging at all in an examination of the extent, limits, and objects of the power to make treaties, the committee believe that the general rule of our system is, indisputably, that the control of trade and the function of taxing belong, without abridgment or participation, to Congress. They infer this from the language of the Constitution, from the nature and principles of our Government, from the theory of republican liberty itself, from the unvaried practice, evidencing the universal belief of all, in all periods, and of all parties and opinions. * * * If Congress thinks the proposed arrangement a beneficial one, it is quite easy to pass a law which shall impose the rates of duties contemplated by it, to take effect when satisfactory information is conveyed to the President that the stipulated equivalents are properly secured. Upon this single ground, then, the committee advise that the treaty be rejected.

And the treaty was rejected "upon this single ground," and a motion to lay it on the table prevailed by a vote of 26 yeas to 18 nays.

Could there, by any possibility, have been presented a more lucid, able, and unanswerable vindication of the absolute, unqualified, and exclusive constitutional power of Congress to legislate in all matters of commerce and taxation; or a more palpable negation of the illimitable authority of the President and Senate to make treaties in any respect repugnant to or in conflict with the powers delegated to the law-making department of the Government, to become the supreme law of the land from the period of the exchange of ratifications, without the consent of such department previously or subsequently obtained?

If, Mr. Speaker, further evidence were necessary to maintain the principle of the resolution of 1796, that, when a treaty stipulates regulations on any of the subjects submitted by the Constitution to the power of Congress, it must depend for its execution, as to such stipulations, on a law or laws to be passed by Congress, such evidence is furnished by the last paragraph of section 8 of article 1 of the Constitution, which contains an enumeration of the powers delegated to Congress, and confers on it the power "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States or in any department or officer thereof."

Doubtless, this very instance of treaty stipulations within the scope of the constitutional power of the President and Senate, but encroaching upon the legislative power of Congress, was in the minds of the members of the convention who framed the Constitution, and they saw that a treaty under such circumstances could not be effective without legislative aid; and hence the power was given to Congress to make all laws necessary for carrying into execution, among others, the treaty-making power vested in the President and Senate.

But the gentleman from Massachusetts, for the purpose of sustaining the doctrine for which he contends, has referred to the British constitution, under which the treaty-making power is vested in the king; and I understand him to insist that the power to make treaties in our Constitution is derived from that of Great Britain and is in consonance with it. To show in whom, under the English government, that power is vested, and its nature and extent, he quotes from Blackstone's Commentaries the following passage:

The sovereign power of making treaties is vested in the person of the king, and whatever contracts he engages in no other power in the kingdom can legally delay, resist, or annul.

He follows the quotation with the remark that—

That power did not exist in the Confederation, and to remedy that inherent and fatal defect in the Articles of Confederation, it was given in express terms to the President and Senate in the Constitution of the United States.

The provision of our Constitution in regard to the making of treaties may or may not have been modeled from the British constitution. That the two constitutions are identical in so far as the treaty-making power is concerned, I freely admit, and I assert that the Parliament of Great Britain, with the concurrence of the king and his ministers, has always claimed and exercised the right and duty of legislating in aid of treaties when requiring appropriations of money to carry them into effect or when in conflict with existing revenue laws.

In proof of this assertion I refer the gentleman from Massachusetts to the treaty of navigation and commerce between Great Britain and France, signed at Utrecht on the 11th of April, 1713. The eighth and ninth articles of that treaty encountered a storm of opposition from British merchants. The eighth article placed the subjects of each government on a footing with the most favored nations "in all countries and places subject to their power on each side, as to all duties, impositions, or customs whatsoever." The ninth article was as follows:

That within the space of two months after a law shall be made in Great Britain, whereby it shall be sufficiently provided that not more customs or duties be paid for goods and merchandise brought from France into Great Britain than what are payable for goods and merchandise of the like nature imported into Great Britain from any other country in Europe, and that all laws made in Great Britain since the year 1664 for prohibiting the importation of any goods or merchandise coming from France which were not prohibited from that time be repealed, the general tariff in France on the 18th of September, in the said year 1664, shall take place there again, and the duties payable in France by the subjects of Great Britain for goods imported and exported shall be paid according to the tenor of the tariff above mentioned, and shall not exceed the rule therein settled in the provinces whereof mention is there made.

This treaty was submitted by Queen Anne to the House of Commons for its action, and it may be seen by a reference to the third volume of Anderson's History of Commerce, pages 71, 72, what the action of the House was, and the reasons which controlled it. On page 271, after stating the points of controversy, he says:

This is, in brief, the sum of this mercantile controversy, which, when brought into Parliament, was so apparent that our trade to France had ever been a ruinous one, and that if, in consequence of accepting the said eighth and ninth articles, the British Parliament should consent to reduce the high duties and take off the prohibitions so prudently laid on French commodities, it would effectually ruin the very best branches of our commerce, and would thereby deprive many hundred thousand manufacturers of their subsistence, that, although a great majority of that House of Commons was in other respects closely attached to the ministry, the bill for agreeing to the purport of the said two articles was rejected by a majority of nine voices, after the most eminent merchants had been heard at the bar of the house, to the great joy of the whole trading part of the nation, and of all other impartial people.

Here is an instance which clearly shows that under the British constitution, treaties in contravention of existing commercial and revenue laws, required the sanction of Parliament to render them effective, and that in the exercise of its discretion Parliament refused its assent, whereby the treaty was rendered wholly inoperative.

Another instance of a like kind, though upon a close vote with a different result, occurred in the year 1739 in the case of the treaty between Spain and Great Britain, and again, as late as the year 1786, in the case of the treaty of commerce and navigation of the 26th of September of that year between His Britannic Majesty and the King of France, the provisions of which may be seen in Anderson's Commerce, volume 6, page 828. To the validity of all these commercial treaties the consent of Parliament was deemed necessary, and they were accordingly submitted to the House of Commons for their approval or dissent. For the same purpose, the treaty between Prussia and Great Britain toward the close of the last century was submitted by ministers, and amendments were offered to the bill giving it effect, which, had they been adopted, would have totally destroyed it; and the king, in his speech from the throne, referring to the American treaty of 1795, told the house that he would lay it before them that they might judge of the propriety of enacting the necessary laws to carry it into effect.

What, then, Mr. Speaker, becomes of the plenitude of the treaty-making power under the British constitution, asserted by the gentleman from Massachusetts, upon the authority of Blackstone, to reside solely in the king? The examples afforded by the action of the House of Commons upon the bills to give effect to the several treaties to which I have referred, furnish an unanswerable response to this question, and demonstrate that, as in our own Constitution, the treaty-making power vested in the President and Senate is limited and checked by the legislative powers delegated to Congress; so under the British constitution, in this respect the model of that of the United States, the same power reposed in the king is restricted by special legislative grants to Parliament, evidenced, as that constitution is unwritten, by immemorial usage.

The principle, then, of constitutional construction contended for by the gentleman from Massachusetts is not sustained by the British constitution or by parliamentary practice under it.

That the Supreme Court of the United States has repeatedly considered this question of the nature and extent of the treaty-making power, and as often affirmed the constitutional construction which I have endeavored to maintain, appears so fully from the array of authorities cited by my distinguished friend from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] and his lucid review of them, that further comment by me would be absolutely useless and vain.

I think it clearly follows, Mr. Speaker, from the rule of constitutional construction laid down by Justice Story and universally accepted by jurists and judicial tribunals in this country; from the unvarying practice of the House of Representatives from 1796 to 1816, and from the report and proceedings of the Senate in 1844 in the matter of the commercial treaty between the United States and Prussia and the other states of the Germanic Association of Customs and Commerce, as well as from the consistent practice of the House of Commons under the British constitution, which, so far as the power to make treaties is concerned, is claimed to be the prototype of our own, that the treaty-making power vested in the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, extends to and embraces all subjects of compact between nations not prohibited by the Constitution; that the House of Representatives have no agency whatever in making treaties; but that when a treaty stipulates regulations on any of the subjects submitted by the Constitution to the power of Congress, it must depend, for its execution as to such stipulations, on a law or laws to be passed by Congress; that it is the constitutional right and duty of the House of Representatives in all such cases to deliberate on the expediency or inexpediency of carrying such treaty into effect, and to determine and act thereon as, in their judgment, may be most conducive to the public good.

It is, then, sir, the constitutional right and duty of this House before passing into a law the bill now under consideration, to inquire into and deliberate upon the provisions of the treaty between the United States and the King of the Hawaiian Islands to which it is designed to give effect, and should it be found that any or all of its stipulations are inimical to the public interests, it will be equally its right and duty to reject the bill and thereby defeat the treaty.

I shall therefore proceed briefly to examine the merits of the treaty itself, with a view to determine at least what are my own duties as a member of the House in the passage or rejection of the bill.

As I before remarked, the treaty professes to be one of reciprocity, that is, of equality, conferring equal privileges and advantages on each of the high contracting parties to it or on their respective citizens and subjects.

To the formation of a correct opinion as to the reciprocal advantages that may result from the treaty, it may not be unprofitable to inquire into the relative condition of the two countries to be affected by it and into their territorial extent, population, and future prospects as nations.

The Hawaiian group consists of twelve islands, situated in the North Pacific Ocean, nearly equidistant from Central America, Mexico, California, Oregon, and Alaska on the one side, and Japan, China, and the Philippine Islands on the other. Of these twelve islands seven are inhabited, one uninhabited, and four are barren rocks, and all are about ten days' sail from the coast of California by steam.

The area of the group is about 3,840,000 acres, of which 392,000 are arable, 100,000 being sugar-cane land, 1,920,000 adapted to grazing, and 500,000 to the production of Manila hemp and bananas, leaving 1,020,000 acres totally unproductive.

There are twenty-six sugar plantations now cultivated, and their additional capacity will not exceed seventy-five more. The total sugar-producing capacity is estimated at 100,000,000 pounds, but their entire product has not exceeded 25,000,000 pounds and it is believed cannot exceed 50,000,000. I make the statement upon the authority of Nordhoff, a truthful and reliable historian of the islands.

The population, which, at the time of the discovery of the islands by Captain Cook, was estimated at 400,000 savages and cannibals, since civilized and Christianized, has suffered a decrease without a parallel in the decadence of any people, until, by the official census of 1872, it amounted to only 56,000 souls, of whom 49,044 were natives and 7,853 foreigners. Its ultimate extinction within a short period of time would seem to be fixed and inevitable. As to the prospect of supplying the islands by immigration with a population to fill the place of an extinct race, Nordhoff furnishes facts which conclusively show that that result cannot be accomplished. After showing in tabular form the decrease of the native population in five years to have been at the rate of 60 per cent., and remarking upon the very small increase by immigration, he says:

You will see that, while the Hawaiians have so rapidly decreased that all over the islands you notice in waste fields and desolate house places the marks of this loss, foreigners have not been attracted to fill up their places. And this in spite of the facts that the climate is mild and healthful, the price of living cheap, the government liberal, the taxes low, and life and property as secure as in any part of the world. One would think that a country which offers all these advantages must be a paradise for poor men, and I do not wonder that in the United States there is frequent talk of annexing the islands. But, in fact, they offer no advantages, aside from those I have named, to white settlers, and they have such serious natural disabilities as will always—or at least for the next two or three millions of years—repel our American people and all other white settlers. In the first place, there is very little of what we call agricultural land in the islands. They are only mountains rising from the sea, with extremely little alluvial bottom and that usually cut up by torrents and water washed into gulches, until it is difficult in many parts to find a fair field of over fifty acres.

Again he says:

For farming, in the American sense of the word, the islands are, as these facts show, entirely unfit. I asked again and again of residents this question: "Would you advise your friend in Massachusetts or Illinois, a farmer with two or three thousand dollars in money, to settle here?" and received invariably the answer, "No; it would be wrong to do so."

Such is a full and truthful history of the country and people who occupy it; a country limited in its extent to a few almost barren acres of land, situated in mid-ocean, with no soil, beyond a most limited area, suited to agricultural purposes; with a population rapidly decaying and soon to become extinct, and with no inducements to attract a more hardy and enterprising race to fill their places. Such, sir, is the country and such the people with whom these United States, this great nation, occupying a country of illimitable extent, stretching from the lakes to the Gulf and from ocean to ocean, of every variety of climate, soil, and production, rich in all the exhaustless resources that can be drawn from agriculture, manufactures, mining, and commerce in the hands of an enterprising people, numbering today over 40,000,000 of inhabitants, and capable of sustaining and destined to support a population of more than 300,000,000 of men, is said to have negotiated a treaty of reciprocity.

I ask, in all candor, if it is within the range of possibility, by treaty or by any other device, to establish commercial reciprocity between two such peoples?

However that may be, a reference to the trade between the United States and the Hawaiian Islands will demonstrate that the stipulated concessions on the part of Hawaii are, in no degree, equivalent to the considerations by which we obtain them.

By the first article of the treaty the United States agree to admit into their ports, free of duty, certain articles enumerated in a schedule, of which rice, sugar, sirups of sugar-cane, melado, and molasses form the principal articles of export from the islands. In consideration of this concession, the United States obtain the privilege of exporting to the islands, free of duty, certain enumerated articles of her own produce, growth, or manufacture, some of which are produced in the islands and therefore are not wanted there, while others are now admitted free from all the world.

But, sir, let us look to the actual state of the trade between the two countries, and to the revenue which accrues to each of them from it, that the advantages which we may gain or the losses we may suffer may be both understood.

It appears from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury that the imports into the United States from the Hawaiian Islands for the fiscal year ended on the 30th of June, 1875, were in value $1,227,191, and that the Government received from duties thereon the sum of $456,777.

Upon the same authority the exports from the United States to the islands in the same fiscal year, amounted in value to $665,174, or only $208,397 in excess of the revenue received by us from the exports of that country. As was said in the minority report of the Committee on Ways and Means, in which I united, this is giving and remitting nearly one dollar of duty to the islands for the privilege of selling another dollar's worth of our products.

By this means, if the trade remains stationary and without increase, we should remit and thereby lose $3,197,439 in the seven years during which the treaty is to run.

The amount of duties paid to Hawaii upon exports to the islands from the United States is about $100,000 per annum, as stated by Mr. Pierce, our minister resident in that country, to the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate; so that even if the revenue received by us is deducted from the duties we pay, this country would be largely a loser.

Sugar is the principal article of export from the Hawaiian Islands to the United States. For the fiscal year ended 30th of June, 1875, of Hawaiian products 17,888,000 pounds of sugar were imported into the Pacific States, paying a duty of $391,300; and 1,588,232 pounds of rice, paying a duty of $31,744, the latter coming into direct and injurious competition with rice produced by our southern planters. The duty on sugar is 2¾ cents per pound, and the effect of its remission will be to put in the pockets of some twenty-six, or at most fifty Hawaiian planters, as a bounty, the entire duty, and thereby to insure the export of their whole crop to the United States. The sugar-producing capacity of the islands is officially estimated at 50,000,000 of pounds per annum, the duty on which, together with the loss which will be sustained in revenue by the necessary exclusion of duty-paying sugars produced by other Pacific islands, and which, should the bill now before the House fail, will be imported into Oregon and California, is estimated to amount to $1,200,000 per annum, making the cost of the treaty to the United States in case effect is given to it by our legislation, for the seven years of its continuance largely over $8,000,000. And what do we get in consideration of this immense loss of revenue? Absolutely nothing, unless it be a remission of duties on our exports to the islands, amounting to $100,000 per annum, and a stipulation contained in the fourth article of the treaty on the part of His Hawaiian Majesty, which really is of no value, and is as follows:

That, so long as this treaty shall remain in force, he will not lease or otherwise dispose of or create any lien upon any port, harbor, or other territory in his dominions, or grant any special privilege or rights or use therein to any other power, state, or government, nor make any treaty by which any other nation shall obtain the same privileges, relative to the admission of any articles free of duty, hereby secured to the United States.

Why, sir, already by reason of our proximity to these Sandwich Islands and by the enterprise of our people, in a race of competition with the commercial world, we have secured well-nigh a monopoly of their trade; while by the provisions of the existing treaty between the United States and the King of the Hawaiian Islands, concluded

20th of December, 1849, we are not only placed upon a footing with the most favored nations in matters of commerce and navigation, but the most perfect reciprocity is secured as regards duties of tonnage, harbor, light-houses, pilotage, quarantine, "or other similar duties of whatever nature or under whatever denomination."

Then, again, by the same treaty steam-vessels employed by the Government of the United States in carrying the public mails across the Pacific Ocean, or from one port to another in that ocean, are granted free access to the ports of the Sandwich Islands "to refit, to refresh, to land passengers and their baggage, and for the transaction of any business pertaining to the public mail service of the United States, and shall not be subject in such ports to duties of tonnage, harbor, light-house, quarantine, or other similar duties." The like privileges are granted to our whale-ships, with access to the principal ports of the islands for refitment and refreshment, with liberty of free trade to a fixed amount, and an exemption from tonnage and harbor dues; and the same privilege of entering certain ports is guaranteed to all the public armed vessels of the United States.

What more, Mr. Speaker, do we want? Why should we exchange the existing treaty, full of benefits for us as it is, for the one now under consideration, which, as I have shown, has nothing of mutuality or of reciprocity to commend it; but barren as it is of all advantages, is to be purchased for seven years at the enormous cost and dead loss of more than $8,000,000 to this country? Not only so, sir; if effect is given by this House to the treaty, you will introduce foreign-grown rice, duty free, to compete injuriously with rice the product of the Southern States, while, inasmuch as Hawaiian sugar to be exported to the Pacific coast free of duty is but a tithe of the same article imported into and consumed by the people of that section, no reduction in the price of the commodity can ensue and no possible advantage will accrue to them.

But we are admonished by the report of the majority of my colleagues of the Committee on Ways and Means that there are other and most imperative reasons for the passage of the bill to give effect to this treaty. They say:

> Supposing that there were no reciprocity of commerce in this treaty, that the commercial advantages were largely against us, and that we were to lose even $400,000 annual revenue, yet there are political reasons of sufficient magnitude to warrant us to make it. It involves matters of higher interests, of graver importance, and greater significance than those which relate simply to reciprocal advantages likely to result from a free exchage of commodities.

And then, after referring to the geographical position of the islands, their relation to our Pacific coast, the character of their harbors and their commerce, the secret object of the treaty is somewhat cautiously disclosed by the pregnant admonition that—

> The problem as to their future political status, together with the certainty that they cannot maintain autonomy or hold their place as a separate nation and not become absorbed by some other power, are to be considered in determining the question as to the policy of making this treaty.

Yes, sir, the secret purpose of the treaty is thus exposed; the acquisition of territory over two thousand miles from our shores; as far from us as England, Scotland, or Ireland, made up of twelve mid-ocean islands, seven of which only are sparsely inhabited by a rapidly decaying population of original savages, and the rest are barren rocks. This is the territory to be acquired, at an enormous expense, under the pretext of maintaining the autonomy of its dying inhabitants and of preventing their absorption by some other nation.

Yes, sir, a colonial system upon the model of that of Great Britain, with all its bitter fruits of costs and curses, is to be inaugurated and entailed upon us; and, that accomplished, we shall soon be looking with longing eyes toward Australia, New Zealand, Tasmania, and the Feejee Islands. I do not, of course, charge upon the majority of the Ways and Means Committee any secret purpose whatever. I know they are, each and all of them, incapable of concealments of any sort; but that there is somewhere such an ulterior object I have no doubt. May that purpose not have been foreshadowed in the "confidential" argument before the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations in regard to this same treaty, made in January, 1875, by Mr. Peirce, the then envoy to the Hawaiian Islands, to which I have already referred. He told the committee that—

> That people seem at present unwilling to surrender their autonomy as an independent nation, but the time is not far off when they will be too few in numbers and too feeble in power to desire to maintain their sovereignty, and they must naturally seek for incorporation with their nearest neighbors and most powerful friends, the United States.

And again he said, in the same discourse:

> The acquisition of the Hawaiian Islands by the United States, sooner or later, must become a national necessity, to guard the approaches against hostile attempts on the Pacific States. The Hawaiian Islands, if in possession of any European or Asiatic power, would be a standing menace to all the vital interests of the United States on our Pacific coast.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, annexation, colonization, and a colonial system is what those who are behind the scenes have in view if the assent of this House is given to the treaty.

Great Britain, they say, will seize upon these islands if the treaty does not become the supreme law of the land. They forget that there are men in this House to whose fears it would be vain to appeal for the success of any measure, and that it is only "the eye of childhood that fears a painted devil." They forget, too, that the "Monroe doctrine" is still extant in this Government, and that that doctrine will be enforced against Great Britain or any other power that may seize upon and attempt to hold these islands, if the presence of any one of them there should prove to be a standing menace to the vital interests of the United States on the Pacific coast, or if possession were held with hostile intent toward our country or its people. The policy of this Government in such an emergency was foreshadowed by Mr. Webster, as Secretary of State, in the administration of President Tyler, when, in reference to these very islands, he wrote that "the Government of the United States would look with displeasure upon any effort of any other government to acquire any preponderating influence over the government of the Hawaiian Islands; and, referring to the rumor then current, that the French would probably take possession of the islands, he said that "he trusted they would not take possession, but if they did, they would be dislodged if it took the whole power of the Government to do it."

Rest, assured, Mr. Speaker, that the same policy will be pursued whenever Great Britain or any other foreign government with intent to destroy the peace or to menace the interests of our Pacific States shall undertake to assert dominion over the Sandwich Islands. They will be dislodged if it takes the whole power of the Government to do it. And now, Mr. Speaker, having reviewed all the grounds which have been taken by the friends of this measure in its support, and having, as I hope, demonstrated that the bill to give effect to the Hawaiian treaty ought not to receive the sanction of this House, I shall bring to a close the remarks which I have felt it to be my duty to submit, in order to furnish the reasons which have led me to dissent from the conclusions to which a majority of the Committee of Ways and Means have arrived.

Demonetization of Silver—The Power and Duty of Congress.

SPEECH OF HON. JOHN R. GOODIN,

OF KANSAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

July 13, 1876.

On the joint resolution (H. R. No. 109) for the issue of silver coin.

Mr. GOODIN. Mr. Speaker, I cannot agree, sir, to give my assent to the report of the conference committee upon this bill for the reason, mainly, that the committee have agreed to strike out the following proviso, which by a decisive vote was inserted by this House. It reads:

> And provided further, That the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to authorize the coinage of a standard silver dollar of the same weight and fineness as that in use January 1, 1861, and that said dollar shall be a legal tender in payment of all debts public or private.

The effect, sir, of this proviso is the restoration substantially of the established silver dollar of 1792, which was a full legal tender for every kind and character of indebtedness, and which position I believe it continued to occupy commercially until the year 1873, when the law under which its coinage was authorized was stricken from the statute-books. Since the date first named we have practically had two standards of metallic currency, namely, gold and silver; and for more than three-quarters of a century the coins from these metals, so far as legislation was concerned, possessed equal value. They were jingled together in the same pocket, to be taken out in the business affairs of life where money was required, just as convenience or chance would have it, with no discrimination for or against either of the coins. But, sir, from some cause not altogether satisfactory to the average mind, in 1873 the silver demonetizing act was passed, leaving us the single metallic standard of gold.

The nation had at that time contracted an enormous indebtedness in consequence of the war, and this action of Congress left the indebtedness legally payable in coin to be liquidated by gold alone. Of this legislation the people had a just cause of complaint. There was no further incentive to extensive silver mining. Germany had driven out her silver by unfriendly legislation; and, notwithstanding the scarcity of gold in this country, silver, which was becoming more plentifully mined, must be demonetized. We hear a good deal said by the bullion-mongers against "cheap money," but this action of Congress must be regarded as an attempt to force us to a kind of specie with which to do the business of this country which, from its deplorable scarcity, could not be subject to any such charge.

The present advocates of the single standard for general use have only condescended that a limited amount of subsidiary silver should be coined, but have steadily objected that it be made a full legal tender. They would withdraw from circulation the paper currency, the legal-tender money, which costs so little and is yet so strongly entrenched in the affections of the people, and leave us for all purposes gold alone. Now, Mr. Speaker, there is not a single person but knows that to procure gold in sufficient quantities to meet the ordinary requirements of the Government, bonds or some species of securities upon which interest will have to be paid will of necessity have to be issued.

The resumption of specie payments—gold specie I should say—means the contracting of additional indebtedness to procure the precious metal, the glittering of which so captivates the devotees of "honest money." Forced contraction of the currency, judicially declared to be lawful money, means misery and financial ruin to the diversified industries of this country. It means that the debtor who upon a paper basis incurred his obligation, must pay in a metallic coin which he does not possess and which by no amount of honest labor can he acquire. And still a species of mental aberration approximating downright lunacy is charged by the "honest-money" patriots upon those who dare to say that if specie payment is ever to be reached again in this country it must be brought about by natural causes; that it cannot be effectuated by legislative enactments nor by a withdrawal of the circulating paper which now subserves the uses of a metallic currency.

I admit, Mr. Speaker, that the retirement of all paper issues and the declaration by Congress that gold alone shall constitute the "money" of the nation would, to use a familiar and favorite expression of the irrepressible "hard money" men upon this floor, be "a step in the direction of specie payments," but it could hardly be more than that. You may declare that you will have but one kind of currency, but that does not imply that you will secure "payments" of the amounts due you. You may declare only a certain kind of money "honest," but if it is beyond the reach of your debtor, you will still have to carry the indebtedness upon your books.

For years, Mr. Speaker, we have been taking "steps in the direction," we are told, of "specie payments," and what is our condition to-day? I shall not pause to reflect upon the financial ruin which is seen and felt everywhere. I will not dwell upon the fact that all over the country men, women, and children, able and willing to work, are begging for bread; that by no possible means can the debtor procure the money with which to pay his debts. We all know that business enterprises languish, confidence is gone, and hope has long since ceased to warm the desponding heart. No man need tell me, Mr. Speaker, that either directly or remotely has the "irredeemability" of our greenback currency anything to do with this unfortunate state of things. Neither can I be forced to believe that the superabundance of "rag-money" is a source of embarrassment to the people. The legal-tender issues of the Government are good enough. Ever since their adoption all business in this country has been done upon the basis of them, and the clamor for their retirement does not come from the masses of the people nor the mercantile class, but from those money-changers who depend for their fortunes upon trade and traffic in the commodities of gold and silver bullion, the former of which we are now told is to be speedily, forcibly, made the basis of our entire monetary system.

And, Mr. Speaker, the bullionists are not willing, in their eagerness to reach a condition of things where the golden calf shall be the only idol of worship, to pay a decent respect for the laws of the land which in any manner offer resistance to their mad ambition. Between the years 1865 and 1868 they succeeded in having converted $1,273,220,103 of Government obligations payable in currency into gold obligations, the interest of which was payable in gold. This was in furtherance of the policy of contraction, and added to the gold draught upon the country as interest the sum of $59,773,503 annually. From the exchange of these obligations most of the gold remained in foreign countries to meet the balances of trade. On this account for two or three years gold accumulated in this country, so that in 1870 the banks held in specie $48,345,383, while the Treasury held in gold $113,000,000. Since then, under the contraction policy, the drain of gold has alarmingly increased, and on the 1st day of last January the banks held only $8,050,329, showing the contraction of gold reserve held by the banks to be $40,295,054. As the effect of the passage of the resumption act of 1874, let me state a fact. On the 31st day of December previous, only fifteen days before the law was enacted, the banks held $22,436,761 in specie. Nine months later but $8,050,329 could be found in the banks, showing the contraction of gold to have been $13,190,615. According to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury but $13,000,000 in gold now remain in the Treasury. So of gold held by the Government there has been a contraction of near $100,000,000. There is only one-sixth as much gold in bank now as when we commenced the fatal policy of contraction; there is only one-seventh as much in the Treasury, and, according to the best attainable information, the currency has been contracted near two-fifths. These, Mr. Speaker, are some of the "steps" we have been taking, and if I am capable of any intelligent reasoning upon cause and effect, we are reaping fruits of the intensest bitterness therefrom.

But, sir, I have said that the advocates of "honest money" find little obstruction in their frantic, headlong rush for specie resumption, in the laws upon our statute-books. Whenever a law is discovered which serves as an obstacle to their onward march, they ingeniously prepare themselves for the work of overcoming it. Those who insist upon the letter of the law are vigorously denounced as "repudiationists," and "public faith" and "fair dealing" become the rallying cry, while some nostrum as a tonic with which to instil vigor into our credit as a nation is administered with promptness and dispatch. The panacea for the ills of the bondholder, in the form of the resolution of Congress passed in 1869, seems to have been both pleasant and effective. That came in the shape of a strengthening-plaster, and was called a measure for "strengthening the public credit." The credit of the nation was to be "strengthened" by the legislative declaration that—

> The faith of the United States is solemnly pledged to the payment in coin or its equivalent of all obligations of the United States not bearing interest known as United States notes and of all interest-bearing obligations of the United States, except in cases where the law authorizing the issue of any such obligation has expressly provided that the same may be paid in lawful money or other currency than gold and silver.

This, Mr. Speaker, to use the language of the law, was "in order to remove any doubt as to the purpose of the Government" with respect to the payment of its notes and bonds. If "any doubt" has ever existed in the mind of any reasonably fair man that by this strengthening-plaster the bondholder got his pound of flesh I have yet to hear it, and will be greatly surprised if I do. On the contrary, Mr. Speaker, it is exceedingly questionable if any judicial tribunal could be found which would construe the laws authorizing the issue of United States notes and bonds as did the "strengthening" act of 1869. Certain it is, sir, that some of the ablest lawyers and clearest headed men in both Houses of Congress and throughout the country have felt and declared the legislation to be pernicious and unwarranted by any just or well-recognized rules of construction. But it made the Government creditors happy, for it secured them advantages which certainly could not have been contemplated at the time the bond obligations were incurred. All the energies of the Government, all the machinery of legislation, are invoked in behalf of the nation's creditors, and every consideration of public faith seems to be presented from their stand-point!

Money and muscle, judgment and patriotism, were alike essential for the maintenance of the Union in the internecine war which threatened its overthrow. Statesmen looked after the laws, men of wealth contributed largely of the means to carry on the war, while the chivalric people of the loyal States shouldered their muskets and did the fighting upon the open battle-fields. All who in any manner aided by tongue or pen, by money or sword, are deserving of lasting praise and remembrance; but I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that the men of wealth who took our bonds are entitled to special privileges. I would have the Government keep its faith regarding every contract, express or implied, and in its remedial and protective legislation guard the rights of the many with the same jealous care which it bestows upon the few.

We all know, Mr. Speaker, because it is a familiar part of our history, that a large portion of the money derived from the sales of United States bonds was legal-tender currency, received at a time when it took $1.50, $2, and $2.80 of it to purchase a dollar in gold. This paper was paid to our soldiers at its face in discharge of our obligations to them for their services at $13 per month. These same soldiers now comprise a large proportion of the tax-payers of this country, and with their private necessities and the demands of the public in the matter of taxation, they are sorely overburdened. Those, too, who furnished supplies for the Army were paid in like currency, but no complaint comes from anybody that the law is oppressive and needs modification and interpretation, nor that the "public credit" needs "strengthening" save and except those who hold our bonds or are engaged in bullion traffic. And for such as these and none other was the act of March 18, 1869, passed, which, as I have indicated, adopted a construction which the bondholder was unwilling to risk the judiciary in making.

But, Mr. Speaker, however unjust the repeated demands of the creditor class, however unfair to the patient oppressed tax-payers the multiplied concessions to these demands may have been in the past, their present attitude gives promise for greater alarm than any heretofore assumed!

> Judge me not ungentle,
> Of manners rude, and insolent of speech,
> If, when the public safety is in question,
> My zeal flows warm and eager from my tongue.

Sir, in the discussion which has been had upon this conference report no one has denied the legal right of the Government to pay its bonded obligations in either gold or silver coin. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PAYNE] who makes this report does not deny it. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TOWNSEND] does not do it. The gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BURCHARD,] who favors the report, does not do it, and the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] while he says:

> Since I have been in public life I have never known any proposition that contained so many elements of vast rascality, of colossal swindling as this, does not controvert the position that the Government may lawfully liquidate these demands with silver coin. I am gratified, Mr. Speaker, that we have at last reached a monetary question upon which there is no disagreement as to the law. With reference to the act of 1869 which so securely "strengthened the public credit," lawyers did not entirely agree in either House, but here and now upon this question we have the most pleasing harmony. Now, sir, at this point let us again recur to the bondholder's act of 1869, whereby the law by which they could be required to accept the principal upon their bonds in legal-tender paper was distorted and construed otherwise. It reads:

> * * * The faith of the United States is solemnly pledged to the payment in coin or its equivalent of all obligations of the United States, &c.

Payment in what? Payment in coin. What kind of coin? I answer in any kind of coin recognized by the United States as lawful money. Two kinds of coin were used and recognized by the United States, namely, gold and silver. The bondholder has heretofore shouted lustily for his "rights" and for a proper observance of the "solemn contract" between himself and the Government, and has been able to secure the most favorable legislative and executive interpretation. Now he is unwilling to be bound by the legislation which was obtained for his benefit because the commodity in coin which he agreed to take in payment of his debts is less valuable than when his debt was contracted. I will assimilate his present complaint to an individual purchasing a horse. At the time of the purchase horses are worth $100. His is to be delivered at a time stated in the future. At the time of delivery horses are worth but $75, but his vendor has complied with his contract and demands his money. The vendee insists upon having made up to him the decline in horse-flesh since the purchase. Of course this demand would not be acceded to, and yet it is scarcely less presumptuous than that of the holder of United States bonds who, by reason of the decline in silver, insists that the difference between silver and gold should be saved to him.

Mr. Speaker, no one would for a moment entertain the idea that if gold or silver, or both, had advanced in value since the making of the contract, the creditor would be bound to refund the advance to the Government; but if he and those who would demonetize our own product of silver in his interest would apply a rule which is to work fair and equitably, this would be the result in such case.

Sir, I am rejoiced that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANDERS] by his amendment of the silver bill has called the attention of this House and the country to the enormous demands of the money power. When the legal-tender paper currency is below gold and silver then it insists that the law shall be construed that both principal and interest of our indebtedness shall be paid in coin. When a portion of the coin or the metal out of which it is made becomes plentiful or for any other reason is less in value than gold, then the demand is that it shall be increased so as to be worth as much as gold or that payment be made in coin of the last-named metal. And I presume, sir, that by the same parity of reasoning, if some wonderful bonanza should be struck in Nevada or elsewhere, and that gold should be produced in enormous quantities, or from any other cause there should be a decline in its value, these same gentlemen would claim that this fact was unforeseen at the time the contract was made, and that the creditor should be in some way indemnified for the depreciation of values.

Very clearly, sir, are we shown the rock upon which the best interests of the honest laborer and tax-payer will be shivered to pieces unless we change our course of sailing right speedily. In these latter days the "treacherous flatteries" of the money kings seem to possess captivating powers over the people's servants, and it sometimes looks as if—

> Conscience, truth, and honesty are made
> To rise and fall like other wares of trade.

Mr. Speaker, the act to which I have referred as the credit-strengthening measure was pernicious in its inception and marked a sad era of submission to the dictates of the money power; and to-day, like General Grant at Donelson, the bondholders are demanding of us an "unconditional surrender," and a tax-ridden people are waiting with the most earnest solicitude to witness our determination. But, Mr. Speaker, every consideration of public duty and of private interest demands that silver be remonetized and take its old place as a money coin in this country.

I tell you, sir, that the people, when they come to fully understand and to feel the effects of the enormous contraction of legal-tenders and of the demonetization of silver, will not submit passively to it. Sir, it is not yet generally known that the bright, shining pieces of subsidiary coin now in circulation are only legal tender to the amount of $5. If I owe a man $6, he may lawfully refuse to receive more than five of it in silver. So the "irredeemable rag-money" is worth a premium over silver. The legal-tender quality imparted to it by law appreciates its value; and just in proportion as you can widen the uses of it, to that extent you measurably advance the value of any circulating medium. Then why not remonetize silver in this great nation, giving a coin in silver all the purchasing qualities of gold? If it be desirable to effect a gold-value reduction, the issue of silver coins with full legal-tender qualities will do it, and soon both coins will be of equal values, the one exchangeable for the other. No objection can be urged constitutionally, because silver is one of its recognized commodities from which to coin lawful money.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the necessities of the country demand that the act of January 18, 1837, providing for the coinage of United States silver dollars of the weight of 412½ grains should be substantially re-enacted, and that the silver bullion now in possession of the Government should thus be absorbed. With the experiences of the past in relation to our paper legal-tenders, which have proved such blessings to the country, it cannot truthfully be said that because of the cheapness of the commodity out of which the money is made it cannot be made to nevertheless subserve the uses, ends, and interests of the people, and meet all obligations, whether of a public or private character.

Silver Coin.

SPEECH OF HON. W. S. HOLMAN,

OF INDIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

July 13, 1876.

The House having under consideration the joint resolution (H. R. No. 100) for the issue of silver coin—

Mr. HOLMAN said:

Mr. SPEAKER: It is urged that it is better to save the two features of the bill to which the conference committee have agreed, the one authorizing the exchange of legal-tender notes for fractional silver currency to the extent of $10,000,000, the legal-tender notes only to be re-issued when an equal amount of paper fractional currency shall have come into the Treasury and been canceled; and the other authorizing the purchase of $20,000,000 of silver bullion for coinage into fractional currency—neither of which, in my judgment, are judicious measures—rather than run the risk of the failure of these by insisting on the measure rejected by the conference committee, the restoration of the legal-tender quality of silver money as proposed by the amendment of my colleague, [Mr. LANDERS.]

I hope this pretense will not be indulged in. If the two features of this bill to which the conference committee have agreed were really valuable, there is no urgent necessity for their immediate adoption. A little delay will in nowise embarrass the country.

The important feature of this bill is the legal-tender feature incorporated upon it on motion of my colleague, [Mr. LANDERS.] It is impossible in the nature of things, considering the attitude of business before the Senate as well as the state of the conferences between the two Houses on the appropriation bills, that Congress shall adjourn at an early moment. There is, then, ample time for further conference on this bill. I therefore assume that gentlemen in voting in favor of the report of the conference committee must do so because they are content with the provisions of the bill as reported by the conference committee and opposed to that portion of the bill which has been stricken out by that conference.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. For my part I disclaim any such assumption.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would admit the correctness of the position of the gentleman from Illinois if we were on the very eve of the close of the session. But there is at any rate ample time for repeated conferences on this bill before Congress can possibly adjourn, as gentlemen must see by considering the position of the impeachment trial before the Senate and the state of the appropriation bills. There is no occasion for haste. This bill will not be placed in jeopardy by delay. There is ample time for further and deliberate conference. A great public measure should not be defeated on a false pretense.

The question therefore is whether we should concur in this report on the assumption that otherwise all the features of the bill will be lost. All will not be lost. If this House non-concur, there is still ample time for further deliberation. I trust the House will not concur; that this measure will go back for a further conference; and that the views of the House heretofore expressed shall be further urged upon the conferees of the Senate. But to the merits of this question. I am astonished, sir, at the enthusiasm, the actual excitement of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.] The gentleman can scarcely find terms strong enough to express his condemnation of a measure that seems by remote inference to operate favorably for the debtor class of the people of this country. When the notes of the Government, made legal tender in the general business of our people by virtue of law and worth from forty to sixty cents on the dollar on the gold basis, were converted into bonds the principal of which was expressly payable in lawful money—the lawful money on the basis of which and for which the bonds were issued—the gentleman from Ohio did not consider it contrary to public morals, the moral honesty of a great people, to declare, by the act of the 18th of March, 1869, that the bonds so issued on a depreciated currency, and the principal of which was payable in such currency, should be paid in a more valuable money—in coin, gold, or silver, adding enormously to their value. When that measure, in the interest of capital, in the interest of the public creditors, was pending in this House, and being forced through under the previous question, the gentleman did not become enthusiastic in the interest of the debtor class or in the interest of the labor which was to bear the increased burden, and denounce the measure as a fraud, a colossal swindle. Not a word of that. But, on the contrary, the gentleman from Ohio gave the measure a prompt and cordial support. Yet it is positively true that that measure, the very first measure of this Administration, by a change of the medium of payment enhanced the value of the 5.20 bonds at least $200,000,000, and added not less than $200,000,000 to the great burden under which the labor of this country rests; and every one of the 5.20 bonds had been issued before that measure enormously increasing their value was enacted. But that was not "a colossal swindle!" O, certainly not, for it was in the interest of capital! But this silver measure is a colossal swindle, of course, because it seems to be in the interest of the debtor class and of labor. It is simply proposed by the pending measure that the state of the coined money of this country at the time that act of March, 1869, was passed shall still be the state and standard of the coined money of this country; that the silver dollar, the unit of value, with slight variation of standard from the foundation of the Government to February 12, 1873, shall still be lawful money; shall be still legal-tender coin in the interest of justice and fair dealing; not in the interest of one class, the debtor class, nor in the interest of the creditor class, but in the interest of justice and common honesty between this Government and its people and its creditors, and of the citizen with the citizen.

Whatever may have been the diversity of opinion, before the final decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, as to the power of Congress to give to paper issues the attributes and final quality of money, no man ever doubted that gold and silver coin, in such relations to each other as Congress might prescribe, was lawful money. The one is as clearly a constitutional coin as the other. The Constitution does not consider their relative commercial value, but only the quality of money—the standard of value in the liquidation of debts—that Congress should stamp upon them.

Until the 12th of February, 1873, through all of our history gold and silver coin were equally and alike, in proportions which had undergone scarcely a perceptible change, money. The first coinage act of April 2, 1792, provides as to silver money as follows:

Dollar or unit, each to be of the value of a Spanish milled dollar, as the same is now current, and to contain three hundred and seventy-one grains and four-sixteenth parts of a grain of pure, or four hundred and sixteen grains of standard silver.

And by the eleventh section of the same coinage act the relation between gold and silver coin is established as follows:

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That the proportional value of gold to silver in all coins which shall by law be current as money within the United States shall be as 15 to 1, according to quantity in weight of pure gold or pure silver; that is to say, every fifteen pounds weight of pure silver shall be of equal value in all payments with one pound weight of pure gold, and so in proportion as to any greater or less quantities of the respective metals.

By the coinage act of 1837, which remained in effect in force until the passage of the act of February 12, 1873, the silver dollar is to be of 412½ grains of standard silver, as against 416 grains of standard silver by the act of 1798. Thus in the progress of time between 1798 and 1837 the value of silver had slightly increased, at least in its commercial value in relation to gold.

The law in force in 1873 before the demonetizing of silver was this act of 1837, and the provision of that act as to silver money is as follows:

SEC. 9. That of the silver coins the dollar shall be of the weight of 412½ grains, [standard metal;] the half dollar of the weight of 206¼ grains; the quarter dollar of the weight of 103½ grains; the dime, or tenth of a dollar, of the weight of 41¼ grains; and the half dime, or twentieth part of a dollar, of the weight of 20 grains and § of a grain; and that dollars, half dollars, and quarter dollars, dimes, and half dimes shall be legal tenders of payment, according to their nominal value, for any sums whatever.

And this, sir, was the state of the law on the 18th day of March, 1869, when the act was passed "to strengthen the public credit," so called, which declared that "the faith of the United States is solemnly pledged to the payment in coin or its equivalent of all the obligations of the United States not bearing interest, known as United States notes, and of all the interest-bearing obligations of the United States, except in cases where the law authorizing the issue of such obligation has expressly provided that the same may be paid in lawful money or other currency than gold and silver."

Here was the initiative step toward the final retirement of the United States legal-tender notes—the only paper money ever issued in the direct interest of the people—that the bank monopoly might resume, as of old, the plunder of our industries and the centralization of our wealth.

The far-seeing capitalists, after the passage of the coin act of March 18, 1869, adding at least two hundred millions to the value of their securities, seemed to have been indignant that Congress had not done even better for them. The money-changers of the world, who coin the sweat of the labor of multitudes of men into imperial fortunes for themselves, saw the subtle advantage of coercing the payment of the vast indebtedness of the nations—of the laboring multitudes—in a single coin, greatly diminishing the quantity of the medium of payment. Germany, Belgium, France, Switzerland, Italy, and even Holland, the latter powers under the auspices of England, in different degrees, were moving upon the unconscious laboring interests of the world in the direct interest of capital at this period. Without previous suggestion, Mr. Hooper, a member of this House, a leading capitalist and banker of Boston, brought before the House on the 27th day of May, 1872, "a bill revising and amending the laws relative to mints, assay offices, and coinage of the United States," with a substitute therefor, which he offered. This bill, or rather the substitute for the bill reported by Mr. Hooper demonetized silver and produced a change in the standard of values in its ultimate results almost without a parallel, the effect of which will only be seen in the forced resumption of specie payments.

I have before me the record of the proceedings of this House on the passage of that measure, a record which no man can read without being convinced that the measure and the method of its passage through this House was a "colossal swindle." I assert that the measure never had the sanction of this House, and it does not possess the moral force of law.

Mr. Hooper moved to suspend the rules and pass the substitute reported by him; then the record shows the following proceedings occurred. I omit the unimportant details:

Mr. HOLMAN. I suppose it is intended to have the bill read before it is put upon its passage.
The SPEAKER. The substitute will be read.
Mr. HOOPER. I hope not. It is a long bill, and those who are interested in it are perfectly familiar with its provisions.
Mr. KERR. The rules cannot be suspended so as to dispense with the reading of the bill.
The SPEAKER. They can be.
Mr. KERR. I want the House to understand that it is attempted to put through this bill without being read.
The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Hooper] move that the reading of the bill be dispensed with?
Mr. HOOPER. I will so frame my motion to suspend the rules that it will dispense with the reading of the bill.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves that the rules be suspended and that the bill pass, the reading thereof being dispensed with.
Mr. RANDALL. Cannot we have a division on that motion?
The SPEAKER. The motion to suspend the rules cannot be divided.

The motion of Mr. Hooper failed.

Mr. Hooper then moved that the rules be suspended and that the substitute for the bill be passed, and that the substitute be read.

The Clerk began to read the substitute.
Mr. BROOKS. Is that the original bill?
The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Hooper] applies to the substitute, and that on which the House is called to act is being read.
Mr. BROOKS. As there is to be no debate, the only chance we have to know what we are doing is to have both the bill and the substitute read.
The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts being to suspend the rules and pass the substitute, it gives no choice between the two bills. The House must either pass the substitute or none.
Mr. BROOKS. How can we choose between the original bill and the substitute unless we hear them both read?
The SPEAKER. The gentleman can vote "ay" or "no" on the question whether this substitute shall be passed.
Mr. BROOKS. I am very much in the habit of voting "no" when I do not know what is going on.
Mr. HOLMAN. Before the question is taken on suspending the rules and passing the bill, I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts will explain the leading changes made by this bill in the existing law, especially in reference to the coinage. It would seem that all the small coinage of the country is intended to be recoined.
Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. This bill makes no change in the existing law in that regard. It does not require the recoinage of the small coins. On the contrary, I understand that the Secretary of the Treasury proposes to issue an order to stop the coinage of all the minor coins, as there is now a great abundance of them in the country. The salaries are not increased; they remain as they were.
Mr. HOLMAN. Is not the salary of the subtreasurer at New York increased?
Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. No, sir; it is not increased.

Then, inasmuch as the House seemed fully satisfied with the statement of Mr. Hooper that the bill made "no change in the existing law in that regard," a number of questions were asked in regard to the proposed increased facilities for mintage, the salaries to be paid, and the like, and then the rules were suspended and the bill passed. It was never read, and except the small number of gentlemen who composed the Committee on Mines and Mining, no member of the House, I am safe in asserting, knew of this radical and extraordinary change by which one of the two metals which from the beginning of history have been mediums of exchange in the commerce of the world was to be rejected, and as an inevitable result the other greatly enhanced in value.

This bill, without further notice in the House, passed the Senate during the same Congress, and became a law on the 12th day of February, 1873, and the feature under consideration now stands in our statutes in the following words:

The silver coins of the United States shall be a legal tender at their nominal value for any amount not exceeding $5 in any one payment.

And this is the state of the silver money under existing law. Instead of a full legal tender as it had been through all of our history until February 12, 1873, it becomes by that act a legal tender for $5 only in any one payment, thus reduced and degraded to a subsidiary and inferior coin. The old dollar of 371¼ of pure silver was ignored and rejected from our monetary system.

The object of all this is too obvious to require explanation. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] estimates our debts, national and corporate and individual, at $5,000,000,000. I fear that this estimate is below the reality. The great body of this indebtedness accrued while silver money was a full legal tender. It is obvious that the increase of indebtedness public or private has been inconsiderable since the financial crash of 1873. It was the weight of the immense debts, public and private, contracted before 1873 that brought financial ruin upon the country. It would be exact justice that this vast body of debts should be payable in the same money and on the basis of the same volume of money as that in which it was contracted; equally just to the creditor and the debtor. No man can deny the truth of this proposition. Is the debtor less entitled to justice than the creditor? Shall honor and fair dealing and all the principles of just government give way before the demand of the creditor? Has capital alone rights which government is bound to respect? As a general proposition, this vast sum of $5,000,000,000 of indebtedness, public and private, rests directly on the labor of the country. Is it just to increase the weight of this indebtedness by arbitrary law? Is labor less entitled to justice and fair dealing than capital? Shall we return, after the centuries of revolution in which the many have demanded the just recognition of government, to the policy of the Middle Ages when the few only were recognized by the state?

Few men would dare to give these questions an affirmative answer. And yet within eight years by these arbitrary enactments of law the weight of our vast indebtedness and the value of the securities which represent it have been enormously increased without one ameliorating provision in the interest of the labor on which this indebtedness rests; the act of March 18, 1869, declaring that the principal of public bonds, which was payable, in express terms, in lawful money—gold, silver, or legal-tender notes, at the option of the Government—and notwithstanding that those bonds were sold for legal-tender notes greatly depreciated below the value of gold and silver coin, should be paid in coin only; the coinage act of February 12, 1873, demonetizing silver coin, greatly reducing the volume of money and directly and immensely reducing the medium of payments for the bonds augmented in value by the act of March 18, 1869, and thus still further increasing their value; and the act of January 14, 1875, proposing to demonetize $372,000,000 of legal-tender notes, lawful money, thus reducing to this vast extent the medium of payments of a large portion of the five billions of indebtedness, and this too by increasing the enormous interest-bearing debt by funding these $372,000,000 of lawful money into 5 per cent. gold bonds. I hesitate to mention the increased weight of indebtedness imposed by these three acts on the labor and on the debtor class of this country, for its magnitude would seem almost incredible. And such is the temper of our times that gentlemen feel perfectly safe in denouncing a measure that is not in the interest of capital as "a colossal swindle." The sanctity of "the public credit," the spirit of "public honor," are invoked only in behalf of capitalists, as if there was nothing sacred in the rights of labor and nothing noble in equal and exact justice.

I cannot see any possible injustice in restoring the legal-tender quality of silver money. It seems to me positively unjust not to restore it. It is a measure, in my judgment, in the interest of the people and of equal and exact justice. Of course there is no great lobby pressing this measure. The laboring interests of this country are never represented by an organized lobby such as filled every avenue to the halls of Congress when the three measures in the interest of capital to which I have referred were pending. When the coin act of March 18, 1869, was passed through this House under the previous question and without permitting one word of debate, the capitalists of this country and of Europe were fully satisfied with its provisions. It was regarded as a great triumph. The gentleman who reported the bill to this House was at once made our minister to England and was received with distinguished consideration by the great representatives of English wealth, but even then the holders of our public securities, while exacting that legal-tender notes should not be money in payment of the public debt, did not arrogate the right to demonetize silver and demand gold for their bonds. It was not thought safe to awaken the laboring-men of this country by demanding too much. That act recognizes silver and gold as the money in which the securities should be paid. The terms of the act are explicit:

> The faith of the United States is solemnly pledged to the payment, in coin or its equivalent, of all the obligations of the United States not bearing interest, known as United States notes, and of all the interest-bearing obligations of the United States, except in cases where the law authorizing the issue of any such obligation has expressly provided that the same may be paid in lawful money or other currency than gold and silver.

If it was proposed to change the relations of the two metals, increasing the relative value of silver, the objection would be good, for the creditor is entitled to be paid in the money provided for in his contract; but nothing of the kind is suggested. It is simply proposed to restore to silver money its quality as legal tender in payment of debts which it possessed from the foundation of the Government to the 12th day of February, 1873. It is said that silver has become less valuable. As an article of commerce silver and gold, like every other article of merchandise, is and always has been and always will be subject to fluctuation. From various causes it is clear that gold as an article of commerce has increased in value and silver has fallen in value; both metals have been subject to such vicissitudes from the time that their employment as mediums of exchange was found convenient in the business of the world; but when the Government stamps upon three hundred and seventy-one and one-fourth grains of pure silver, or four hundred and twelve and one-half grains of standard metal the quality of a dollar, a unit of value, and makes it a legal tender as a dollar, it is simply a dollar—a dollar in the legal payment of debt, and becomes a recognized and legal standard of value and exchange, and such it has been from the beginning of our Government. The suggestion that the silver dollar is worth less than the greenback dollar and greatly less than the gold dollar is absolutely absurd, except only as to the extent that each may be a legal tender in the payment of debts. The one that may liquidate debts of every character is of course the most valuable as money in comparison with one that is only a limited legal tender.

I do not hesitate to express the opinion that the double standard—gold and silver legal tender—is demanded by the true interests of this country, and that if the fatal policy of the resumption act of January 14, 1875, is finally carried out and the exclusively gold standard of 1873 shall be maintained, the general prostration of all the industries of this country will be inevitable, and wide-spread disaster and universal suffering will fall upon our people. No interest will escape the general ruin except that of invested capital, which will be enlarged to the degree that all other interests of the country will suffer.

Dr. Linderman, the Superintendent of the Mint, in his last report says:

> Since 1870 the exclusive gold standard has been adopted by the United States, Germany, Japan, and the Scandinavian states. The double standard exists in France, Belgium, Itlay, Switzerland, the Netherlands, Portugal, and Spain, and the silver standard in Russia, Austria, Mexico, China, and the Indies.

Of all these four nations that since 1870 have adopted the exclusively gold standard, the United States only is a debtor nation; ours is the only nation that has legislated in the special interest of foreign capitalists, and when it is known, as it should be, that a representative of British capital was consulted by Mr. Hooper and his associates in framing the mintage act of 1873, the motive that instigated that act may well be imagined.

Dr. Linderman says further:

> The principal money markets of the world have been occasionally disturbed during the last three years, and the margin of the exchanges has been such as to afford a wide field for speculation. In seeking for the causes of these disturbances, it would appear, at first glance, that the supply of gold is unequal to the legitimate demands of the rapidly increasing commerce of the world. A careful examination of the subject, however, will show that the monetary troubles have not been caused by insufficient supplies of gold, but by its having been withheld in large sums from circulation, and the diminished use of silver as money.

The withholding of gold from circulation and the diminished use of silver as money are the causes, then, of the disturbed condition of finance among commercial powers! Why is the gold withheld from circulation? Manifestly because in the reduced volume of money a few great capitalists are able to control the money market of the world. This is the inevitable result of the diminished use of silver or some other standard of money. The withholding of gold under this new policy, made easy by the retirement of silver, restores the mediæval age in the capacity of the few great masters to enslave mankind—the old by force, the new by subtlety and cunning.

The great American poet in his apostrophe to freedom admirably depicts the ceaseless struggle between freedom and tyranny, and he admonishes freedom that his ancient enemy tyranny "will fade into a feebler age"—feebler, yet subtler.

> He shall send
> Quaint maskers, forms of fair and gallant mien
> To catch thy gaze and uttering graceful words
> To charm thy ear; while his sly imps by stealth
> Twine round thee threads of steel, light thread on thread,
> That grow to fetters; or bind down by arms
> With chains concealed in chaplets.

In view of the legislation of recent years the laboring-men of this country may well consider these words—more truthful, if possible, than poetic.

This question of silver money has received but little attention since the passage of the act of 1873. Indeed, so late as March last, being present at a conference between members of the House and Senate, and the demonetization of silver being mentioned, a leading Senator, for many years in the Senate, asserted most positively that silver coin was still an unlimited legal tender, and an appeal to the law only settled the dispute. But the depressed condition of our various industries, the absence of employment for labor even at low and unremunerative prices, and the general suffering and distress everywhere manifest, will provoke a severer inquiry into the financial policy of the country. It will be seen that every measure of finance and taxation since the close of the war has been against labor and in favor of capital, and that the country is now suffering from a policy dictated by a selfish and remorseless cupidity seeking to augment the advantages and power of wealth and taking from "the mouth of labor the bread it has earned," and that only through a reversal of this policy and the enactment of laws of finance and taxation equally just to every interest can our prosperity be restored.

National Currency.—Remonetization of Silver.

SPEECH OF HON. J. G. CANNON,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

July 13, 1876.

On the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the joint resolution (H. R. No. 109) for the issue of silver coin.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, there is a general discussion throughout the country as to what should be our financial policy; and no man in an ordinary life-time can intelligently read and digest all the essays and plans suggested by the thousands of persons who are discussing this question, and generally each one of whom is absolutely certain that his proposition is the magic wand which, if adopted, will calm either the storm or serve as a rudder by which to steer the ship of state over the angry sea into a harbor of safety.

I do not deprecate the discussion, for in a republic like ours, whose destiny is controlled directly by the people, discussion leads to a proper understanding of the question, and when once understood, I have no doubt the people will, in the future as in the past, approve those measures which are right and politic; for in the long run the old maxim applies to nations as well as to individuals, that honesty is the best policy; and at the outset I want to say that this question will never be settled by theorists, for they disagree and quarrel. It is only by availing ourselves of the experience of the past and exercising that best of all kinds of sense, "common sense," aided by common honesty, that we can hope to find out and adopt the true policy.

It is with a desire to advocate a proper policy that I approach the discussion of the question now being considered by the House; for any action here that results in legislation upon a question of national importance, is in its effects felt by every business interest of the country and in the homes of forty-four millions of people; and while we may make mistakes and no doubt do, no Representative has the right to act without having diligently inquired as to what his action should be. The proposition is to remonetize the standard silver dollar as it was prior to February, 1873, making it a legal tender for all debts, public and private, and receivable for duties on imports. And in coming to a conclusion two questions are to be considered:

First. Have we the right, legal and moral, to so legislate?

Second. Is it good policy to so legislate?

First as to the right.

CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS.

Mr. Speaker, the Constitution (section 8) provides, among other things, that "Congress shall have power to borrow money on the credit of the United States. * * * To coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin." Congress, under this power, has from time to time provided for the coinage of money and fixed the weight and fineness of the various denominations thereof.

Article 1, section 10 provides—

"No State shall * * * coin money, emit bills of credit, make anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts."

In 1791 Alexander Hamilton, in making a report to Congress, in speaking of the use of the precious metals as money, used the following language:

To annul the use of either of the metals as money is to abridge the quantity of circulating medium, and is liable to all the objections which arise from a comparison of the benefits of a full with the evils of a scanty circulation.

Thomas Jefferson, in a letter to Hamilton, February, 1792, says:

I return you the report on the Mint. I concur with you that the unit must stand on both metals.

This shortly preceded the enacting of the law of April 2, 1792, by which the Mint was established and the coinage of money provided for, and as I desire to be accurate in all my statements, I will give the provisions of the act of 1792, and all subsequent acts of Congress in reference to the coinage of money, by reading from the report of the Director of the Mint for the year 1873, page 9, as follows:

The Mint was, by the act of April 2, 1792, established "for the purpose of a national coinage," at Philadelphia, that city then being the seat of Government. By the same act it was provided that the money of account should be expressed in dollars or units, dimes or tenths, cents or hundredths, and mills or thousandths; and that all accounts in the public offices or proceedings in the courts of the United States should be kept and had in conformity therewith. Although the ideal unit of the colonial money of account was originally called a pound, the Spanish dollar was for many years before the establishment of the present form of government the money of commerce and practical monetary unit, and, whether obligations were discharged in gold, silver, or paper money, a certain number of Spanish dollars constituted, specifically or by implication, the standard or measure of value. This had much to do with the selection in 1792 of the dollar as the monetary unit.

By the act referred to, provision was also made for the issue of gold, silver, and copper coins. The gold coins were to be rated at 24.75 grains of pure gold to the dollar and the silver coins at 371¼ grains to the dollar or unit, the relative value of the two metals being declared in the same law to be as 15 to 1. These standards were continued down to 1834, when an act was passed reducing the pure gold from 24 75 to 23.20 grains to the dollar.

By the act of January 18, 1837, the fineness of the gold was increased about three-fourths of one thousandth by changing from the standard of .899225 to .900, which increased the pure gold to the dollar from 23.20 to 23.22 grains, at which it still remains.

By this act the fineness of both the gold and silver coins was fixed at .900. The silver dollar weighed 412½ grains troy, and the gold was issued at the rate of 25.8 per dollar in value, the actual gold dollar coin not being authorized, however, until 1849. The relation of the metals, therefore, was almost exactly 16 to 1.

The quantity of pure silver in the dollar, as originally fixed, was not changed from the date of its issue down to April 1, 1873, when it was discontinued; but the weight of the coins of less denomination was reduced from 412½ to 384 grains standard per dollar of nominal value by the act of February 21, 1853, which fixed the weight of the half dollar at 192 grains and the quarter dollar, dime, and half dime at one-half, one-fifth, and one-tenth of the said half dollar.

The standard weight of these latter coins was, by the coinage act of 1873, increased to 385.8 grains to the dollar, composed of two half dollars, four quarter dollars, and ten dimes, and corresponding in weight and fineness with the five-franc silver coin of the Latin states of Europe. These coins are issued at the rate of $1.24414 per standard ounce, 803⅜ ounces giving coins of the nominal value of $1,000.

The coinage act, in effect, abolished the silver dollar of 412½ grains troy (371¼ grains pure silver) and declared the gold dollar of 25.8 grains, nine-tenths fine, (23 22 grains pure gold,) the unit of value, and thus legally established gold as the sole standard or measure of value. The issue of the copper coin commenced in 1793, silver in 1794, and gold in 1795.

It will be noticed that the Spanish silver dollar prior to act of 1792 was the standard of value, and it is true that the standard silver dollar of the United States had in it the same amount of silver as the Spanish silver dollar, and that under this legislation the standard silver dollar weighed 412½ grains, nine-tenths of it fine silver and one-tenth alloy, and the weight of this coin was never changed, and all the acts of Congress prior to 1873 provided it should be a legal tender for all debts public and private, while the gold dollar, act of 1853, 25.8 grains, with the larger gold coins were also a legal tender. Both the silver and gold were called coin. The smaller silver coin, half dollars, quarters, dimes, and half dimes, weighed a little less to the dollar than the standard silver dollar, and by the act of 1853, as well as the act of 1873, were a legal tender for not exceeding $5.

In making both gold and silver a standard of value, our fathers took counsel of the experience of civilized nations for many centuries past.

Indeed, I may say, in the light of history, that from the most ancient times mankind have by toil, hardship, and enterprise sought both gold and silver, and in most civilized countries have used them for money, and with slight fluctuations in the proportion of 16 to 1, that is, sixteen ounces of silver being equal in value to one ounce of gold. So from 1792 to the breaking out of the late war, and all through the war up to 1873, the standard silver dollar was in common with gold coin a legal tender for all debts, public and private, and receivable under all the legislation for duties upon imports.

During the late rebellion the United States, for the purpose of preserving its existence, raised armies, bought supplies, and performed all other acts necessary to carry on the war to a successful termination, and it became necessary for Congress to borrow money "on the credit of the United States."

ACT OF JULY 17 AND AUGUST 5, 1861.

The first loan after President Lincoln was inaugurated was under the act of July 17, 1861, authorizing the borrowing on the credit of the United States of $250,000,000 on bonds at 7 per cent. interest, payable after twenty years.

Section 9 of the act is as follows:

And be it further enacted, That the faith of the United States is hereby solemnly pledged for the payment of the interest and the redemption of the principal of the loan authorized by this act.

August 5, 1861, an act was passed supplementary to the act of July 17, 1861.

The bonds issued under these acts bound the Government to pay dollars. There can be no mistake as to the meaning of the word dollars. It was coin, either or both gold and silver of the weight and fineness provided by law. This was prior to the acts authorizing the issue of United States notes known as greenbacks.

FIRST ACT AUTHORIZING THE ISSUE OF UNITED STATES NOTES KNOWN AS GREENBACKS.

The war still progressed, and the necessities of the Government for money with which to purchase supplies and pay other expenses were pressing. So on the 25th of February, 1862, it was enacted, section 1, "that the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to issue on the credit of the United States $150,000,000 of United States notes not bearing interest, payable to bearer at the Treasury of the United States." It was further provided that such notes should be receivable for all debts due the United States, "except duties on imports," and should be received for all claims and demands against the United States, "except for interest upon bonds and notes, which shall be paid in coin;" and they were, with above exceptions, also made a legal tender for all debts, public and private.

These notes did not bear interest; the promise to pay in each note was a promise to pay dollars, and the law in existence said what a dollar was and how much gold or silver it should contain.

Almost all nations of the world during great wars have been compelled to issue in some shape or other their obligations to circulate as money, generally to the practical exclusion of a metallic currency while in circulation.

The French government issued the assignats, which became worthless and were never paid. Our own Government during the revolutionary war issued the continental currency, redeemable in Spanish milled dollars, and which was never redeemed. So when it was decided to issue the greenbacks great doubt was expressed all over the country as to the wisdom of the step, by the democracy, who denounced the party then having control of the Government for violating the Constitution.

It was contended on the other hand that in time of war the power of the Government for its preservation was only limited by necessity; and for the purpose of enabling the Government to pay out and use those notes to a good advantage it was further provided by the original act that they should be fundable upon demand into a six per cent. interest-bearing United States bond, and should be receivable as coin at their par value in payment for any loans that might thereafter be negotiated by the Secretary of the Treasury; and this same act provided, section 2, for the issue of $500,000,000 6 per cent. bonds, bearing interest in coin.

To give the greenback further value section 2 of this same act provided that all stocks, bonds, and other securities held within the United States shall be exempt from taxation by or under State authority. Indeed, I may say that all the bonds and obligations of the Government issued in payment for loans, including the greenbacks issued under different acts of Congress, were by law made non-taxable by State or municipal authorities, and are not taxable to-day.

Section 5 of the same act, authorizing the first issue of greenbacks, provided that all duties should be paid in coin or notes payable on demand, which were coin-notes, and that the proceeds should be applied—

First. To the payment in coin of the interest on the bonds and notes of the United States.

Second. To the payment or purchase of 1 per cent. of all the debt of the United States, to be set apart as a sinking fund.

Third. The residue to be paid into the Treasury.

OTHER ACTS OF CONGRESS DURING THE WAR AUTHORIZING THE ISSUE OF NATIONAL OBLIGATIONS.

The act of July 11, 1862, authorized a further issue of United States notes or greenbacks to the extent of $150,000,000, with similar provisions as the act of February 25, 1862.

The act of March, 1863, authorized the issuing of $900,000,000 6 per cent. interest-bearing bonds of the United States, redeemable at the pleasure of the Government in not less than ten years nor more than forty years, payable in coin, giving the Secretary of the Treasury the power to issue part of same, not exceeding $400,000,000, in Treasury notes, payable at the pleasure of the Government not exceeding three years from date, with 6 per cent. interest, authorizing the exchange of either the bonds or Treasury notes for greenbacks; also authorizing an issue as a part thereof of $150,000,000 of United States notes, and limiting the term for exchange of all United States notes for bonds to on or before the 1st day of July, 1863.

The act of June 30, 1864, authorized the issue of $400,000,000 bonds to run not less than five nor more than thirty years, at 6 per cent. interest in coin.

Section 2 gave the Secretary of the Treasury the power to issue $200,000,000 of this amount in Treasury notes, payable not exceeding three years from date, with 7 3-10 per cent. interest, and to convert said Treasury notes into bonds, and to exchange these interest-bearing Treasury notes for United States notes or greenbacks issued under prior acts of Congress; and the following proviso is attached to said second section:

Provided, That the total amount of bonds and Treasury notes authorized by the first and second sections of this act shall not exceed $400,000,000, in addition to the amounts heretofore issued; nor shall the total amount of United States notes, issued or to be issued, ever exceed $400,000,000, and such additional sum, not exceeding $50,000,000, as may be temporarily required for the redemption of temporary loan.

While it was doubtful how the war would result and whether we were to have a Government or not, the obligations of the Government, both interest and non-interest bearing, decreased in value; for the element of uncertainty as to their payment or, if paid, when they would be paid, produced the inevitable result upon their price.

All these acts were passed during the continuance of the war, and constitute the contract between the Government on the one hand and the holders of the obligations of the Government on the other hand, and which good faith requires the Government to keep and with which the creditor must be satisfied.

The nature of the obligation resting upon the Government under these acts is tersely set forth in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury to Congress as follows:

But the purpose and meaning of the acts in question are not left open for forensic discussion, having been authoritatively settled by the unanimous opinion of the highest judicial tribunal known to our Constitution. As soon after the termination of the war as 1868, it was argued before the Supreme Court that the legal-tender notes of the United States were issued as money, a substitute for metallic currency, and that, having been made legal tender in payment of all debts, including (with certain exceptions) the Government's own, of course, when presented for payment, if similar notes, being legal tender, were offered in exchange for them, the debt would be discharged by a delivery of new notes of the same kind, and so on ad infinitum. To this argument the court replied:

"Apart from the quality of legal tender impressed upon them by acts of Congress, of which we now say nothing, their circulation as currency depends upon the extent to which they are received in payment, on the quantity in circulation, and on the credit given to the promises they bear. In other respects they resemble the bank-notes formerly issued as currency.

"But, on the other hand, it is equally clear that these notes are obligations of the United States. Their name imports obligation. Every one of them expresses upon its face an engagement of the nation to pay the bearer a certain sum. The dollar note is an engagement to pay a dollar, and the dollar intended is the coin dollar of the United States—a certain quantity in weight and fineness of gold or silver, authenticated as such by the stamp of the Government."

This authoritative declaration of the Supreme Court defines clearly and precisely the meaning and intent of Congress in the acts which authorized the issue, and should be accepted as conclusive of the obligation and duty of the Government to provide for the payment in specie of all such issues.

Nor is this all. Subsequent to this decision, and for the purpose of putting a quietus upon the mischievous discussion of the subject, Congress, on the 18th day of March, 1869, declared by public act that "the United States solemnly pledges its faith to make provision at the earliest practicable period for the redemption of the United States notes in coin."

I have referred to these acts of Congress and the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States for the reason that on the part of certain gentlemen upon this floor and a great many throughout the country there appears to be a misapprehension as to what the contract is between the Government on the one hand and its creditors upon the other; and from the above references to the law, as well as a careful examination of the text of the different acts, I am prepared to state—

First. That there is not one dollar of the indebtedness of the United States, interest-bearing or non-interest-bearing bond or greenback, but what the Government has the right, legal, equitable, and moral, under the contract to pay in coin, and that coin is gold or the standard silver dollar of the fineness and weight provided by law at the time the indebtedness was made.

Second. It further appears that the faith of the Government is pledged to collect duties on imports in coin (either gold or silver, or both) for the payment of interest upon the public debt.

Third. That the faith of the Government is pledged, until the redemption of the greenbacks, never to issue more than $400,000,000 of the same.

Having shown the right under the contract to pay our debt in gold and silver, or either, let us inquire briefly as to the policy of paying our debts in silver as well as in gold.

THE POLICY OF PAYMENT OF OUR DEBT IN SILVER AS WELL AS GOLD.

A discussion of this branch of the subject will make necessary an inquiry as to the amount of gold and silver in the world. The office of money and the effect of making it plenty or scarce, cheap or dear, upon production and commerce, and more particularly the effect of making it cheap or dear upon contracts in existence, and after those contracts are made to pay "dollars," having reference to the dollar established by law at the time the contract was made; and first as to the amount of silver and gold in existence and the production of the same.

The statisticians and political economists in the world agree substantially, after careful consideration of the subject, in estimating for use in the arts and for coin—

Gold at	$5,800,000,000
Silver at	5,600,000,000
Making a total of	11,400,000,000

About one-half of this amount ($5,700,000,000) is coin, of which there is in use in the commercial world—

Gold coin	$2,600,000,000
Silver coin	1,000,000,000

I mean by the commercial world those countries other than the oriental, while the amount in circulation in the eastern or oriental countries is estimated at (mostly silver) $2,100,000,000.

As to the amount of gold and silver in the world, our efficient statistician at the head of the Bureau of Statistics, Mr. Edward Young, substantially concurs with the above estimate, as shown by a letter which he writes me, as follows:

BUREAU OF STATISTICS, July 12, 1876.

The aggregate gold product of the world for the past twenty-seven years, 1849 to 1875, both inclusive, is estimated at	$2,761,700,000
The aggregate silver product of the world for the same period is estimated at	1,573,900,000
Making the aggregate production of precious metals for the twenty-seven years, 1849 to 1875	4,335,600,000

The present stock of precious metals for use in the world (for coinage and the arts) has been estimated by trustworthy investigators at from $11,000,000,000 to $13,000,000,000—say a mean of $12,000,000,000.

EDWARD YOUNG,
Chief of Bureau.

Hon. J. G. CANNON, M. C.

As to the production of gold and silver annually from 1852 to 1875, inclusive, I give a tabular statement as reprinted from the Paris Journal des Économistes for March, and which statement agrees substantially with information from other sources. It will be observed the production of gold is decreasing:

Year.	Gold.	Silver.	Total gold and silver.
1852	$182,500,000	$40,500,000	$223,000,000
1853	155,000,000	40,500,000	195,500,000
1854	127,000,000	40,500,000	167,500,000
1855	135,000,000	40,500,000	175,500,000
1856	147,500,000	40,500,000	188,000,000
1857	133,000,000	40,500,000	173,500,000
1858	124,500,000	40,500,000	165,000,000
1859	124,500,000	40,500,000	165,000,000
1860	119,000,000	40,500,000	159,500,000
1861	114,000,000	42,500,000	156,500,000
1862	107,500,000	45,000,000	152,500,000
1863	107,000,000	49,000,000	156,000,000
1864	113,000,000	51,500,000	164,500,000
1865	120,000,000	52,000,000	172,000,000
1866	121,000,000	50,500,000	171,500,000
1867	116,000,000	54,000,000	170,000,000
1868	120,000,000	50,000,000	170,000,000
1869	121,000,000	47,500,000	168,500,000
1870	116,000,000	51,500,000	167,500,000
1871	116,500,000	61,000,000	177,500,000
1872	101,500,000	65,000,000	166,500,000
1873	103,500,000	70,000,000	173,500,000
1874	90,500,000	71,500,000	162,000,000
1875	97,500,000	62,000,000	159,500,000

MONEY—WHAT IS IT?

Money has been defined by many political economists, and it is somewhat strange that people should wrangle about the definition of that article which moves the world and is at the bottom of all enterprise and labor, and for which we toil from the cradle to the grave. Suffice it to say, as defined by economists and which definition is approved by common sense—

It is an instrument designed equitably to measure the value of commodities and services with the view to effect their exchange either at present or in the future and throughout the world.

If all nations, individuals, and corporations were out of debt, then it would make but little difference whether a large or small amount of coin was called a dollar. To illustrate: It would make but little difference whether a dime or a dollar was the representative used to measure the value and effect the exchange of a pair of shoes made in Massachusetts for a bushel of corn raised in Kansas, the shoes passing from the maker in Massachusetts through the dealer in Kansas to the person who wears them, and the corn passing from the farmer who produced it in Kansas through the dealer in Massachusetts to the consumer; but in the development, production, and commerce of any country, corporations, individuals, and governments make ventures, contract debts, and generally in the aggregate follow those manifold pursuits that tend to the well-being of each individual and result in the happiness, strength, and power of the whole as a people. From these transactions the relation of debtor and creditor is formed, and the commodity or other capital advanced by the creditor and received by the debtor and agreed to be returned is measured by dollars.

The farmer in Illinois who promises to pay the lumberman of Michigan $1,000 for lumber has no intention of going to Nevada or California and of actually mining the amount of silver or gold, having it coined, necessary to pay that $1,000, but he expects to grow the corn and wheat and grass or cattle and hogs necessary to exchange for the thousand dollars with which to pay the lumberman; hence it is necessary that the dollar or the standard by which values are measured should be maintained by Government and should be in justice to everybody as stable and certain as possible; and as we trade all over the world, this same dollar or standard of value should be as nearly universal as possible, and the creditor who has the obligation of the debtor to pay him a thousand dollars in coin, that coin at the time of the contract being fixed, as a standard of value, at 25.8 grains of standard gold to the dollar or 412½ grains of standard silver to the dollar. Who insists when payment is made that it should be in dollars, weighing 50 grains of gold instead of 25, or dollars weighing 1,000 grains of silver instead of 412½ grains, or would say let us not have silver as a standard of value at all, pay me in gold dollars, and thereby silver as compared with gold is not as valuable as when the debt was contracted, would be attempting to act unfairly and by artifice to get more than he was to have; or the debtor who would say let us make a dollar out of 12 grains of gold instead of 25, or out of 200 grains of silver instead of 412½ grains, or would insist on making a dollar out of brass, which should be a legal tender in addition to the gold and silver and of not half the value of gold and silver dollars, and insist on paying his debt in brass dollars, would be acting unfairly and seeking by artifice to pay less than he agreed.

What has been done in reference to the debts the Government owes and that individuals owe, and the reason for action of the parties?

I have already called attention to the fact that at the time our debt was contracted a certain amount of both gold and silver constituted a dollar. It is estimated that $1,000,000,000 of this debt is held by people of foreign nations, most of it in Great Britain and Germany. Silver is not used in Great Britain as money except for subsidiary coin, and since the Franco-Prussian war and within the last three years Germany, Denmark, Sweden, and Norway have ceased to use silver as standard money and have adopted the use of gold as a standard, and Dr. Linderman, the Director of the Mint, estimates the amount of silver that is being retired from the circulation in Germany and thrown upon the markets of the world at $300,000,000, and about the same amount in the other nations.

And, strange to say, the United States being the debtor nation, having the right to pay that debt in gold and silver of a certain fineness, with her vast mineral wealth, especially of silver, that is being developed by the labor, pluck, and energy of Americans under the lead of science and experience, has unwittingly assented to the demonetization of silver.

This legislation was had in the Forty-second Congress, February 12, 1873, by a bill to regulate the mints of the United States, and practically abolished silver as money by failing to provide for the coinage of the silver dollar. It was not discussed, as shown by the RECORD, and neither members of Congress nor the people understood the scope of the legislation.

The result is that gold has become the only standard by which values are measured, silver ceasing to be used as money, and gold as compared with silver has become more valuable, and silver as compared with gold has become less valuable, so that if we actually pay in gold, not having the privilege to pay silver, we have decreased our ability to pay by at least from 20 to 30 per cent.; in other words, we decrease our ability to pay by the amount of silver we have to pay with, it no longer being available to us to pay in discharge of our indebtedness the same as gold.

But the objection may be urged that we have not a large amount of silver with which to pay our debts, and therefore it cannot make much difference whether silver is demonetized or not. A complete answer to that is, first, that so far as we have silver or can mine it or buy it with our commodities, we have the right to use it in payment of our debts according to the contract; and, for that matter, the same thing may be said of gold, that we have not a large amount of it in comparison with our debt with which to pay. But a more complete answer to such objection is that practically we pay the greater portion of our debts in cotton, corn, wheat, meats, and such other commodities as we sell or export, and that the value in dollars of what we sell is measured by gold if it is the only standard of value, or by gold and silver if they both constitute the standard; so if you decrease the amount of the standard by which the values of commodities are to be measured from 20 to 30 per cent. by demonetizing silver, the necessary consequence is the gold, in measuring the value of cotton, corn, &c., has the same office to perform that the gold and silver both performed, and the creditor gains while the debtor loses. The debtor is bound to pay the number of dollars he contracted to pay, but the dollar is more valuable than it was when he made the contract. Dr. Linderman, Director of the Mint, fully understood this, for in his report for the year 1873, page 21, he says:

> The gradual adoption of the gold standard, and consequent demonetization of silver, will of course be followed by an increase in the value of gold, or what is the same thing, a decrease in the price of articles measured by it. Indeed it is quite certain that this effect is already perceptible in some portions of Europe. Be that as it may, however, it is safe to assume that Germany will soon have substituted three hundred millions of gold for silver heretofore used as standard money, and that Denmark, Sweden, and Norway will require nearly as much more in consequence of changing their standard from silver to gold. Now, add to the foregoing the requirements of France and the United States in the near future, and it will be readily understood that gold must appreciate in value.
>
> It is true that the mines of the world produce annually about one hundred millions of gold; but in considering this as a stock to be drawn upon for coinage, it must be remembered that the consumption of gold in the arts has largely increased during the last twenty-three years, and now approximates to about twenty-five millions per annum.

SOME OF THE EFFECTS OF DEMONETIZING SILVER.

At the time our debt was contracted the standard silver dollar as compared with the gold dollar was of a little greater value, and so continued until after silver was demonetized. Since 1873, however, gold as compared with silver has grown more valuable; and to show how much more valuable, take the price of silver in gold in Liverpool on the 10th day of July, (this month,) and the price of a greenback dollar in gold, the gold being at 12 per cent. premium, counting gold as the unit of value at par:

One dollar in gold	$1 00
The value of the greenback in gold is	89
The value of the standard silver dollar (412½ grains) is	79

And let me here say that we have just as much right under our contract to call silver the unit or standard of value and par, and to say that the greenback is above par by 11 per cent. and gold above par by 24 per cent. as advocates of the gold standard have to claim that gold should be the unit or standard of value, and that greenbacks are below par and silver is below par.

Notice, the greenback dollar is worth over 11 per cent. more than the silver dollar. The reason is that, silver being demonetized and gold become more valuable and silver less valuable, the greenback is payable in gold, which, becoming more valuable, of course makes the greenback, as well as all the other securities of the United States, more valuable and harder to pay.

Now, then, let us remonetize silver. There is, as before shown, about as much silver in value in the world as there is gold. The result will be that silver, as compared with gold, will grow more valuable; gold, as compared with silver, will grow less valuable, and they will meet, each traveling half way, at about the value of the greenback; and thus we would have silver at par with gold, gold at par with silver, and the greenback at par with gold and silver.

But the objection is made that the United States may remonetize silver and that Germany and the other nations will not. In answer, I say so much the greater necessity for the United States remonetizing silver; that is the only way we can get even, for by adopting the gold standard only they have made the dollar more valuable than it was when they bought our bonds and loaned us their capital; and silver ceasing to be used as money, silver coin is thrown upon the market, and has depreciated as compared with gold. Now, if we remonetize silver that will create a demand for it here, and it will flow into this country in exchange for our products, and we will in turn use it in paying our debts in common with gold as between each other, and in paying the $50,000,000 to $70,000,000 of annual interest upon our foreign debt.

Mr. Speaker, I have very great respect for the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] and also many gentleman on the other side of the House who oppose the legislation spoken of, but I do not agree with him in denouncing the proposition to remonetize silver and paying our debts with it as swindling, and his stigmatizing silver with the term "cheap and nasty." Sir, it has with gold been used as money for ages past, and will be, in my opinion, for ages to come. It is in common with gold the money of the Constitution, and whether it has grown less valuable or gold has grown more valuable is not the question. By the letter and spirit of the contract we have the right to pay every dollar of the indebtedness of the United States in standard silver dollars weighing 412½ grains, nine-tenths of it fine silver and one-tenth of it alloy as well as in gold, and I should like to know what right the gentleman has to denounce as swindling a proposition to do what we contracted to do. I suppose if gold were cheaper than silver then the gentleman would say it is swindling to pay in gold.

If the gentleman owed me $10,000 and by the contract had the option to pay it either in gold dollars or silver dollars, and had to be industrious and economize to pay either, does he claim that it would be swindling to pay me in silver dollars because they were the cheapest? If the gentleman did business in that way on his private account, before six months had elapsed any court would appoint a conservator to take charge of his property and manage his estate.

Sir, it is the only practicable route that I can see to a resumption of the business of the country upon the basis of specie; it fills the measure of the contract from every stand-point; it enables us to keep the public faith and honor; it stops the rapacity of the creditor on the one hand, who unfairly seeks to increase the value of his credits by having the contract changed in his favor, and it stops the power of the politician on the other hand, who seeks to avail himself of the present depression and hard times to ride into power under the promise to set the printing-presses in motion and make money and give it value without labor by mere force of legislative enactment.

Mr. Speaker, it is urged that it is not practicable to coin large amounts of the standard silver dollar soon enough and fast enough for use. This objection is not well taken. The Director of the Mint informs me that the mints can turn out subsidiary coins in addition to required gold coin and minor coinage $2,000,000 monthly, and an equal amount of silver dollars monthly, and that with reasonable appropriations the capacity of the mints can be increased. I further want to state that it is not necessary for large payments, to have silver or gold coined in large amounts, for the act of 1869, which was merely declaratory of the contracts in regard to the public indebtedness and was also the foundation for refunding a large part of it at a lower rate of interest, is as follows:

The faith of the United States is solemnly pledged to the payment in coin or its equivalent of all the obligations of the United States not bearing interest, known as United States notes, and of all the interest-bearing obligations of the United States, except in cases where the law authorizing the issue of any such obligation has expressly provided that the same may be paid in lawful money or other currency than gold and silver.

What is the equivalent of coin? I answer, gold and silver bullion of the fineness of coin; and for large payments this could be tested and used in large amounts. The word "equivalent" in the act could mean nothing more or less than this. Then this gold and silver coin or bullion would be receivable for all dues payable to the United States, including duties upon imports; and for convenience the bullion could be deposited in the Treasury and coin certificates issued redeemable in the bullion.

THE RESUMPTION ACT.

Mr. Speaker, I want to say a word with reference to that clause of the so-called resumption act which fixes the 1st day of January, 1879, to redeem the Treasury notes on demand in coin. Experience, especially in matters of finance, is better than theory, and I am satisfied from observation that part of the act should be repealed and have so voted constantly when that proposition was pending before the House. I believe it is admitted by all that it is a mere declaration without any vital force to make it practicable, and tends with other causes to deter men of enterprise from embarking in the various industries of the country, for the reason that they are doubtful as to what legislation will be had touching same or what will be its effect.

Those who oppose its repeal say that they are willing it should be repealed and believe it should be, but want something in its place that looks toward resumption, or, in other words, that they will not take a step backward. To such I submit in all candor and fairness that the passage of a bill remonetizing silver, with the influx of silver necessarily resulting therefrom, would equalize the value of gold and silver and greenbacks, then the victory would be won; for if we had the power to exchange greenbacks on demand for either gold or silver we would not voluntarily do so longer than until the novelty wore away, for, with the Frenchman who rushed to the bank that was being run upon and demanded his money, when it was counted to him, we would exclaim: "If you have the money, we don't want it. If you have it not, we must have it."

Mr. Speaker, I am in the minority in the House. I have been trying for months to get the floor to present my views upon this question and urge legislation touching the same. I suppose I have no right to complain at not being able to do so as I am not on the Banking and Currency or Ways and Means Committee, which have charge of the presentation of matters of this kind to the House; and with three hundred members all clamoring for the floor one's turn does not come often when he desires to be heard upon some question not coming from his committee. But I want to say to the other side of the House that one-tenth part of the time given to the maturity and consideration of this measure that is used in the effort to make capital for the fall campaign will suffice to perfect the details and pass the bill.

There is another reason why this legislation should be had at once. It would settle the money question permanently. If there is any one thing more than another that paralyzes business it is the power Congress has, with our unsettled condition of finance, to tinker with the currency; it sets the theorist, the politician, and the speculator to work proposing all manner of schemes to better our condition, nine-tenths of which are purely impracticable or thoroughly selfish; the producer and the trader are kept in a state of feverish excitement, doubtful as to what bad results may follow from unwise legislation. There is but one way out of it: restore the money of the Constitution by remonetizing silver; give the Government and each individual the chance to comply with its or his contract; nothing more and nothing less. Then the laws governing demand and supply will regulate the money and the credit of the country as they regulate the production of corn and wheat; and under the operation of that primal law imposed upon man by the Creator, "By the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread," each individual, under stable laws and stable money, will work out his own salvation, and as a people we enter upon a secure and stable era of prosperity.

State of the Union.

SPEECH OF HON. W. P. CALDWELL,

OF TENNESSEE,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

June 29, 1876.

The House being as in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee, said:

Mr. SPEAKER: The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, my remarks to-day will be addressed to several questions having a relation to that most comprehensive subject.

In the century now drawing to a close the population of the country has increased from two and one-half to forty-five millions. Its area has been extended from eight hundred thousand square miles, as it was at the period of the Revolution, to three and one-half millions of square miles, which it reached at the date of the purchase of Alaska in 1867,* so that to-day it is twice that of the Roman Empire—as estimated by Gibbon—at the period of its most extended dominion. The vast territory protected by its flag—on the East with an Atlantic front facing Europe and on the West with a Pacific coast looking on Asia—is as broad as the continent, and has more than realized the ideal of the sanguine men of the Revolution. In the troublous times that foreshadowed the breach with the mother-country, the impulsive Otis said in a moment of exultation that he seemed to himself hear "the prophetic strains of the sibyls chanting the spring-time of a great empire."

As the celestial light of the gospel—

Said Nathaniel Ames more than a century ago—

was directed here by the finger of God, it will finally drive the long, long night of heathenish darkness from America. Arts and sciences will change the face of nature in their tour hence over the Appalachian Mountains to the western ocean, and as they march through the vast desert the residence of wild beasts will be broken up and their obscene howl hushed forever. * * * The rocks will disclose their hidden gems and the inestimable treasures of gold and silver be broken up. Huge mountains of iron-ore are already discovered, and vast stores are reserved for future generations. This metal, more useful than gold and silver, will employ millions of hands, not only to form the martial sword and peaceful share alternately, but an infinity of utensils improved in the exercise of art and handicraft among men. Nature through all her works has stamped authority on this law, that all fit matter shall be improved to its best purposes. Shall not then those vast quarries that teem with mechanic stone—those for structure be piled into great cities, and those for sculpture be used to perpetuate the honor of renowned heroes—even those who shall now save their country? O, ye unborn inhabitants of America, when your eyes behold the sun after he has rolled the season round for two or three centuries more know that in A. D. 1738 we dreamed of your times!

This remarkable prediction has by more than a century anticipated its almost literal fulfillment. "The vast desert" that then awaited in the order of Providence the magic influence of an advancing race, imbued with the impulse of a new civilization, is now the seat of empire. The thirteen feeble colonies, rising through an ordeal of fire first to the dignity of free and independent States and then to rank among the nations as a Union of States that year after year expanded itself for an enlarging membership, advancing through struggles, reverses, dissensions, and triumphs, present to-day the spectacle of a respected and powerful Government wielding jurisdiction over thirty-seven sovereignties. Here are so many peoples differing in local laws and institutions, but still possessing affinities of race, language, religion, and ideas to be blended together and molded by a wise and prudent statesmanship into the groundwork of a triumphant and enduring nationality.

As the country has grown in territory, population, and wealth, the difficulty and expense of the administration of its government have correspondingly increased.

The manner of the administration and disbursement of the revenues is a fair criterion of the political morals of the men or party in whose hands may be lodged for the time being the powers of Government. "When the wicked rule the people mourn." If extravagant and corrupt administration of the revenues be long tolerated in republican government, it may be safely assumed that corruption has reached and taints the fountain of power. Hence the most encouraging of all the signs in the history of the last few years was afforded by the elections of 1874 that so completely revolutionized this body, to which, more than to any other branch of Government, responsibility attaches for wasteful and extravagant use of the public revenues. After making adequate allowance for the necessity that existed for increased burdens arising out of the greatly changed condition of the country, the impression still existed that too much money was expended in the administration of Government. This impression ripened into conviction, which found an expression that could not be

*The area of the United States was estimated in 1783 at 820,680 square miles; in 1854, at 2,936,166; in 1868, at about 3,466,000. The following are the statistics of the area:

	Square miles.
Original limits of the thirteen States	820, 680
Louisiana, purchased of France in 1803, for $15,000,000	899, 579
Florida, purchased of Spain in 1809, for $3,000,000	66, 900
Territory confirmed by Oregon treaty in 1842 and 1846	308, 052
Texas annexed in 1846, (Texas debt,) $7,500,000	318, 000
New Mexico and California in 1847, (cost of war,) $15,000,000	522, 955
Arizona, purchased of Mexico in 1854, for $10,000,000	30, 000
Alaska, purchased of Russia in 1867, for $7,200,000	500, 000
	3, 466, 146

—Frothingham's Rise of the Republic, page 3.

mistaken in the verdict of that year. No reasonable construction could be put upon that utterance that would relieve it of the character of an emphatic demand for retrenchment and reform—to use the language of Mr. Jefferson—"for economy in the public expenditures that labor may be lightly burdened."

REDUCTION OF EXPENDITURES.

I beg your attention briefly to the response which has been returned to this imperative demand by the democratic majority in this Hall. The committee presided over by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, and which is especially charged with the matter of appropriations, has devoted itself with untiring zeal to the performance of its arduous labors, and the results, notwithstanding the many obstacles it had to encounter, will no doubt meet the public approval and be construed as an assurance that there is a determination to bring back the Government to the old-time policy of honesty, economy, and purity in the administration of its finances. These results are embodied in a comparative statement, kindly furnished me by the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations, which shows that the reductions already made by bills that have passed the House and those yet to be made by pending bills amount to nearly forty millions! And thus the democratic majority in this Hall propose to show that the Government can be administered at 25 per cent. less expense than is imposed under republican rule upon the over-burdened tax-payers of the country. The issue of this effort is now and must be for some weeks uncertain, as it is impossible to foresee what action may be taken upon it at the other end of this Capitol. If we may judge from the resistance it has met from the republican side of this Hall while under consideration here, its fate may be considered as yet in great doubt. The country, however, will know where to attach responsibility for the defeat of a policy for which it has so unmistakably pronounced.

Mr. Speaker, absurd and ridiculous as the imputation may be, gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber have not hesitated to intimate that many of those supporting these reductions have been controlled by the traitorous purpose to embarrass and cripple the public service. I do not hesitate to say that my faith in the capacity of the people for self-government would be shaken, aye, destroyed, if I could believe the public mind ready for an imposition so gross, so monstrous, and so insulting. It is a malignant and wicked aspersion, the motive of which cannot be mistaken, for it springs from the same impulse that has prompted more than one effort upon this floor to keep alive and fan into flame, if possible, embers that every patriot should wish were extinguished forever.

OUR DOMESTIC RELATIONS.

I believe, sir, that thoughtful and well-meaning men of all parties recognize a necessity for a restoration of confidence and cordial relations between the once belligerent sections. The wounds of the nation are not fully healed, and a policy tending to their complete cicatrization is demanded by every consideration of material prosperity and permanent national integrity.

A wise statesmanship should guard well against the deplorable consequences of a deep-seated chronic hostility, that might grow out of the continued and persistent partisan agitation of unhappy sectional issues. It should wisely avail itself of the benign influences of this centennial era to consolidate the true union sentiment that exists in all sections, to the end that the Government may be in fact what it is in theory, a union of States and a nation of people, having one hope, one sentiment, and one destiny. But what can be expected in this direction of a party that, springing from a great sectional controversy, seems to be able to live only in its memories; that appeals again and again to the unmanly prejudices and wicked passions that were born of that unhappy strife? No impartial man who has given attention to public affairs can question the fairness of this characterization of that party. Its record made on this floor during this session vindicates at once the truth and justness of the charge; and to it for a little while I invite the attention of the House.

The first debate, as will be remembered by the House, of a partisan character that occurred here after organization was upon the bill of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] granting universal amnesty. The country has not so soon forgotten the manner in which that proposition was received by the other side, marked as it was by an unusual degree of bitterness, prejudice, and denunciation on the part of some gentlemen who participated in the debate. The effort to manufacture out of the question political capital at the expense of the quiet and harmony of the country was too apparent to be mistaken. The cruelties of Alva, the horrors of Bartholomew, the terrors of the Spanish inquisition were not invoked without a purpose. An advantage to a sinking party or to a rising candidate was the stake, and the game was boldly played at the hazard of the public peace. It will not be forgotten that the proposition for amnesty failing of a two-thirds vote was defeated, but it may not be so well remembered that in that debate the motive of the opposition was exposed and its inconsistency palpably shown by the record which they themselves had made upon the same question in the Forty-third Congress, to which your attention is invited. I read from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Forty-third Congress:

GENERAL AMNESTY.

Mr. MAYNARD. I am instructed by the Committee on the Rules, acting upon a resolution submitted to them the other day, to report the bill which I send to the desk. It has met the unanimous approval of the committee, and when it has been read I will, unless some gentleman wishes to ask questions or to make opposition to it, move the previous question. * * *

Mr. LAWRENCE. Would not that admit Jeff. Davis to a seat on this floor?

Several MEMBERS. Certainly.

The question of order was raised whether the committee had the right at the time to report the bill, and it was declared by the Chair that it had not.

Mr. MAYNARD. Then I move to suspend the rules so as to allow the committee to report this bill and to pass it. And in answer to the question propounded by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE], I tell him frankly that this bill will, if enacted, admit the president of the southern confederacy just as the vice-president has been already admitted to a seat in either house of Congress, provided the people where he lives see proper to send him here. It is general amnesty as recommended by the President: and it also repeals what is called the test oath, substituting for it the modified oath that we have all heard so often.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I do not object to the bill if it has been considered and reported by a committee.

Mr. MAYNARD. It is reported by the Committee on the Rules unanimously.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. All right.

The SPEAKER. The bill would require a two-thirds vote to pass it.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move that the rules be suspended and the bill passed.

Mr. COX. Is there any objection to passing it unanimously? The President recommends amnesty, and let us all wind up this foolish business of taking the test oath.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] objects, and that is sufficient.

The question was taken on Mr. Maynard's motion; and on a division there were—ayes 141, noes 29.

So (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill (H. R. No. 472) was passed.

This bill found its grave in the Senate. It is worthy of remark that it had its origin in the Committee on the Rules, and was reported to the House by unanimous consent of that committee, Mr. Maynard acting as chairman, and then contemplating what he very soon thereafter made, a race for governor of the State of Tennessee.

How can the consistency of the republican party upon this subject be successfully vindicated? How is it that universal amnesty is a proper thing to be granted by a republican House and resisted by that party when offered by a democratic House? The motive of the leaders cannot be disguised nor mistaken. The exigencies of party were imperative. It demanded to be re-organized and re-animated with the spirit of the times that gave it birth. The citizen soldiery, grown weary of internal strife, were not to be permitted to catch the spirit of the centennial year and forget the unhappy dissensions of the past. Their intelligence was to be insulted and their manhood degraded by having an appeal like this addressed to them, "Behold, ye who fought for the integrity of the Government, the first act of a democratic House is to pardon and amnesty the leader of the rebellion and the author of the unspeakable horrors of its prison life. It is true that in the last House of Representatives we did the same thing, and it was a very proper thing for us to do, because to the saints all things are saintly; but amnesty from a democratic Congress is an insult to you and to the memory of your dead comrades."

Such is the record of the republican party on the subject of amnesty. Further comment upon it is deemed unnecessary.

Members upon this floor will not soon forget the debate that occurred upon the proposition to restore the veterans of the war of 1812 to the pension-rolls and allow them arrearages that had accrued during the long period of disability, a disability fixed upon them for participation in or sympathy with the rebellion. The proposition, emanating from a committee of this House, was stubbornly resisted and in the end defeated by the republican side of the Hall. It was in vain that we appealed to their action on a former occasion, in the Forty-third Congress, in support of the propriety and justice of the proposition. An opportunity was presented, as they thought, to manufacture a little political capital out of the question by placing the democracy before the country upon one side of the war and themselves upon the other; and they attempt to avail themselves of it though at the expense of their consistency. By an almost solid republican vote the arrearages to the veterans were stricken out. Contrast now their action upon the same measure when before the Forty-third Congress, as the same appears on page 2109 of the RECORD of that Congress?

Mr. Sprague, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and the War of 1812, reported back a bill to amend the act entitled "An Act granting pensions to certian soldiers and sailors of the war of 1812 and the widows of the deceased soldiers," approved February 14, 8171, and to restore to the pension-rolls those persons whose names were stricken therefrom in consequence of disloyalty, with the recommendation that it do pass.

During its discussion Mr. Butler, of Massachusetts, offered an amendment, which was adopted, striking out the proviso to the fifth section of the bill; which was as follows:

Provided, That the restoration and pension contemplated herein shall take effect from the passage of this act.

Mr. Butler said he was opposed to confiscating the pensions of these soldiers who had been stricken from the rolls on account of disloyalty. While the war was going on, while the Union was still unrestored, it was a very proper thing to cut off the pensions of all those who were disloyal; but he could not see why the pensions of those men should be confiscated by the Government while no other property is confiscated.

The proviso was stricken out without even a division, and the bill passed.

This "going back" at this session upon its record in the last Congress upon this question indicates that while amnesty and oblivion may bring healing to the country, they do in the opinion of its leaders bring death to the republican party. These leaders recognize that the vitality of their organization depends upon the maintenance of a rigid sectionalism, in which element only can it "live, move, and have its being;" and they thus lead it back to the war and its unhappy memories in the wicked hope that at those bitter waters it may haply find a renewal of its waning life.

"CONFEDERATE HOUSE."

As indicating this general purpose, I may allude to the persistent designation of this body by the republican press as the "confederate House of Representatives." This catch-word, which is to do its miserable service for the opposition in the approaching compaign, is a reminder to the country that in these seats are some who were the partisans of the "lost cause," and that in the organization of the House a few confederate soldiers are provided with employment, from which during ten years of peace they had been excluded. No complaint is made on any hand that the last resting-place of the dead confederate soldier is unmarked by monumental marble reared at the expense of a grateful Government. No complaint is or will ever be made on behalf of him who survived that service with lost or mutilated limb; that no generous government supplies him with the substitutes of the highest art, and gives him a place for life on a pension-list that entails an annual burden of $30,000,000 upon the resources of the country. Such a complaint would be absurd. But was it either absurd or a delusion in him to suppose that after ten years of loyal submission to the authority of the Government, during which he had borne uncomplainingly his proportion of the vast burden imposed for the benefit of his successful competitor in arms, he was so far restored to citizenship and equal rights as to be entitled to hold the miserable post of messenger or doorkeeper about this Hall? It is painful, sir, to see manifestations of a sentiment any where, either North or South, demanding the perpetual proscription of men for following with manly faith to their logical results political doctrines that received the sanction of many honored names; doctrines that may be said to have had for their greatest master, if not their author, a statesman whose eminent private and public virtues made him the peer of the foremost men of his time.

The issue which Mr. Calhoun presented and pressed with so much ability in his time at last found its solution in the highest tribunal upon earth, the forum of kings, the only tribunal having full jurisdiction between nations and fragments of nations. There it was adjudicated that to any State or combination of States there is no way of escape from the authority of this Government except through the gate of forcible and successful revolution; that these States are associated in a bond of union that is indissoluble except by the consent of the people; that the Constitution and laws passed in pursuance thereof are paramount; that the Government can vindicate its authority by force, and is itself the judge of the nature and extent of its powers. So that whatever evil may have been entailed by the gigantic struggle, that evil was not unmixed, for it was attended by the elimination from American politics of all pretense of a principle that would at uncertain intervals have been returning to vex the country, in the end devoting it to a state of chronic instability, utterly incompatible with the great purposes for which the National Government was instituted.

War, civil war—

Says a distinguished American author, Dr. Draper—

with its dread punishments is not without its uses. In no other school than that of war can society learn subordination; in no other can it be made to appreciate order. * * * I turn from the contemplation of a disorganization of the Republic, each State, and county, and town sitting up for itself—I turn from that to a future, I see in prospect—an imperial race organizing its intellect, concentrating it, and voluntarily submitting to be controlled by its reason.

And in this connection, Mr. Speaker, I cannot forbear referring gentlemen of the republican party who cherish a prejudice fostered by extreme views upon this subject, and who doubtless remember the unquestioned historical fact that the legislation of the original colonies recognized human bondage the subjects of which were the African race, I cannot forbear to refer such gentlemen to and commend to their consideration a charitable and Christian view which Mr. Lincoln in his second inaugural address from the steps of this Capitol presented of the great controversy then pending and undetermined:

But let us judge not, that we be not judged. The Almighty has his own purposes. "Woe unto the world because of offenses, for it must needs be that offenses come; but woe to that man by whom the offense cometh." If we shall suppose that African slavery is one of these offenses which in the providence of God must needs come, but which having continued through his appointed time He now wills to remove and that He gives to both North and South this terrible war as the woe due to those by whom the offense came, shall we discern therein any departure from those divine attributes which the believers in a living God always ascribe to him?

However much of error, Mr. Speaker, you may predicate of conduct prompted by a conscientious faith in the peculiar constitutional theory the practical assertion of which precipitated the war, the enlightened sentiment of the world will pause before giving its assent to a harsher characterization. And I beg you, sir, to bear in mind that throughout this long and at times stormy session you have heard no utterance from the lips of those who trod the perilous and bloody path of revolution inconsistent with the oft-repeated assertion of the utter abandonment of the theory of secession—here where are daily seen the senators, cabinet ministers, and generals of the extinct confederacy. An untiring zeal, a perfect self-devotion to the transaction of the public business, a commanding ability, often painfully prominent, in debate upon great historical and constitutional questions have with all generous minds placed the sincerity of the avowal beyond question. How much longer, then, shall the public patience be abused by a partisan cry that would by cowardly implication impute to such public servants either dishonest or unpatriotic motives?

On the 24th of the last month a political convention met at the capitol of a great and flourishing State in the West and adopted a series of resolutions, one of which was the following:

2. That the policy of leniency by the republican party toward the people recently in rebellion against Federal authority having resulted in death by violence of at least five thousand Unionists, white and black, since the commencement of the present policy of reconstruction; also in placing in power in the lower House of Congress a political party nominated by ex-confederates; and finally in relegating back into the control of disloyal whites nearly every State reconquered to Federal authority by Federal arms, it is the duty of the executive branch of the Government to extend especial care over Union men throughout all the South, so that there, not only in name but in reality, American citizenship shall be as secure as it is in foreign lands and upon foreign seas.

A leading journal in that State, published in the city of Chicago, is authority for the statement that this resolution was received with more demonstrations of approval than any other one of the series. The reading of it was interrupted by applause, and at the conclusion of the reading "the whole convention and the large crowd of spectators applauded most earnestly." When the formal vote on the adoption of the entire series was taken there was only one negative vote in a delegated assemblage of more than six hundred men.

I have not quoted this resolution for the purpose of commenting upon the grave issues it presents when considered as involving the personal honor of several millions of people, for men cannot live nor States exist without dishonor in the daily commission of murder and treason. I might be inclined to speak of the cool, calculating malignity that could prompt the publication of such an indictment against a whole people did I not find a fit rebuke to hand, administered at Graceland on Decoration Day by a citizen of Illinois distinguished for his charity, his humanity, and his genius. Said Rev. Robert Collyer in his address on that occasion:

I notice that in our race in the old days there has been a great faculty for forgiving. In my own mother-country, where they used to come to the death-clinch sometimes and fight it out with fearful havoc, they never cherished their bitterness very long after they were through with their fighting. The white rose and the red would twine together about the door of the cabin and the castle. The cavalier and the puritan would sit by the same fireside. It is human instinct to have it out and then shake hands and be friends. It is what we must do for the living and the dead. I count every attempt to rake up the old trouble a violent, bitter thing, unworthy of our nation and our great Anglo-Saxon family, and I am ashamed of the men of my own State who could say the thing that has just been said in our own State capital, that they might add wormwood to gall.

We are one family North and South. We have one destiny in our heart. We can only work out that destiny through peace and good-will. On this summer-morning as we stand together the dust of these dead men is rising. The sun cannot tell which is rebel dust and which is loyal. It is all one to the sun. The rain cannot tell as it falls so sweetly on the graves. It is all one to the rain. It blends in the grass, blows in the flowers; it blends all together, for so God wills. It cannot be otherwise in our hearts if we are true. We must be great as God, as meet and pure as nature, as catholic and as tender. We are all one family, kith and kin clear through. We must go home nourishing the grand, sweet charity which can be the only worthy feeling of a generous and victorious heart.

To this brave, true-hearted Christian man "every attempt to rake up the old trouble is a violent, bitter thing, unworthy of our nation and our great Anglo-Saxon family." Speaking with especial reference to the resolution which I have read, he says, with an emphasis that does him infinite honor:

I am ashamed of the men of my own State who could say the thing that has just been said in our own State capital, that they might add wormwood to gall.

And here, Mr. Speaker, I would contrast with the noble utterances of this Christian hero the language of the national republican convention. Professing indeed "to deprecate all sectional feeling and tendencies," it belies that profession by repeated and false allusions to the unhappy past:

The democratic party is the same as when it sympathized with treason; it makes its control of the House of Representatives the triumph and the opportunity of the nation's recent foes; it re-asserts and applauds in the national Capitol the sentiments of unrepented rebellion; it sends Union soldiers to the rear and promotes confederate soldiers to the front.

Here is a "violent, bitter thing," for it is an attempt "to rake up the old trouble," at once "unworthy of our nation and our great Anglo-Saxon family."

And yet, sir, it is not improbable that "this thing" or its like will be said as often as the exigencies of party or the needs of the partisan shall exact. It is not improbable that to sympathies and antipathies engendered by the differences of the past the demagogue will in all future time appeal. As they are doing now, so will they hereafter constitute an instrument suited to his nefarious purpose. But it will be the high duty of the true northman and the true southron to bear in mind "how physical circumstances control the deeds of men in spite of themselves;" and looking upon the unspeakable woes of civil strife, to distinguish the instrument from the cause. And so remembering and so distinguishing, they may frustrate the designs of the demagogue, though they may not be able to drive him from his wicked work. They may speed the day when the recollections of the strife will pass into the twilight between memory and forgetfulness, "where rugged outline and harsh angle are softened by mellowing tints or obscured by deepening shadows."

In the war which England and France in the last century waged over Canada it will be remembered that Montcalm and Wolfe, representatives of the valor of the two great belligerents, fell in the same engagement upon the sanguinary heights of Abraham. The passing years soon assuaged the bitterness of strife, and there rose from the generous contributions of both English and French in the public garden of Quebec a stately memorial bearing as an inscription—

Their valor gave them a common death, history a common fame, and posterity this common shaft.

No utterance ever fell from the lips of the lamented Greeley that marked more strongly the true nobility of his soul than when at Memphis he expressed an earnest hope for the day when the people of this country would be as proud of the martial renown of Jackson and Lee as they would ever be of that of Grant and Sherman. In a like spirit of magnanimity spoke the distinguished and eloquent gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] the other day, who will accept my thanks for the pleasure it affords me here to reproduce his language.

I say to those who wore the gray and to those who wore the blue, preserve every memento of your valor and your sacrifices, and the day will come when all the people will treasure every memento of American courage and sacrifice made in that great war. [Applause.] The day will come when those trophies, blending together as the dyes of yonder flag blend, will be cherished as the richest heritages of a united and unbroken American people, and will warn our countrymen through all time of the terrible cost that would attend an attempt from any quarter to dismember the American Union.

STATE RIGHTS.

But, Mr. Speaker, it is unnecessary to remind you that more than once upon this floor we have heard, in reply to some constitutional argument from this side of the House, the taunt that the politicians of the State-rights strict-construction school, being responsible for our civil troubles, are unsafe political guides, and unworthy ever to be again intrusted with political power. Again and again has the attempt been made to cast ridicule upon those who would invoke limitations upon Federal legislation, until indeed it seems to be not unusual to consider the annihilation of the whole theory of State rights as one of the results of the war, and the unqualified supremacy of the National Government as riveted firmly upon our political system by force of arms. But those, sir, who have shuddered at the fearful consequences of such a doctrine—enlightened lovers of constitutional liberty everywhere—took heart and hope when the present Supreme Court at its late term, emerging from the baleful shadow of reconstruction tyranny, and speaking through its able chief, invoked in authoritative tone recognition and respect for this derided theory. They have, so to speak, evoked it from the charnel-house of dead ideas, and breathed into it anew the life and force of a great, living, indestructible principle. This decision of the most august tribunal in the land is in its bearings so far-reaching and of such transcendent import, when considered with reference to the tendency of republican legislation for a few years past, that I shall be pardoned for embodying the following extracts in my remarks, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

We have in our political system a government of the United States and a government of each of the several States. Each one of these governments is distinct from the others, and each has citizens of its own who owe it allegiance, and whose rights, within its jurisdiction, it must protect. The same person may be at the same time a citizen of the United States and a citizen of a State, but his rights of citizenship under one of these governments will be different from those he has under the other. (Slaughter-house cases, 16 Wallace, page 74.)

Citizens are the members of the political community to which they belong. They are the people who compose the community, and who, in their associated capacity, have established or submitted themselves to the dominion of a government for the promotion of their general welfare and the protection of their individual as well as their collective rights. In the formation of a government the people may confer upon it such powers as they choose. The government when so formed may, and when called upon should, exercise all the powers it has for the protection of the rights of its citizens and the people within its jurisdiction, but it can exercise no other. The duty of a government to afford protection is limited always by the power it possesses for that purpose.

Experience made the fact known to the people of the United States that they required a national government for national purposes. The separate governments of the separate States, bound together by the Articles of Confederation alone, were not sufficient for the promotion of the general welfare of the people in respect to foreign nations, or for their complete protection as citizens of the confederated States. For this reason the people of the United States, "in order to form a more perfect Union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty" to themselves and their posterity, (Constitution, preamble,) ordained and established the Government of the United States, and defined its powers by a constitution which they adopted as its fundamental law and made its rule of action.

The Government thus established and defined is to some extent a government of the States in their political capacity. It is also, for certain purposes, a government of the people. Its powers are limited in number, but not in degree. Within the scope of its powers, as enumerated and defined, it is supreme and above the States, but beyond it has no existence. It was erected for special purposes and endowed with all the powers necessary for its own preservation and the accomplishment of the ends its people had in view. It can neither grant nor secure to its citizens any right or privilege not expressly or by implication placed under its jurisdiction.

The people of the United States resident within any State are subject to two governments, one State and the other national, but there need be no conflict between the two. The powers which one possesses the other does not. They are established for different purposes and have separate jurisdictions. Together they make one whole and furnish the people of the United States with a complete government, ample for the protection of all their rights at home and abroad. True, it may sometimes happen that a person is amenable to both jurisdictions for one and the same act. Thus, if a marshal of the United States is unlawfully resisted while executing the process of the courts within a State, and the resistance is accompanied by an assault on the officer, the sovereignty of the United States is violated by the resistance, and that of the State by the breach of peace in the assault. So, too, if one passes the counterfeited coin of the United States within a State, it may be an offense against the United States and the State; the United States because it discredits the coin, and the State because of the fraud upon him to whom it is passed. This does not, however, necessarily imply that the two governments possess powers in common or bring them into conflict with each other. It is the natural consequence of a citizenship which owes allegiance to two sovereignties and claims protection from both. The citizen cannot complain because he has voluntarily submitted himself to such a form of government. He owes allegiance to the two departments, so to speak, and within their respective spheres must pay the penalties, which each exacts for disobedience to its laws. In return he can demand protection from each within its own jurisdiction.

The Government of the United States is one of delegated powers alone. Its authority is defined and limited by the Constitution. All powers not granted to it by that instrument are reserved to the States or the people. No rights can be acquired under the Constitution or laws of the United States except such as the Government of the United States has the authority to grant or secure. All that cannot be so granted or secured are left under the protection of the States.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee. Such is the language of the court in the case of the United States vs. Cruikshank et als., while it holds in case of the United States vs. Reese et al. as follows:

The courts enforce the legislative will when ascertained, if within the constitutional grant of power. Within its legitimate sphere Congress is supreme and beyond the control of the courts, but if it steps outside of its constitutional limitations and attempts that which is beyond its reach, the courts are authorized to, and when called upon in due course of legal procedings must, annul its encroachments upon the reserved power of the States and the people.

Here then we have in our system "two sovereignties," one of which is of delegated powers. Its legislative will must be exercised within its legitimate sphere, within which it is supreme, but stepping outside of that sphere it encroaches upon the reserved power of the other "sovereignties" and the people, and is guilty of usurpation. That political organization in this country—whatever it be called—that asserts these limitations and would maintain them in administering the Government should commend itself to the public support and favor, while the people should hold as unworthy of trust and visit with their severest condemnation any party that would deny or ignore them. Either extreme should be avoided, as while the one may be said to have plunged us into a direful war the other has drawn into fearful peril our local institutions and menaced us with a most dangerous modification of our dual system of government. Mr. Jefferson in his celebrated summary of the principles upon which the Government should be administered mentions among them "the support of the State governments in all their rights as the most competent administrations for our domestic concerns and surest bulwarks against anti-republican tendencies, and the preservation of the General Government in its whole constitutional vigor as the sheet anchor of our peace at home and safety abroad."

The form of government which alone renders popular institutions compatible with extent of territory—

Says Professor Reed—

is that form which has its origin in this ancient element of Saxon local self-government. Who can question that it is such a political system that has expanded this Republic from its primitive circumspection to its present extent; so that that which at first reached not far beyond the sound of the Atlantic, became enlarged beyond the mountains, then beyond the Mississippi, and now, having crossed the second great mountain range of the continent, has on its other border the sound of the earth's other great ocean. I know of no grander traditional influence to be observed in history than this simple Saxon characteristic element and the mighty issues of it now manifest around us; this principle of local self-government, obscurely recognized in the ancient fatherland of the Saxon, carried thence to England to be combined with the central power of a constitutional monarchy, and now a living principle here, helping by the harmony of State rights and Federal energy to extend and perpetuate the Republic.

Upon this principle, this "harmony of State rights and Federal energy," the security of liberty may be said to depend. Let those then who are clothed with the law-making power see to it that this principle is preserved by the strict observance of constitutional restraints and just divisions of political power.

In this connection it may not be out of place to allude to the effort made at the present session by each party upon this floor to give to the country an expression of its view of the nature of our dual system of government; and to the end that they may be fairly considered and contrasted, I ask the reporter to place them in the RECORD in parallel columns:

Mr. Baker's resolution.

Resolved, That the people of the United States constitute one nation and not a mere confederacy of States or nations; that the Constitution was formed by the people acting in their primary and individual capacity through their delegates thereto duly constituted; that the Government under the Constitution is one of the people, by the people, and for the people; that in its appropriate sphere the Government of this nation is sovereign and supreme; that in its nature it is permanent and indissoluble except by the act and consent of the whole people; that no State has the right or authority to judge of the constitutionality of the laws enacted by it, and to nullify or resist the execution of the same; and that all overt acts by any State or the people thereof of secession therefrom, or of rebellion against the same, constitute treason; and that the late war of the rebellion for the dismemberment of the Union was causeless and indefensible on any theory of right or constitutional law.

Mr. Cox's resolutions.

Resolved, That the people of the United States constitute a nation in the sense, to the extent, and for the purposes defined in the Federal Constitution.

Resolved, That the Government of the United States is a Federal Union, and was formed by the people of the several States in their sovereign capacity; that the rights and powers of the United States Government are defined and limited by the Federal Constitution, and these rights and powers cannot be enlarged nor diminished except by an amendment to the Constitution.

Resolved, That the rights of the States have the same sanction and security in the Constitution as the rights and powers of the Federal Government, and that local domestic government by the several States within the limits of the Constitution is absolutely necessary for the preservation of the liberties of the citizen and the continuance of our republican system of government.

Resolved, That the doctrine that a State has a right to secede from the Union is in conflict with the idea of a "perpetual union" as contemplated by the Constitution and should be regarded as being forever extinguished by the results of the recent civil conflict.

Mr. BAKER'S resolutions were supported by a solid vote of the republican party and opposed by an almost solid vote of this side of the House, while Mr. COX'S resolutions received the full vote of this side and the votes of a few republican members. The democracy can well afford to submit the issue to the candid judgment of the country upon these resolutions and the late decision of the court, confident that whatever political theory would tend to prostrate one part of our system and build up the other far beyond the proportions of its original design can never receive the deliberate approval of the liberty-loving people of this country. That party, whatever may be its name, that best fulfills the destiny of our country must uphold the general theories of government receiving so lately the sanction of the highest judicial authority in the land, in pronouncing which—be it said to its honor—it has exhibited itself as rising again to the exalted position on these great issues which it had once held, but from which it had strayed under stress of war and reconstruction.

CURRENCY.

Any attempted review, Mr. Speaker, of the prominent questions affecting the present "state of the Union" would be incomplete and partial without some reference to the subject that now engrosses more of the public attention than perhaps any other in the wide range of public affairs, and judging from the great diversity of opinion that exists in reference to it, it is of all the most difficult of solution.

The ruinous, crushing policy of monetary contraction adopted and persisted in by the republican party in its pretended zeal to reach a gold basis had produced before this Congress met an incalculable amount of distress in the land. The farmer in his fields, the mechanic in his workshop, the operative in the factory, the debtor in the toils of an interest-bearing mortgage had felt and suffered its blighting effect. It was expected that the great popular revolution of 1874 would result in a financial revolution that would mitigate at least, if it could not entirely cure, the evils of the false and vicious policy to which the Government had been committed by unwise legislation. This implied promise has not been kept; this reasonable hope has been disappointed. Up to this hour the Committee on Banking and Currency have reported no measure for the repeal of the crude resumption act of 1875, nor have they, so far as I now remember, reported any measure that could be termed a measure of relief to the public. It was not supposed that anything could be done to right the stupendous wrong perpetrated by the act of 1869, which, by converting the debt of the Government from one due in paper to one due in gold, had criminally enriched by many millions the holders of Government securities; it was not expected that any claim for restitution would be set up and enforced against this outrage under the forms of law; it was not even expected that a policy of opposition and hostility to the multitude of national banks that are now employed at an annual cost of $20,000,000 to furnish currency to the country would be immediately inaugurated in this Hall; but the country had the right to expect and did expect that some consideration would be manifested for its depressed industries, its unemployed energies, and its vast burden of public and private indebtedness, by an effort to stay the execution of a policy that had wrought and continued to work so much of evil and distress in the land.

Desiring, Mr. Speaker, to offer some remarks in a more particular way upon this policy which is embodied in the third section of the act of January 14, 1875, I ask the Clerk to read that section.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That section 5177 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, limiting the aggregate amount of circulating notes of national banking associations, be, and is hereby, repealed; and each existing banking association may increase its circulating notes in accordance with existing law without respect to said aggregate limit; and new banking associations may be organized in accordance with existing law without respect to said aggregate limit; and the provisions of law for the withdrawal and redistribution of national-bank currency among the several States and Territories are hereby repealed. And whenever so often as circulating notes shall be issued to any such banking association so increasing its capital or circulating notes, or so newly organized as aforesaid, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to redeem the legal-tender United States notes in excess only of $300,000,000 to the amount of 80 per cent. of the sum of national-bank notes so issued to any such banking association as aforesaid, and to continue such redemption, as such circulating notes are issued, until there shall be outstanding the sum of $300,000,000 of such legal-tender United States notes, and no more. And on and after the 1st day of January, A. D. 1879, the Secretary of the Treasury shall redeem in coin the United States legal-tender notes then outstanding on their presentation for redemption, at the office of the assistant treasurer of the United States in the city of New York, in sums of not less than $50. And to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to prepare and provide for the redemption in this act authorized or required, he is authorized to use any surplus revenues from time to time in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and to issue, sell, and dispose of, at not less than par, in coin, either of the descriptions of bonds of the United States described in the act of Congress approved July 14, 1870, entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt," with like qualities, privileges, and exemptions, to the extent necessary to carry this act into full effect, and to use the proceeds thereof for the purposes aforesaid. And all provisions of law inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee. It will be observed, Mr. Speaker, that this section provides for the conversion of the whole volume of legal-tender notes of the Government into its interest-bearing bonds. It does this by providing that gold may be purchased by the sale of such bonds and used in redeeming the legal tenders. The effect of such an operation will be twofold: first, by converting a non-interest-bearing debt evidenced by legal-tender notes that now amount to $370,000,000 into an interest-bearing bonded debt, the annual burdens of the people will be increased to the extent of the interest, which may be estimated at not less than $20,000,000. As the gold will have in great part to be purchased abroad it is reasonable to assume that the bonds will be held abroad, and this amount of interest, $20,000,000, will be added to the already crushing load of interest which we have annually to pay to foreign creditors. Certainly if there is any one policy imperatively enjoined upon us by the exigencies of our situation it is a policy that would tend to bring back our debt from foreign hands and place it once more in the hands of our own citizens, so that the large amount of gold interest paid out annually may be paid out to our own people and become the basis of a permanent and reliable resumption of specie payment. But the fact that the bonds so issued for the extinguishment of legal-tender notes may go and will probably go abroad is not the leading objection; but it is that the interest-bearing debt of the Government should be increased at all, no matter where held; for I do insist, sir, that a sound policy forbids that there shall be any additional burden in the way of interest laid upon the already overtaxed resources of the country. Secondly, by redeeming the legal-tenders with gold purchased with Government bonds, and not providing for their re-issue, which is certainly not contemplated by the act, the circulating medium of the country will be reduced to the extent of $370,000,000, or more than one-half of what is in circulation at present. No substitute is provided by the act for this vast amount of useful currency so withdrawn, unless it can be assumed that the gold with which it will be redeemed will remain in the country and serve as a medium of exchange, a result (to say nothing of the unsuitable character of gold as a circulating medium) so dependent upon the commerce, trade, industries, and general prosperity of the country at that time as to be too doubtful for a sane statesmanship to rely upon. This, however, is called "an act to provide for the resumption of specie payments." It is a glaring misnomer and intended to delude. As a more truthful and appropriate characterization it should have been entitled "An act to increase the public burdens by funding $382,000,000 of non-interest-bearing obligations of the Government, used and needed as currency, into the gold interest-bearing bonds of the Government." Its true character will thus be indicated, for we look in vain into the law for any other provision (except that which I have commented upon) that looks in the direction of resumption. Nothing is said in it in reference to redemption by the national banks of their obligations. No provision is found requiring them to keep and retain one-third or any amount of gold for the redemption of the $334,000,000 of notes which they have in circulation. We are told, however, that when the legal-tender or greenback shall all have been redeemed by the Government there will be nothing else for the banks to pay their notes in except gold, and they will be compelled to provide themselves with a sufficient gold basis to protect their circulation or let their bonds deposited as security be subjected to the satisfaction of their notes. Just think for a moment of the character of the banking system which is thus offered to the country as a specie system. Not a dollar of gold is required, not even the interest upon their bonds deposited as security with the Government is to be held and retained to secure the immediate convertibility of the bank-note. It is not sufficient to say that the bank is good, that it has ample assets, for such a statement only shows that your national-bank paper is founded upon and has credit alone for its basis—a basis that the resumptionist claims to repudiate when he insists that our monetary system shall rest upon gold alone.

It is useless, Mr. Speaker, to speculate upon the possible if not probable consequences of the crude act of January 14, 1875. If executed by the Secretary of the Treasury it may result in the retirement of every dollar of the legal-tender currency now in circulation at a cost, as already stated, of $20,000,000 interest annually. The gold paid out for it, being borrowed and not coming to us in obedience to the great and inexorable laws of trade, may, as it will most likely do, leave us and go abroad as for years past it has been going, and the only circulating medium left in the country may be the $334,000,000 of national-bank notes that are not convertible into gold, and are only good because they are based upon the credit of Government bonds. But contraction, great and ruinous as it may be up to this point, will probably not stop here. Even the volume of national-bank notes may be greatly reduced by January 1, 1879, whatever may be the increase afterward of that kind of currency. These banks may not be willing to see legal-tenders, with which they may now redeem their notes, retired, and themselves left under legal obligations to provide coin for the redemption of their notes. While legal-tenders are at a discount and may be used for that purpose and before January 1, 1879, the banks will surrender much of their circulation, as they have already been doing, in anticipation of the execution of the act. It has been stated on the authority of my able and accurate friend from Ohio [Mr. SOUTHARD] that in one year from the time of the passage of the act the banks have retired and canceled $10,456,114 of their circulating notes, and have deposited in the Treasury $22,011,206 with which to redeem a like amount of their notes, making a practical contraction of their circulation of $32,467,320. In the same time there was a redemption of legal-tenders to the amount of $10,172,780, and of fractional currency $2,243,525, or a total practical contraction of $44,883,625. This contraction of the volume of currency, already too small, in my judgment, for the wants of the country, may and in all probability will go on, and perhaps at an accelerated rate as the 1st of January, 1879, draws nearer, threatening, as I said in the debate on the centennial appropriation bill, "a money famine unparalleled in the history of the country, paralyzation of industry, prostration in business, destruction of values, of confidence, of credit, and of hope in a reign of poverty, want, and ruin."

While it will be remembered that whatever effort has been made to repeal this impracticable and dangerous law has come from the democratic side of this Hall and had its chief support from that side, in my humble judgment our failure as a party here to meet this just demand and throw upon a republican Senate the responsibility of all the consequences of its attempted execution may subject us to some severe and not unmerited criticism. Of the consequences of this disappointment of the public expectation I shall have but little to say. Parties are valueless when they cease to represent great, living, practical issues. Bold, independent thought, that disorganizes old and gives coherence, force, and power to new parties is at its work to-day. If it cannot force an existing organization in its direction it may create an agency suited to its purpose. The protest against contraction and demand for a circulating medium suited to the wants of the country are not the mere idle catch-words of a few restless demagogues. It has deeper and more portentous significance, of which existing organizations would do well to take warning. It is the fearful cry of enforced idleness, of unemployed labor, of languishing industries, to which all the maxims of an obsolete economy furnish no quieting response. It asks for bread and will not be satisfied with a stone. It asks for fish and is not to be appeased with a serpent. It comes from plain people, but with intelligence enough to perceive how uniformly the legislation of the country has teneded to aggrandize its capital. They have seen the act of 1869 passed in the interest of that capital, by which were unjustly transferred many millions of dollars into the pockets of the bondholders. They have seen silver as it grew abundant and cheap demonetized in the very teeth of the Constitution, so that the Government creditor could get his pay in the dearer metal. They have seen the great sovereign power of issuing currency partially abdicated and given over to a legion of corporations and a compensation of near $20,000,000 paid them annually for doing what the Government could itself do much better and at a vastly less expense. They have seen how tenderly are touched the sacred prerogatives of institutions whose influence may be deprecated but not safely defied. They have seen legislation year after year keep the badge of inferiority upon the money which the people use by rejecting it for import duties; thereby furnishing one currency to the public and another to the public creditor, thus depreciating the Government obligation and keeping it at a discount, and they see finally an undisguised effort to deprive them entirely of this cheap and useful form of currency and leave as their only circulating medium, and in stinted quantities, the expensive, uncertain, and dangerous one furnished them by the national banks. No wonder that here and there is a spasmodic exhibition of the spirit that animated the hero of the Hermitage in his historic struggle against the same power, and history may repeat itself sooner or later and furnish another illustration of the resistless might of an aroused and indignant public opinion.

CIVIL-SERVICE REFORM.

There is a lesson in the history of the last seven years which the people would do well never to forget. If free institutions, if liberty sustained by law are to be preserved, their preservation can be best secured by a perpetual recurrence to the melancholy memories of this out-going Administration. By them we are admonished of the perils of personal government and its utter incompatibility with the theory of institutions that are "of the people, by the people, and for the people." They may remind us how power held in trust for the public weal may be prostituted to personal and family aggrandizement and to the gratification of an individual favoritism, persistently and wickedly blind to the high source and legitimate purposes of all delegated political power. In this history is recorded that growing laxity of political morals that culminated at last in an almost public commerce in the patronage of the Republic.

Whatever may be said, Mr. Speaker, in disparagement of this House, one thing must stand to its everlasting credit: the sincerity, vigor, and success with which it has wrought for the purification of the national service and restoration of public virtue to places of public trust. Despite the resistance which it has met in executive orders forbidding the use at this capital of original papers on file in the Departments, despite the implied threat of prosecution and vengeance to accomplices who might come forward to attest official malfeasance, despite the refusal of the other branch of Congress to pass laws granting immunity to such witnesses, despite the hue and clamor against investigation, it has gone on to results that first startled and then humiliated the nation. As the national conscience recovers from the shock the country begins to realize the benefits of these disagreeable labors. A saturnalia of fraud, a carnival of rogues, has been brought to a sudden end. An imperious and insolent lobby that once dominated here and controlled the legislation of this Hall has left its places in the corridors and upon this floor to a successor so pinched and starved, humble and unobtrusive as that its very existence is a matter of doubt. But, sir, one effect alone of these investigations already attained is their adequate reward. When this Congress met and for many months before the third-term specter had projected its malignant shadow over the American mind and filled the political horizon with "portents dire," menacing to the safety and perpetuity of our political system. But the horrid apprehension it inspired has passed, and danger to our institutions from that threatened innovation, thanks to the fearless majority in this Hall, no longer confronts us.

But still one other tendency we feel confidently assured these labors will have, a tendency toward a re-inauguration of the era of official responsibility, a principle long ignored, both to the corruption of public morals and the peril of public liberty. When again shall another Secretary of War make commerce of the patronage of his high place or another American minister to a foreign court lend the influence of his ministerial character to bull the shares of a doubtful speculation?

The public mind too has been aroused by these exposures to the fuller realization of a danger which is even, sir, a direr evil than that of civil war itself, for the hurricane that vexes the bosom of the sea and bends the masts of the goodly ship has less of certain peril in it than the invisible borer that gnaws unnoticed in the dark or the dry rot that steals through her staunch timbers unheard and unseen. As to whether the country will profit fully by the solemn warning given at a cost of so much of its substance and its pride the future alone will determine.

Honest, responsible administration of governmental functions is the great and crying need of the hour, and the ides of November will make it attainable. Will the country pronounce for it? Unless all signs are delusive public opinion, that mysterious force which no human hand can check or turn from the current in which it is set, that indefinable sentiment which resists or upholds governments and parties without their being able to account for it, and which rarely errs in doing so, demands, in a tone that should go neither unheard nor unheeded, a return to honest, frugal, constitutional government. Discarding all idea of a magnificent system supported by costly, aristocratic establishments, which tend neither to the promotion of happiness nor the protection of liberty, it demands a return to the simple republican system of the earlier years of our national history. A plain system void of pomp, protecting all and granting favors to none, dispensing its blessings like the dews of heaven, unseen and unfelt, save in the beauty and freshness they contribute to produce. Such a government as this the genius of our people requires; under such a one only may these States remain for ages to come united, prosperous, and free.

The Utilization of the Product of Gold and Silver Mines.

SPEECH OF HON. JOHN R. EDEN,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

July 26, 1876,

On the bill (H. R. No. 3635) to utilize the product of gold and silver mines, and for other purposes.

Mr. EDEN. Mr. Speaker, in the brief time I shall occupy in this discussion I propose to confine myself to the consideration of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.] That amendment is as follows:

That so much of the act entitled "An act to provide for the resumption of specie payments," approved January 14, 1875, as authorizes or requires the Secretary of the Treasury to redeem in coin, on and after the 1st day of January, 1879, the United States notes is hereby repealed.

REPEAL OF THE RESUMPTION ACT.

One of the questions which now confronts the people grows out of the attempt to force the resumption of specie payments by coercive legislation at a time when every industrial interest of the country is paralyzed, and every channel of commerce obstructed with bankrupt estates. This business stagnation results from vicious legislation relative to the currency and taxation, and extravagance and corruption in the administration of public affairs. Instead of relieving the financial distress of the country by reformatory legislation, placing our currency on a better basis, and relieving the people as far as possible from taxation by retrenchment in expenditures, the advocates of the resumption act of 1875 propose to reach specie payments on the 1st of January, 1879, through general bankruptcy and ruin.

What is resumption? By the third section of the act of January 14, 1875, entitled "An act to provide for the resumption of specie payments," it is provided that:

On and after the 1st day of January, A. D. 1879, the Secretary of the Treasury shall redeem, in coin, the United States legal-tender notes then outstanding on their presentation for redemption at the office of the assistant treasurer of the United States, in the city of New York, in sums of not less than $50.

The only mode of procuring the money to make the redemption provided by law is the authority given the Secretary of the Treasury to sell interest-bearing bonds. In order to determine the policy of resumption by that mode, let us briefly refer to the history of the legal-tender paper and its uses. The authors of our legal-tender notes seemed to appreciate the importance of sustaining the credit of that class of paper, doubtless with a view of making resumption easy.

If the legal-tender note was at par with gold coin there would be no necessity for resumption. The evil sought to be remedied by resumption grows out of the fluctuations in the value of what the law has declared to be money. To remedy this defect as far as possible the act of February 25, 1862, authorizing the first issue of legal-tender notes provided that the holder of such paper might, at his option, convert the same into United States bonds, bearing interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum. Had this system been adhered to an equilibrium would have been maintained between the Government notes used as a circulating medium and those used as an investment; and whenever the interest-bearing bonds became at par with gold the question of resumption would have been solved.

By the act of March 3, 1863, the time within which the legal-tender notes could be converted into 6 per cent. bonds was limited to July 1, 1863. At the expiration of that period the only pledge remaining in reference to the legal-tender notes was the promise of the Government to pay them at some indefinite time, solely at the option of the Government, and their limited receivability for Government dues and their full legal-tender character for private indebtedness.

The next important legislation bearing upon the subject under consideration is the act of March 18, 1869. In the law authorizing the issue of the legal-tender notes and the 5.20 bonds both classes of paper were treated as merely temporary expedients to meet a pressing emergency. The legal-tenders were at the option of the holder convertible into 5.20 bonds, and after five years the principal of the 5.20 bonds was payable in legal-tender notes. The Government sold the bonds, taking therefor legal-tender notes at par, the legal-tenders were paid out by the Government to defray the expenses of the war, and the holders at pleasure again converted the legal-tenders into interest-bearing bonds. By the act of March 18, 1869—

The faith of the United States was pledged to the payment in coin or its equivalent * * * of all the interest-bearing obligations of the United States except in case where the law authorizing the issue of such obligations has expressly provided that the same may be paid in lawful money or other currency than gold and silver. * * * The faith of the United States was also solemnly pledged to make provisions at the earliest practicable period for the redemption of the United States notes in coin.

By this act of legislation several hundred millions were added to the public debt, and the legal-tender notes were further depreciated by a discrimination against their use in the payment of the principal of the 5.20 bonds. From the passage of this act there was no relation whatever between the interest-bearing and non-interest-bearing notes of the Government. The greenbacks were left to take care of themselves with a pledge of redemption at some indefinite time in the future. The Government degraded its own paper by refusing to receive it for customs dues and by declaring that it would not require the holders of 5.20 bonds to receive it for the principal of their bonds.

I am not now discussing the policy of the passage of the act of March 18, 1869, so far as it applies to the changed character of the 5.20 bonds with a view of changing it. However grievously the people may have been wronged by that legislation there is now no remedy for it. I only call attention to it to show how the greenbacks have been discriminated against and consequently degraded and depreciated by the acts of Congress. The greenbacks, being thus treated as an outlaw, were yet the foundation of the whole circulating medium of the country and the measure of values except as heretofore stated. The whole internal commerce of the country has been carried on for more than thirteen years upon the greenback basis. The title of lands of immense value has been transferred in all parts of the country upon the same measure of value. Large municipal and individual indebtedness has been created payable in legal-tender currency. Mortgages and deeds of trust cover thousands of valuable farms in the West for loans in greenbacks, falling due in from three to five years. The great commercial crash of 1873 has not yet expended its force. Many men of large property and comparatively small indebtedness, owing to the stagnation in business, have found relief only through bankruptcy; while many others still struggle on in the vain effort to extricate themselves from inevitable financial ruin.

